Mr. William MacLean, Jr., for appellee:

A fixture is an article which was a chattel, but which, by being physically annexed or affixed to the realty by someone having an interest in the soil, becomes a part and parcel of it.

Darrah v. Baird, 101 Pa. 265; Lemar v. Miles, 4 Watts, 330; Wick v. Bredin, 189 Pa. 83, 42 Atl. 17.

A tenant must assert his privilege to remove fixtures attached by him during the term. If he does not they remain inseparable by the tenant from the freehold, and he can neither remove them nor recover them as personal chattels by an action of trover.

Overton v. Williston, 31 Pa. 155; Davis v. Moss, 38 Pa. 346; Darrah v. Baird, 101 Pa. 265; Carver v. Gough, 153 Pa. 225, 25 Atl. 1124.

Where a tenant sells his fixtures to an incoming tenant, he should obtain his landlord's consent.

Williams, Pa. Law of Land. & T. 153; Chitty, Contr. p. 504; Thropp's Appeal, 70 Pa. 395.

The tenant does not lose his right to his personal property left upon the premises.

Sattler v. Opperman, 14 Pa. Super. Ct. 32.

The reason why he loses title to the fixtures is the impossibility of the interest of the tenant in any part of the freehold outlasting the period of his contract.

Overton v. Williston, 31 Pa. 155.

When the term is ended the tenant is presumed to have abandoned, not the fixtures, but his right to remove them. This is an irrebuttable presumption of law, and it may be quite apart from the real intention.

Davis v. Moss, 38 Pa. 346; Deeble v. M'Mullen, 8 Ir. C. L. Rep. 355; Barff v. Probyn, 11 Times L. R. 467.

A tenant having the right to remove fixtures loses that right upon entering into a new agreement with his landlord for the future possession of the premises, unless the right is reserved at the time.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a bill by a landlord to restrain his tenants from removing trade fixtures from the demised premises. A preliminary injunction was awarded, but subsequently dissolved. Before final hearing all the articles were removed by the tenants, and the court's decree was that they pay their landlord $5,400, the value of the articles removed, together with the costs of suit.

On September 17, 1892, the appellee leased the premises described in the bill to John C. McCurdy and James McCurdy, trading as McCurdy Brothers, for the term of ten years from October 1, 1892. The court found that the articles enumerated in the bill were trade fixtures, and belonged to the lessees under the lease of September 17, 1892. The legal conclusion of the learned judge that the tenants had the right to remove them during the term of their lease was, therefore, manifestly correct, and under the facts found the landlord could have raised no question if they had been removed at any time prior to October 1, 1902. Before the expiration of the lease, the tenants, as required by it, gave three months' notice to the landlord of their intention to terminate it. In 1899 John C. McCurdy, as found by the court below, "sold his interest in the stock of goods, wares, and merchandise, together with the machinery and fixtures, contained in the building at the northwest corner of Front street and Susquehanna avenue, to James McCurdy." On July 11, 1902, a new lease was executed by the appellee to the said James McCurdy and Samuel McCurdy, another brother, trading under the same firm name of McCurdy Brothers, and James and Samuel became the lessees under the agreement of that date, which defines the lease to be an "extended and renewed" lease of September 17, 1892, at a reduced rental. The appellants removed all the fixtures before October 1, 1903, the date of the expiration of the extended and renewed lease.

Under the foregoing facts the court below made the decree mentioned for the reason that, even if the lease of July 11, 1902, is to be treated as a renewal of the lease of 1892 between the same parties, the appellants had no right to remove the fixtures after the expiration of the first lease, in the absence of a clause in the second one reserving the right to do so at its expiration. Though the lessees under the first lease had an unquestioned right to remove the fixtures at any time before October 1, 1902, and, if they had done so, could immediately after that date have reinstalled them in the premises with the same unquestioned right to remove them at any time before October 1, 1903, the view of the learned court below is that they became the property of the landlord, because they were not removed and reinstalled; and there is no clause in the "extended and renewed" lease reserving the right of the tenants to remove them before it expired. Though this has been declared to be the law by some courts, and the learned judge had authority outside of this state to sustain him, we cannot subscribe to such a doctrine as being either in harmony with reason or consistent with fair dealing between man and man. When a tenant attaches to the land fixtures necessary for him in the conduct of his business, the presumption is that at the expiration of his lease he will remove them; and it is his right to do so. They are not put in for the benefit of the landlord; and until the tenant, after his term expires, leaves them on the premises in which he no longer has any interest, no intention can be imputed to him to abandon them to his lessor. Hill v. Sewald, 53 Pa. 271, 91 Am. Dec. 209; Watts v. Lehman, 107 Pa. 106. There is a distinct finding that McCurdy Brothers, the lessees under the lease of 1892, never intended to abandon their trade fixtures. One of the brothers, owning and having them in his possession, on July 11, 1902, entered with another brother into the "extended and renewed" lease. The possession of the premises and the fixtures remained unbroken from 1892 to 1903 in at least one of the present appellants; and yet, because he did not, on the last day of September, 1902, remove them, and put them back on the following day, when the "extended and renewed" lease began, and the lessees under it failed to formally reserve the right to remove them at the expiration of the "extended and renewed" term, an intention is to be imputed of an abandonment of them to the landlord. Abandonment to him being a question of intention, it cannot be that under the undisputed facts in this case the appellants ever intended to or did abandon their trade fixtures. To have removed them one day and put them back the next would have been a vain and useless thing, which the law requires of no one; and it offends reason to say that the landlord had a right to regard his tenants' property as abandoned to him because one of them, who was to continue as such for another year, needing the same fixtures in his unchanged business into which he had taken another person, had not, when the lease was extended and renewed, inserted a clause giving the tenants the right to remove the fixtures at the end of the extended term.

It will profit nothing to review the very many cases brought to our attention by the learned counsel for the appellee to support the decree of the court below. It is sufficient to say that none of our own do so. They are rather in accord with the view which we entertain that the plaintiff's bill should have been dismissed. "That a tenant who erects fixtures for the benefit of his trade or business may remove them from the demised premises is an established doctrine of the law, but with this qualification,—that the removal be made during the term. After the term they become inseparable from the freehold, and can neither be removed by the tenant nor recovered by him as personal chattels by an action of trover, or for goods sold and delivered. White v. Arndt, 1 Whart. 91, and the cases cited in the argument. If a tenant remain in possession after the expiration of his term, and perform all the conditions of the lease, it amounts to a renewal of the lease from year to year, and I take it he would be entitled to remove fixtures during the year." Davis v. Moss, 38 Pa. 346. "It is a well-settled rule of law, that a tenant for years who erects fixtures for the benefit of his trade or business, may, at any time during the term, remove them from the demised premises; but cannot after the expiration thereof, unless he remain in possession and hold over, so as to create an implied renewal of the lease." Darrah v. Baird, 101 Pa. 265. In the late case of Donnelly v. Frick & L. Co. 207 Pa. 597, 57 Atl. 60, we said: "The presumption of the law, being in favor of trade, is that a tenant does not intend to make his trade fixtures part of the realty for the permanent benefit of his landlord, but will remove them before the end of his term; and it is only when he leaves without removing them during the term that an intention of making a gift of them to the landlord is to be imputed to him. Hill v. Sewald, 53 Pa. 271, 91 Am. Dec. 209; Watts v. Lehman, 107 Pa. 106. If, during the term, no intention can be imputed to the tenant to make a gift to his landlord of fixtures, which he had attached to the land for the use of his business, and he has a right to remove them during the tenancy, the same rule ought to and does apply when by permission of the landlord, even without a formal renewal or extension of the lease, he continues to remain on the premises for a definite or indefinite term. During such period in the absence of any agreement to the contrary, his intention as to his fixtures remains unchanged, and his right to remove them is unaffected by his holding over." Of great weight is the following from the learned Judge Cooley in Kerr v. Kingsbury, 39 Mich. 150, 33 Am. Rep. 362: "The right of a tenant to remove the erections made by him in furtherance of the purpose for which the premises were leased is conceded. The principle which permits it is one of public policy, and has its foundation in the interest which society has that every person shall be encouraged to make the most beneficial use of his property the circumstances will admit of. On the other hand, the requirement that the tenant shall remove during his term whatever he proposes to claim a right to remove at all is based upon a corresponding rule of public policy for the protection of the landlord, and which is that the tenant shall not be suffered, after he has surrendered the premises, to enter upon the possession of the landlord or of a succeeding tenant to remove fixtures which he might and ought to have taken away before. A regard for the succeeding interests is the only substantial reason for the rule which requires the tenant to remove his fixtures during the term. Indeed, the law does not in strictness require of him that he shall remove them during the term, but only before he surrenders possession, and during the time that he has a right to regard himself as occupying in the character of tenant. Penton v. Robart, 2 East, 88; Weston v. Woodcock, 7 Mees. & W. 14. But why the right should be lost when the tenant, instead of surrendering possession, takes a renewal of his lease is not very apparent. There is certainly no reason of public policy to sustain such a doctrine. On the contrary, the reasons which saved to the tenant his right to the fixtures in the first place are equally influential to save to him on a renewal what was unquestionably his before. What could possibly be more absurd than a rule of law which should, in effect, say to the tenant who is about to obtain a renewal: 'If you will be at the expense and trouble and incur the loss of removing your erections during the term, and of afterwards bringing them back again, they shall be yours; otherwise, you will be deemed to abandon them to your landlord.'"

The decree of the court below is reversed, and plaintiff's bill dismissed, at his costs, which include those on this appeal.

(.....Mo.....)

Injunction will not lie, under a consti-

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for the City of St. Louis in favor of plaintiff in a suit to enjoin the changing of the grade of a certain street. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs McKelghan & Watts and Shepard Barclay, for appellants:

Injunction would not be available, even if the suit had been properly brought.

Plaintiff is not an abutting owner upon Arkansas avenue, the street where the change of grade is charged to have occurred.

Cummings v. Huse & L. Ice & Transp. Co. 156 Mo. 28, 56 S. W. 282; Glasgow v. St. Louis, 107 Mo. 198, 17 S. W. 743; Knapp, S. & Co. Co. v. St. Louis, 156 Mo. 343, 56 S. W. 1102.

The evidence does not prove that, by any alleged change of grade anywhere, any damage will be caused to plaintiff's property by diminishing its value in any particular. Such proof is essential to a recovery of damages for change of grade, and, for stronger reason, it is essential to any injunction such as was decreed in this case.

Schuster v. Myers, 148 Mo. 422, 50 S. W. 103; Cole v. St. Louis, 132 Mo. 633, 34 S. W. 469; Van De Vere v. Kansas City, 107 Mo. 83, 28 Am. St. Rep. 396, 17 S. W. 695; Christian v. St. Louis, 127 Mo. 109, 29 S. W. 996; Cummings v. Huse & L. Ice & Transp. Co. 156 Mo. 28, 56 S. W. 282.

As the petition now stands, plaintiff has a plain, adequate, and complete remedy at law, and hence it states no cause of action for an injunction.

Christian v. St. Louis, 127 Mo. 109, 29 S. W. 996; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Louder, 138 Mo. 533, 60 Am. St. Rep. 565, 39 S. W. 799; Bornachein v. Finck, 13 Mo. App. 120; *St. Louis, I. M. & S. It appears, on the face of his pleading, that plaintiff is not an abutting owner; and hence injunction is not available to him.

Knapp, S. & Co. Co. v. St. Louis, 153 Mo. 560, 55 S. W. 104; Christian v. St. Louis, 127 Mo. 109, 29 S. W. 996; Bailey v. Culver, 84 Mo. 531.

The slight elevation of the street at the outlet of said alley would not impair any right of ingress to, or egress from, the plaintiff's property.

Cole v. St. Louis, 132 Mo. 633, 34 S. W. 469; Bailey v. Culver, 12 Mo. App. 175, Affirmed in 84 Mo. 531; Rude v. St. Louis, 93 Mo. 408, 6 S. W. 257; Christian v. St. Louis, 127 Mo. 115, 29 S. W. 957; Fairchild v. St. Louis, 97 Mo. 85, 11 S. W. 60.

Messrs. Rassieur & Buder, for respondent:

The fact that plaintiff is not an "abutting owner" is not a bar to an injunction against the defendants. It is only necessary to show that the property itself, or some right or easement connected therewith, is directly affected, and that it is specially damaged.

When a person suffers some special damage over and above the community in general, he may have his action therefor, even though others may have like actions.

Schoen v. Kansas City, 65 Mo. App. 134.

The proper remedy is an injunction, until the damage to plaintiff's proprietary rights is ascertained and paid.

Gantt, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree of the circuit court of the city of St. Louis perpetually enjoining the defendants from changing the grade of Arkansas avenue, in said city, between the north line of Cherokee street and the south line of McKean avenue, and from changing the grade of the alley running from Gravois road or avenue to Arkansas avenue, through city block 1492 of the city of St. Louis. The suit was commenced June 20, 1899, and a preliminary injunction was granted June 26, 1899.

The petition states that the plaintiff is the owner of lots 8, 9, and 10 in block 1492, having an aggregate front of 116 feet and 1 inch on the north line of Cherokee street, by a depth northwardly of 127 feet 8¾ inches, in a line parallel with the east line of Arkansas avenue, to an alley 15 feet wide, and that the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company is the owner of lot No. 7 in said block, a strip of ground 70 feet wide on the north line of Cherokee street, and running northwardly of that width 127 feet 8¾ inches to the said alley, and the said defendant also is the owner of the remainder of said block 1492, which said block bounds on the east line of Arkansas avenue between Cherokee street and McKean avenue, and also owns block 1494, which bounds on the west line of Arkansas avenue, between said two streets; that the city of St. Louis established a grade for the said Cherokee street and Arkansas avenue at their intersection, and at the places where they adjoin the said city blocks, and, with the knowledge of said grade, the plaintiff purchased and improved his said property, adjusting his buildings to said grade; that the defendant and its agent, without legal authority and against the protest of plaintiff, are now engaged in making and constructing the said Arkansas avenue between said Cherokee street and McKean avenue, and, in so doing, are changing the grade of said Arkansas avenue from Cherokee street to McKean avenue, and of the said Cherokee street at the point of its intersection with Arkansas avenue, by raising the same 2.6 feet, "and by raising the same at said alley at the point of its intersection with said Arkansas avenue 4 ²⁸/₁₀₀ feet, thereby interfering with the free ingress and egress to and from plaintiff's said property over and along said alley from and into said Arkansas avenue; that, by so making said grade as they are about to do, the property of plaintiff will be placed in a depression below the grade of neighboring streets, and subject to overflows to the irreparable damage of plaintiff."

"(1) The defendants, by their counsel, for answer to the plaintiff's petition herein, admit the defendants are corporations as alleged. Whether or not plaintiff is the owner of the tracts of land, or any of them, mentioned in said petition, said defendants have no knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief, and therefore require proof. Whether plaintiff purchased, improved, or maintained his said property with knowledge of the grade of the adjacent streets, these defendants have no knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief, and therefore require strict proof. Defendants admit that the city of St. Louis by ordinance established a grade for the said Cherokee street and Arkansas avenue. Defendants deny that they are changing the grade of Arkansas avenue from Cherokee street to McKean avenue, or of Cherokee street at its intersection with said Arkansas avenue. Defendants deny that they are raising the grade at either of said streets, or portions of said streets, 2.6 feet. Defendants deny that they are changing the grade of any of said streets, or portions of said streets. Defendants further deny that they are now engaged in making or constructing any portion of said streets without legal authority.

"(2) Defendants, for further answer, admit that they have been making certain improvements in and upon the streets aforesaid, but defendants aver that the same are strictly in accordance with the grade as fixed by the city of St. Louis at the places where said improvements are being made by defendants. Defendants further deny generally all the allegations of the petition not otherwise referred to in this answer. Having fully answered, defendants ask to be hence discharged with their costs."

No reply was filed.

At the April term, 1900, a final decree of injunction perpetually enjoining defendants was entered.

The facts developed on the trial are the following: Plaintiff is the owner of lots 8, 9, and 10 in block 1492, and defendant owns lot No. 7 and the remainder of said block. City block 1492 is bounded on the south by Cherokee street, on the east by Gravois road or avenue, on the north by McKean avenue, and on the west by Arkansas avenue. At the time plaintiff purchased his said lots there was in force an ordinance (No. 12,525, approved November 7, 1883) establishing the grade of Arkansas avenue at the intersection thereof with Cherokee street and with McKean avenue. On November 26, 1897, another ordinance (No. 19,206) was enacted, establishing the grades of streets and avenues in the district bounded south of Cherokee street and by Utah street, running west of Grand avenue, north by Arsenal street, east by Louisiana avenue and Gravois avenue, and west by Spring avenue, and repealing parts of ordinances 12,525, 15,432, 16,178, 17,274, and 17,732. The defendant, through its agents, the Pitzman Surveying Company, was proceeding to curb and gutter its property, and construct the superstructure of Arkansas avenue adjacent to its property in said street, under a permit from the city authorities, when this injunction was granted, perpetually enjoining it from doing said work in conformity to ordinance 19,206. The city of St. Louis was not made, and is not, a party to said suit. The liability of the city for damages resulting to adjoining property owners who have built their improvements in conformity to the first grade established by the city by a change of such grade is only incidentally and collaterally involved in this case, and the city has not been made a party defendant, and no damages are asked against the city. It appeared that plaintiff purchased his lots 8, 9, and 10 in block 1492 in 1890 and 1893, and had constructed thereon a brick stable and feed store and sheds and carriage houses and a residence, and laid granitoid pavements abutting on Cherokee street in front of lots 8, 9, and 10, fronting on said street. Plaintiff's said property nowhere touches Arkansas avenue. By the changes of grade from that established by ordinance 12,525 in 1883 to that fixed by ordinance 19,206 in 1897, Arkansas avenue, at the intersection of Cherokee street, will be raised 2.6 feet, and at the mouth of the alley between Arkansas avenue and Gravois avenue, in block 1492, on Arkansas avenue, the grade will be raised 4.2 feet, and, at the point on Arkansas avenue where the same intersects with McKean avenue, the grade will be raised 5.8 feet; and plaintiff's evidence tended to prove that when said grade was thus changed the southwestern corner of plaintiff's lot 8 would be 1 foot and 4 inches below said new grade. It will thus be seen that plaintiff's property does not abut on Arkansas avenue, the street affected directly by the change of grade, but plaintiff's right to recover in this suit is based on the claim that, notwithstanding his property does not abut on Arkansas avenue, his property and certain rights and easements connected therewith will be affected to his injury by the said contemplated changes of grade by ordinance 19,206 of November 26, 1897, and his ingress and egress to and from his said property over and along the alley in block 1492 to Arkansas avenue would be interfered with. It was admitted the city had taken no steps to have such supposed damages to plaintiff's property assessed. According to the evidence of Mr. Varrelman, the street commissioner of the city, and witnesses for plaintiff, the grade of the alley itself had never been established, and no profile of it had ever been made. The plaintiff's evidence showed that the mouth of the alley necessarily conformed to the street into which it opened, but no work had ever been done in the alley itself, and no stakes driven in it, and, save as to the point of intersection of the alley with Arkansas avenue, there was not even a paper grade defined by the city authorities. While 67 L. R. A.

By § 26 of article 3 of the scheme and charter of St. Louis (paragraph 2), the municipal assembly of the city of St. Louis has the power to grade and change the grade of streets, avenues and alleys in said city, when deemed best for the public good, subject to the liability of the city for damages resulting to abutting property owners from the exercise of such power. Prior to the amendment of the Constitution in 1875, the city, in the legitimate exercise of its corporate powers, could change the grade of a street or alley by ordinance without being liable for any consequential damages to an abutting owner. St. Louis v. Gurno, 12 Mo. 414; Taylor v. St. Louis, 14 Mo. 20, 55 Am. Dec. 89; Hoffman v. St. Louis, 15 Mo. 651; Soulard v. St. Louis, 36 Mo. 546. With the exception of Thurston v. St. Joseph, 51 Mo. 510, 11 Am. Rep. 463, the decision in St. Louis v. Gurno was uniformly followed by this court until the adoption of our Constitution of 1875. By § 21 of article 2 of that Constitution, it is provided that "private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation." After these words "or damaged" were added to this section, it was ruled in Householder v. Kansas City, 83 Mo. 488, that a city cannot change the grade of a street, to the damage of a lot abutting upon it, without compensation to the owner. Sheehy v. Kansas City Cable R. Co. 94 Mo. 574, 4 Am. St. Rep. 396, 7 S. W. 579. In Van De Vere v. Kansas City, 107 Mo. 83, 28 Am. St. Rep. 396, 17 S. W. 695, a fire-engine house was commenced by the city upon the lot adjoining the plaintiff's lot, and he sought an injunction to prevent it. Judge Black, after advertising to the settled rule prior to the change in the Constitution above mentioned, reviewed the authorities on this subject; and the whole court concurred in holding that the amendment did not cover the case, and dismissed the bill. Among other cases, he cited the decision in Rude v. St. Louis, 93 Mo. 408, 6 S. W. 257, in which case the plaintiff owned the property on High street 500 feet distant from a point where railroad tracks crossed that street. The tracks were depressed by authority of authorized ordinances from 4 to 6 feet, to conform to a system of bridges then in process of erection. The street was allowed to remain in this condition, impassable for teams, for three years. Suit was for damages because of the obstruction of the street, and it was held he could not recover. The like result was reached in Fairchild v. St. Louis, 97 Mo. 85, 11 S. W. 60, and Canman v. St.

Louis, 97 Mo. 92, 11 S. W. 60. These cases were like Rude's Case, except that in one plaintiff's property was 350 feet, and in the other 125 feet, from the same obstruction. In those cases it was held that, to bring a case within the amendment, the plaintiff, if suing for consequential damages, must show that he suffered an injury special and peculiar to his property, and that it was not enough to show a damage the same in kind as that suffered by other persons, though different in degree, but he must show that the property itself, or some right or easement connected therewith, is directly affected, and that it is specially affected. Judge Adams, who, by common understanding, was the author of the amendment, "or damaged," to § 21 of article 2 of the Constitution, and who wrote the opinion in Thurston v. St. Joseph, 51 Mo. 510, 11 Am. Rep. 463, in the last-mentioned case said: "I maintain that the legislature may grant power to cities to improve the streets or to appropriate them to the injury of the lot holder. But, when such power is exercised to the injury of the lot holder, he must have an adequate remedy. The city may exercise the power, but must answer for the consequences to the lot holder. The true ground of his right to recover is his appurtenant easement or property interest in the street itself." In Knapp, S. & Co. Co. v. St. Louis, 153 Mo. 572, 55 S. W. 104, it was held that, to entitle a property owner to relief against the attempt of the city of St. Louis to vacate a street, he must allege and prove that he owns property abutting on that part of the street which the ordinance vacates, and that he will suffer a special injury, and not merely such inconvenience as is cast upon all other persons in that neighborhood, and, unless the petition for injunctive relief avers that the plaintiff's lot abuts on the street to be vacated, it is fatally defective. In various cases it has been ruled that an abutting owner has a clear legal right to damages for vacating a street on which his property abuts. Heinrich v. St. Louis, 125 Mo. 424, 46 Am. St. Rep. 490, 28 S. W. 626; Christian v. St. Louis, 127 Mo. 109, 29 S. W. 906. But the very fact that he had ample remedy at law was held to deprive him of the remedy by injunction. Knapp, S. & Co. Co. v. St. Louis, 153 Mo. 574, 55 S. W. 104. The foregoing cases sufficiently indicate the state of the decided law on this subject in this commonwealth.

Applying these principles of law and equity to the facts developed, ought the decree of the circuit court to be affirmed? Arkansas avenue, the grade of which was raised by the ordinance of 1897, is distant 70 feet from the plaintiff's premises. In other words, plaintiff is not an abutting owner on said Arkansas avenue. The defendant the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company did own property abutting on Arkansas avenue, in blocks 1492 and 1494, and was proceeding to improve its said property by constructing guttering and curbing, and the superstructure of the street in front of said property, presumably for the purpose of putting it on the market, as it was wholly unimproved. It was having these street improvements made in strict conformity to the grade established by ordinance in 1897 for Arkansas avenue. There can be no doubt the city had authority to establish the grade in the first instance, and to change it in 1897, if, in the opinion of the municipal assembly, it was deemed best for the public interest. No change of the grade on Cherokee street adjoining plaintiff's property had been made when this injunction was sued out, and it is only by assuming that the city hereafter will adopt a level or straight grade from the points established on Arkansas avenue and Gravois avenue that there will be any change of grade in front of plaintiff's property on Cherokee street. There was much evidence from plaintiff's own witnesses that the city often accommodates the grade to the buildings built in conformity to the old grade when a new one is adopted. No actual grade lines have been drawn between Arkansas avenue and Gravois avenue or along the projected alley in block 1492. The ordinance of 1897 does not define those lines. It merely fixes the points of elevation at the intersections of Arkansas avenue and the mouth of the alley. The act of June 2, 1899, p. 61, which went into effect in August, 1899, has no application to this case, which was commenced before that act took effect, and is bottomed on facts existing prior to the enactment of that law.

This case presents an important question: Does § 21, art. 2, of the Constitution, in the absence of any legislation, permit any public improvement on a street which does not take the property of a citizen, or invade or trespass upon it, to be stopped until every damage to owners near and remote on the street is paid? We have seen that prior to the Constitution of 1875 a change of grade under a valid charter power did not give any cause of action, but by the amendment of § 21, art. 2, of the Constitution, damages resulting to an abutting owner by the change of the grade of a street are actionable. Unquestionably, when there is a taking of the property, the owner has a right to his compensation before his possession is disturbed; but where, instead of taking, his property is merely damaged by the lawful public improvement, can he stop the work until his damage is ascertained and paid? We find no case in which this view of this constitutional question has been presented to and decided by this court. It is true, there are some general observations, but the facts did not call for any opinion. This exact point has been covered by the supreme court of Louisiana. The Constitution of that state of 1879 has the same provision which is found in § 21, art. 2, of our Constitution of 1875. It is known as article 156 of the Constitution of Louisiana. In McMahon v. St. Louis, A. & T. R. Co. 41 La. Ann. 827, 6 So. 640, an injunction was sought in aid of a suit for damages to abutting property by the construction of a railroad on a street in pursuance of authority from the city of Shreveport. The defendant was permitted to give bond and proceed with the work. The court, through Judge Fenner, said: "It is true, the Constitution, article 156, provides that 'private property shall not be taken nor damaged for public purposes without adequate compensation being first paid.' We will not say what might be the effect of this article on the right to bond if the act prohibited involved the taking of property, the value of which might be settled in advance. But in this case there is no taking of plaintiffs' property which is not invaded or touched. The damages claimed are purely consequential in their nature, necessarily conjectural, and impossible of any accurate determination, except after the construction of the road. To impose upon the parties the necessity of settling and paying such damages before proceeding with the work would be to require a manifest impossibility, and, if such an injunction could not be bonded, it would operate a perpetual bar to the construction of public works, which was certainly not contemplated by the Constitution. . . . The defendant has done nothing but what it had a legal right to do, and it has exercised that right in a proper, prudent, and cautious manner, inflicting upon plaintiffs no injury or damage except such as necessarily results from the exercise of the right. . . . But in this case the legal right passed to the defendant encumbered with the restriction imposed by article 156 of the Constitution, above quoted, and it must discharge that burden. . . . The article 156 of the present Constitution, in providing that 'private property shall not be taken nor damaged for public purposes without adequate compensation,' etc., only extended its protecting shield over one additional injury, 67 L. R. A.

and required compensation, not only for property taken, but also for property damaged. As in the case of a taking, the measure of compensation is the [diminution in the] value of the property." In Denver, & S. F. R. Co. v. Domke, 11 Colo. 247, 17 Pac. 777, injunction was sought by an abutting owner to restrain further operation of the railroad on the street. The supreme court, for the purposes of the case, assumed that the laying of a third rail and doing the business of a standard-gauge railroad on the street was a new and additional servitude, and that those acts might result in damage to the abutting owner, for which, under the Constitution, he was entitled to compensation, and then asks the question: "Should a court of equity, at his suit, in view of the facts of this case, grant an injunction forbidding the acts in question?" The court answers in the negative, and says: "Where the fee of an individual is not sought to be taken through an abutting lot owner, he cannot enjoin the construction and operation of a railroad merely because the damages to his premises are not compensated in advance, provided the company act under sufficient legislative and municipal authority. 1 High, Inj. 2d ed. § 637. It is contended that this doctrine ought not to be held applicable here, because of the peculiar phraseology of our Constitution. True, this instrument declares that private property shall not be 'damaged' without compensation. It does not, however, require that the damages where property is not 'taken' shall be computed and paid before the injuries complained of are inflicted. It provides that 'property shall not be needlessly disturbed or the proprietary rights of the owner therein divested' till remuneration be made. The proprietary rights of plaintiffs in the land are not divested because such rights do not exist. There may be a disturbance of the easements connected with the use or enjoyment of their abutting lots, but needful disturbances of property may take place without prior compensation. . . . The city council, by adopting the right-of-way ordinance, determined conclusively, so far as the general public is concerned, including all interests of the plaintiffs common to the general public, that the anticipated disturbances were needful. But the disturbances mentioned in the Constitution are, in our judgment, disturbances of property sought to be taken, or, at least, property of the same owner out of which that desired is to be carved. We do not think the clause in question was intended to require the prior assessment and payment of probable damages for disturbances to take place in the future of an easement connected with the property of a party, no part of which is taken near or adjacent to the land condemned." The court then refers to the decisions of the supreme court of Illinois construing a provision of the Constitution of Illinois similar to that of Colorado, in which injunctive relief was denied. Steitson v. Chicago & E. R. Co. 75 Ill. 74; Patterson v. Chicago, D. & V. R. Co. 75 Ill. 588; Peoria & R. I. R. Co. v. Schertz, 84 Ill. 135. In the Schertz Case the court says: "In this case, as in that, it was contended that under that clause of § 13, art. 2, of the Constitution which provides, 'Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation,'—all abutting landowners are entitled to have such consequential damages as they may sustain assessed and paid, before a railroad company can acquire any right to put down and operate a track in a public street, and that putting it down without such assessment and payment is a violation of law. But in our former decision it was distinctly ruled, such company was not bound to make compensation for consequential or expected damages that might result to others previous to entering upon its own land, or lands of others not complaining, to do work it has a lawful right to do under powers conferred by its charter." These principles were fully sustained and reiterated in the later case of Parker v. Catholic Bishop, 146 Ill. 158, 34 N. E. 473. In a most elaborate and thoroughly considered decision, the supreme court of West Virginia gave the same construction to this constitutional provision. 67 L. R. A.

Spencer v. Pt. Pleasant & O. River R. Co. 23 W. Va. 406. See also Lorie v. North Chicago City R. Co. 32 Fed. 270. In nearly all of these cases it is held that the remedy is by action at law.

In our opinion, the Colorado, Illinois, West Virginia, and Louisiana courts correctly construe this § 21 of article 2 of our Constitution, which is found in the Constitutions of those states in practically the same words as in ours, and in holding that where the property of the citizen is not taken, and his proprietary rights not disturbed, but the damage to his property is purely consequential, he is not entitled to have the same ascertained and paid before the proposed public work is done, and is not entitled to have the work done in pursuance of valid legislative and municipal authority enjoined until his damages are ascertained and paid; but that his remedy is one at law for damages. Having reached this conclusion, we hold that, whether plaintiff was an abutting owner or not, he was not entitled to have the improvements which were being made pursuant to an ordinance of the city, and clearly within its charter powers, enjoined; that plaintiff has not brought himself within any recognized head of equity jurisdiction, and, if he has any cause of action, it is against the city for damages. It becomes unnecessary for us to determine other propositions urged by counsel.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed with directions to dissolve the injunction and dismiss the bill.

All concur.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

CANAL COMMISSIONERS OF THE ILLI-

(212 Ill. 456.)

1. Canal commissioners who have contracted for the right to take water from a river to supply the canal in consideration of permitting the riparian owner to take a certain quantity of water from the feeder, and who have subsequently leased to another person all the surplus after the rights of the riparian owner are satisfied, may take steps to enforce a judgment in an action between its lessee and the riparian owner or his representatives for the determination of the respective rights of the parties under a contract, by placing weirs so as to limit the amount which can be taken from the feeder by the riparian owner to the amount awarded him by the judgment.

2. Canal commissioners who have contracted to permit a riparian owner to take water from its feeder in consideration of the right to take the water of the river to supply their canal, will not be permitted to place weirs intended to restrict him to the quantity to which he is entitled, in such a manner as to deprive him of a portion of the water to which he is entitled under his contract.
3. Maintenance for nearly fifty years, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the canal commissioners, of flumes to take water from a canal feeder,

I. Form; estate created.

A water power which may be the subject of a grant may consist of the physical thing which constitutes the natural formation of the power, or it may be merely a portion of an artificially accumulated body of water. In the former case the water power is real estate and all the formalities must be observed which are necessary to convey that species of property. In the latter form the power may be treated as personalty and rights in it conferred by parol.

The form which the grant of a water power must take will depend largely upon the estate which is intended to be created by it. The general question of how far water rights are included in a transfer of a mill is treated in a note to Cox v. Howell (Tenn.) 58 L. R. A. 457. 67 L. R. A.

No easement or permanent right can be acquired in a dam or water course by parol agreement. Weare v. Chase, 98 Me. 264, 44 Atl. 900.

But valid contracts as to the use of power already created can be made by parol.

Thus, the right to use power created by an accumulation of water above a dam in a navigable stream may be granted by parol, since, riparian ownership not extending to the soil under such stream, the water is not a part of the real estate of the owner, but is in the nature of personal property. Johnston v. Bowersock, 62 Kan. 148, 61 Pac. 740.

So, an agreement regarding the rebuilding of a dam, whereby a deed conferring water privileges is altered, is not within the statute of frauds. Jackson v. Litch, 62 Pa. 451.

And even though an agreement by a grantee to put a spout in a ditch on his land for the purpose of permitting the grantor to draw water therefrom, arising by implication from his acceptance of a deed reserving such right, be considered as within the statute of frauds, the delivery of the deed by the grantor constitutes a part performance taking the agreement out of the statute. Randall v. Latham, 36 Conn. 48.

A parol grant of the right to flow land given in connection with a conveyance of a mill site has been sustained after the structure was completed, in Newcomb v. Royce, 42 Neb. 323, 60 N. W. 552, and Johnson v. Sherman County Irrig. W. P. & I. Co. (Neb.) 98 N. W. 1099, on the theory of executed license. The fact that the license was given in connection with a sale of land may have furnished a consideration for it so that it could be enforced in equity. But the principle of those cases cannot be relied upon to perpetuate parol conveyances of water power generally. See note to Pifer v. Brown, 49 L. R. A. 497.

A mere relinquishment to the trustees of a municipality by the owners of mill property, of the right to use a portion of the slack water above their dam, is not a right or interest of such a nature as could be conferred only by a duly executed and acknowledged instrument or deed of conveyance; but a written contract therefor for a valuable consideration is sufficient. Fremont v. June, 8 Ohio C. C. 124.

The right to the perpetual use of water need not be dependent upon the ownership of a particular estate with which it is connected, but under a contract by which the commissioners granted the right to take it, the bottoms of which are level with the bottom of the feeder, so that whenever the grantee was entitled to take water he would receive it under a head, is a practical construction of the rights of the parties which will prevent the commissioners from subsequently placing weirs in the flumes so that no water can be received until it has reached a certain height in the feeder.

4. Under a contract giving the right to withdraw a certain quantity of water from a canal feeder, with the proviso that the water shall not be drawn so that "during the season of navigation" the water in the canal shall be reduced to less than a specified depth, the canal commissioners have no right to place weirs in the flumes by which the water is taken from the feeder, so as to maintain the water in the feeder, at all times, of a depth requisite to maintain the specified depth in the canal, even after the close of navigation, and at times when water from the feeder is not necessary to maintain the specified depth in the canal.

Mr. Lester H. Strawn, for appellees:

The estoppel of a judgment covers the

it may be held separate and distinct from ownership in other lands. Columbia Water Power Co. v. Columbia Electric Street R. Light & P. Co. 43 S. C. 154, 20 S. E. 1002.

A deed of a certain piece of land, actually described as "a right of drawing water from a dam" for the purpose of furnishing power to a tannery, containing neither courses and distances nor metes and bounds, is a grant of an easement only. Trudeau v. Field, 69 Vt. 446, 38 Atl. 162.

A written contract by which one party was granted the right to use and improve a milldam and race upon condition that he build and put into operation a gristmill, and that if he, or they who might hold under him, should fail to put such mill into operation, or should fail to maintain the same, then the privileges granted should revert to the grantors, which contract was executed concurrently with the execution of a deed by one of the grantors to a mill and mill site to the same person, including a dam near where the new dam was to be built, to which the written contract refers, and which was expressly given for the purpose of enabling the grantor in that conveyance to accomplish the objects for which the conveyance was made, and of enabling the grantee to enjoy fully the rights thus conveyed,—conveyed a fee simple title to the water-privileges, which passes to the grantee's heirs. Wickersham v. Bills, 8 Ind. 387.

The objection to parol arrangements with regard to the use of water is that they are not binding on assignees of the respective parties.

Where there is an oral understanding between the owner of a dam and another who owns a dam which was constructed first farther down the stream, that if the upper dam, above which the water is diverted from the stream, affects the lower dam owner to his injury, the water will be restored, such parol understanding does not pass any rights to a subsequent owner of the lower dam who has no notice of the parol agreement, and who buys with knowledge of the existence of the upper dam and the diversion of the water. Cape v. Thompson, 21 Tex. Civ. App. 681, 53 S. W. 368.

A reservation, in a deed to land on which was a mill and milldam, of "the right to keep up and maintain the milldam at its present height so as not to back the water on the wheels of the mill" of a designated party above, which reservation extended through all the subsequent conveyances to the present owner, being one that the grantor, as the former owner of both mills, had a right to make, and that was for the benefit of the upper mill owner, to whom he had formerly conveyed,—inures, and extends to the benefit of such owner's grantees, and gives them a right of action for damages resulting from a breach of the limitation. Williamson v. Yingling, 80 Ind. 379.

A reservation in a deed, "provided, nevertheless, that nothing above mentioned shall be so construed as to injure the privilege heretofore enjoyed with regard to raising water for the benefit of my saw-mill," reserves the whole interest of the grantor in the mill pond, and not merely a life estate; and such interest will pass by a devise of land "together with the rights appurtenant to the same mill privileges," etc. Burr v. Mills, 21 Wend. 290.

A deed of land "excepting and reserving" to the grantor the "right and privilege" of free watering places for his convenience, reserves to the grantor a mere easement, and passes to the grantee the fee in the land subject to the right and privilege of using the watering places for all the purposes intended by the conveyance. Smith v. Cornell University, 21 Misc. 220, 45 N. Y. Supp. 640.

A reservation in a grant of a mill privilege for one half of it to certain, named persons, without words of inheritance, until it shall run down, will reserve a life estate only. Curtis v. Gardner, 13 Met. 457.

A covenant in a deed of a water power, that it shall be enjoyed so long as it is needed for machinery and no longer, will not limit the granted powers to the grantee, his heirs, executors, and assigns forever. Jewett v. Jewett, 16 Barb. 150.

A right of election existing in a grantor reserving to himself, by way of exception from a grant of land bordering on a river an acre of land and the right to build a dam against any point of the conveyed premises, together with flowage rights, but who does not fix in his conveyance as to where the acre and the dam shall be located, continues to his heirs or successors in title, when the grantor fails to exercise the right himself. Smith v. Furbish, 68 N. H. 123, 47 L. R. A. 226, 44 Atl. 398.

A grant of a mill site and appurtenant water rights, to continue so long as the grantee occupies said privilege with mills, grants an ea-whole matter in dispute in the cause in which it is rendered, and goes to every point decided between the parties in the course of the proceedings which lead to the judgment.

The judgment itself operates as a bar, and the decision of a particular issue as an estoppel.

But a grant of the right to take water from the grantor's aqueduct for the use of the grantee does not convey an assignable interest, where no words of inheritance are used, and the intent to convey an assignable interest is not apparent. Wilder v. Wheeler, 60 N. H. 351.

A right to erect a dam on a designated river is not a personal privilege, but is appurtenant to the land, and will pass with a conveyance thereof, where the grant by the designation of the lands on which the dam may be erected makes the ownership of such lands essential to its operativeness. Jones v. Pettibone, 2 Wis. 308.

A right of flowage over granted lands, reserved in the deed as a mill privilege for the benefit of a mill to be operated on the grantor's remaining land on the other side of the river, is deemed to be a right appurtenant to such remaining land, and not merely an easement in gross in the grantor. Smith v. Furbish, 68 N. H. 123, 47 L. R. A. 226, 44 Atl. 398.

A grant of lots and of the perpetual right to draw from the pond through the head race "on" the north end of said lots, and use a specified quantity of water, conveys an easement appurtenant to the land, and not in gross, and therefore taxable as part thereof,—especially where the grant covenants for the payment by the grantees of a portion of the expense of maintaining the dam and race, and gives the right to enter on such lands and into any buildings which may be constructed thereon, and to shut off "from said lands" all of such water, until their pro rata payment is made, and declares all water gates constructed "on such lands" to be the property of the grantors, their heirs and assigns; and the character of such easement, or the rule of taxation in respect thereto, is not changed by the fact that the lots are unimproved, and that the head race is not constructed or excavated to them. Spensley v. Valentine, 34 Wis. 154.

A company authorized to draw water from a river, and owning the raceway to land upon which it is conducted, has a right to use the water flowing therein as an incident to the ownership of the land; and neither the grant of the water, nor the right to receive and demand it, is a franchise so that it will pass by a mort-

Under a deed reserving to the grantor the privilege of drawing water from the grantee's ditch, for the accommodation of the grantor's mill, and providing that the grantee keep a spout 10 inches square at the bottom of said ditch, to which the grantor shall have access for the purpose of drawing said water, it was held that the right to compel the grantee to put in the spout was not a mere unassignable chose in action, but it constituted an equitable easement which passed under a conveyance of the mill property expressly conveying the rights and privileges reserved in said deed. Randall v. Latham, 36 Conn. 48.

It was further held that the right was not a mere personal license to the grantor, but was appurtenant to the mill and passed under a conveyance of the mill property. Randall v. Latham, 36 Conn. 48.

Under a clause in a deed whereby the owner of land and water rights on a river conveyed part of the premises, to the effect that the grantor reserves the right of entering on said land for the purpose of erecting a dam and drawing water therefrom, if it amounted to a reservation, the privilege reserved became attached to the estate retained by the grantor, and not to him personally, and passed to his grantees of the remaining land. Hickox v. Parmelee, 21 Conn. 87.

Where the owners of two pieces of land and a mill pond conveyed the upper piece together with one-half interest in the mill pond, reserving to themselves the right to take the water from the pond in a particular manner for the use of the shop located on the lower piece, although without words of inheritance or mentioning their assigns, the reservation was not personal, but passed to their grantees. Kennedy v. Scovill, 12 Conn. 317.

The grant of the right to build a dam across a stream and raise water to a specified height attaches as an incident, and becomes appurtenant to that tract of land of the grantee to which water is thereby conducted through a race for mill purposes, and to the enjoyment of which it is essential, so as to be subject to the lien of a judgment on such land and pass on a sale thereof under such judgment, although not specifically named in the levy. *Morgan v. Boggs, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellees the canal commissioners of the Illinois & Michigan Canal of the state of Illinois and the appellee the Ottawa Hydraulic Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Illinois, filed this, their bill in chancery, praying for an injunction restraining the appellants Louis W. Merrifield and George Galloway, his employee, and other persons and corporations,

Under a statute incorporating a board of trustees of a canal, and empowering the state to release to it a canal and the property held therewith, and directing the trustees to complete the canal and furnish to the state, free of charge, 500 horse power of water power, the right of the state to the use of the power to be absolute, the state acquires the right to such water power, separate and distinct from ownership in any particular lands to which it might be appurtenant, it constituting a right of profit à prendre; and a contract by the state leasing or conveying the same for a term of years at an annual rental is valid. Columbia Water Power Co. v. Columbia Electric Street R. Light & P. Co. 43 S. C. 154, 20 S. E. 1002.

II. Successive and conflicting grants.

When the power created by a particular dam is more than sufficient to operate a single mill or factory, rights are frequently granted to other persons to draw power from the dam. In such cases the rights of the respective grantees will depend on their deeds if, as is usually the case, they are defined thereby. If the rights are not defined, the grantees are entitled to priority to the extent of their respective rights in the order of the grants. The first grantee acquires the first right, and the grantor, unless he has expressly reserved his own rights, will be compelled to obtain them from the power remaining after all the grants are satisfied.

There can be no doubt that the owner of a water privilege may grant rights to another, or to several parties, to use the water proportionately, by measurement, through sluiceways of certain dimensions, for certain specified machinery, and may grant to one subject to the prior rights of another, or, generally, under such conditions as he may see fit to prescribe. And it is equally beyond question that he may bind his estate to the maintenance of such an easement as he may have granted to another. Matteson v. Wilbur, 11 R. I. 545.

One in possession of mills and appurtenant water rights under a grant from a town upon certain conditions, so long as such conditions are complied with, may apportion the title and privileges he holds to others in any manner he chooses, with or without preferences among his grantees, and, upon breach of any conditions thereby, the town alone can object. Dewey v. Williams, 40 N. H. 222, 77 Am. Dec. 708.

from removing weirs which the canal commissioners had placed, or were about to place, in certain flumes which had been constructed for the purpose of conveying water from the Fox river feeder of the Illinois & Michigan canal to certain industries operated by the defendants to the bill. The bill was dismissed as to all the defendants thereto except the defendants Merrifield and Galloway. A hearing on bill, answer, replication, and proof resulted in a decree restraining the appellants substantially in accordance with the prayer of the bill. This is an appeal perfected to reverse the decree.

In 1838 the board of commissioners of the Illinois & Michigan Canal were about to enter upon the work of constructing a "feeder"

A conveyance of an indefinite amount of the water of a river leaves the amount to be determined by the conditions prevailing at the time the grant is made and the interpretation of the parties as evidenced by the amount of water used under such grant, and the several grants must be satisfied in the order of their priority, and cannot be impinged upon by subsequent grants. Dexter v. Jefferson Paper Co. 22 Misc. 389, 50 N. Y. Supp. 557.

Where it is provided in conveyances of water power that a particular owner is entitled to priority over others, that fairly and reasonably implies that he is entitled to a head of water sufficient to enable him to make a practical, beneficial use of the amount to which he is entitled, and the continued use thereof by other parties subsequent in right, when the pond gets low, so as to deprive him of his right, is a wrongful diversion of this water for which they are liable in an action for damages. Samuels v. Blanchard, 25 Wis. 329.

One who has granted a water right to another cannot afterwards assert his riparian rights when they would conflict with those previously granted by him. Fowler v. Kent (N. H.) 52 Atl. 554.

A water grant reciting its purpose to be the carrying on of a clothier's business where the grantor lives, and conveying a right to take from his gristmill pond enough water to run a fulling mill and shears, reserving sufficient for the gristmill when the supply is scanty, with habendum to the grantee and his heirs and assigns, so long as he or they shall carry on the clothier's business at or near the same place and bear a sixth of the expense of repairing the dam and flume, does not make the grantor and grantee tenants in common. Shed v. Leslie, 22 Vt. 498.

Under a grant of sufficient of a water power to run two millstones, without reservation, and a subsequent grant, subject to the former one, of sufficient of the power to propel five run of stone, to be used upon an equality of right with three other run of stone to be used by the grantor, the rights, under the first grant, of two run, are to be first satisfied, and the grantee can do nothing to interfere therewith, and the grantor cannot use more than his proportional part of the three-run power until the machinery of the grantee is fully supplied to the extent of the rights granted to him; and the grantor cannot, by running his mill at night, by which to convey water from Fox river southwardly from a point near the village of Dayton, on said Fox river, to the main channel of the canal at Ottawa, a distance of about 4 miles. John Green and William Stadden then owned the east half of section 29, town 34 north, range 4 east of the third principal meridian, at Dayton. This tract of land formed the west shore line of Fox river at the point where it was determined to begin the construction of the feeder to receive the water from said river. Said Green and Stadden, on the 5th day of June, 1838, executed an instrument in writing authorizing the canal commissioners to enter upon their premises and proceed to the construction of a dam and lock and other necessary structures in that part of the bed of Fox river to which the riparian rights of Green and Stadden extended, and also to construct a "channel" on the said land for the purpose of receiving the water to be taken from the river, and conveying the same from thence to, and discharging it in, the Illinois & Michigan Canal at a point some 4 miles below. The instrument reads as follows:

Whereas the board of commissioners of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, in surveying different routes for a navigable feeder from the best practical point on Fox river to the Illinois & Michigan Canal at the town of Ottawa, and such basins of lateral canals connecting the Illinois river with said canal at that point as in their opinion will most enhance the value of the property of the deprive the grantee of his portion of the water in the daytime. Seneca Woolen Mills v. Tillman, 2 Barb. Ch. 9.

Those deriving water rights from a grantor who first granted to the owner of the site on the other side of the stream a preference in all cases where there was not sufficient water for both will only have a right to such water as is not required by the first grantee, as stipulated in his grant. Jordan v. Mayo, 41 Me. 552.

A grantee of the surplus water of a mill pond after a mill is supplied is bound to take notice of wants of the other mill and shut his gate when there is an insufficiency of water; but in case the owner of the other mill undertakes to regulate the flow of the water he is bound to permit water to flow to the second mill as soon as the supply is sufficient for both. Sumner v. Foster, 7 Pick. 32.

But the rule that a grantee of water power must take subject to the rights of prior grantees on the same reservoir, so that in case the supply is insufficient his contract will not be specifically enforced, is not applicable to the case of an artificial channel which can be indefinitely enlarged so as to be capable of supplying the power called for by the later contract. Conant v. Bel-lows Falls C. Co. 29 Vt. 263.

A grant having been made to a canal corporation of a right to erect dams in a navigable river, a subsequent grant of a right to erect a dam and mill on the same stream is subordinate thereto, and damages cannot be recovered for the exercise of the prior franchise. Union Canal Co. v. Landis, 9 Watts, 228.

Where the owner of a water power leases to one the right to draw water for two wheels of a certain description, and to another the right to draw for one, and at times there is not enough water for both, the lease which was given first has, by law, the priority in the use of water, and the lessee under the later lease can claim the surplus only after the other has been supplied. Ranlet v. Cook, 44 N. H. 512, 84 Am. Dec. 92.

The last grantee of one who, owning a mill-pond, dam, and mills on both sides of a stream, conveys the property on one side with the first right to draw water from the pond, and subject to repair and rebuild the dam when necessary, reserving only the right to take water for the other mill without damaging the first mill when there shall be a scarcity, is not entitled, on the raising of the dam 6 inches, by the dominant 67 L. R. A.

owner, to use water for the servient mill until the level of the pond falls to the original height of the dam, for the first grantee's privileges are primary and exclusive. Wilder v. Bennett, 30 Vt. 670.

A grant of a certain amount of water to one party with the remainder to another would not, upon the first grantee's omission to make use of his share, give the second grantee a right to its use. Fowler v. Kent (N. H.) 52 Atl. 554.

But where the owners of a stream granted seven eighths of the privilege of the stream to the proprietors of a sawmill, to continue as long as the sawmill was kept in repair, reserving to themselves sufficient water to carry their fulling mill four days in a week, and subsequently made another grant of a right to erect a slitting mill upon the same stream, with the same reservation to themselves, and providing that such grant was not to prejudice the sawmill, the subsequent extinguishment of the right of the sawmill by its being suffered to go to decay inures to, and enlarges, the right of the subsequent grantee. Rowe v. Stoddard, 1 Root, 447.

Where a grantor owns two mills on the same bank of a mill privilege, and grants the upper with the stipulation that only such an amount of water shall be taken from the privilege as will not impede the speed and usefulness of the lower mill, the grantee must treat the flume leading past his property to the lower mill as appurtenant to the lower mill exclusively, unless it becomes necessary to take water therefrom for the use of his machinery which he has a right to operate, or unless it can be so taken without being practically detrimental to the lower mill. Hammond v. Woodman, 41 Me. 177, 66 Am. Dec. 219.

A grantor may repair or rebuild, and forbid grantee's use of, a flume which leads from a dam down past grantee's mill to his own lower mill, having reserved in his grant of the upper mill with appurtenant water privileges the right at all times to take and use water sufficient to drive his lower mill, it being shown that grantee is not dependent upon that flume for the reasonable enjoyment of his grant. Ibid.

After a grant of a privilege of drawing water from a milldam for certain purposes when the water is not needed for grantor's mill, grantor will be limited to the use of the same quantity of water as he was using at the time of the state, pursuant to an act entitled "An Act to Amend an Act Entitled 'An Act for the Construction of the Illinois & Michigan Canal,' approved January 9, 1836," have surveyed one route passing over the lands and premises of the subscribers:

Now, therefore, we, the subscribers, for the purposes of encouraging the construction of said feeder, as also said canal, and also for the application of water to manufacturing purposes for the use of the state, or any person claiming, by purchase or otherwise, under the state, and as an inducement for determining on such route and location for said feeder and basins as will pass over or otherwise benefit our lands and premises, do hereby fully and absolutely release, acquit, and discharge the people of the state of Illinois and the board of commissioners of said canal of and from all damages which we may sustain or might claim in consequence of the construction of the feeder and basins, or their or either of their fixtures and appendages, of whatsoever kind, at, on, over, or through our lands and premises, and of and from all claims and demands for or on account of any lands, waters, or streams that may be entered upon, taken, or appropriated for the construction and use of the said feeder and basins and their fixtures and appendages: Provided, however, that these presents be understood with this limitation, vis.: That the subscribers forbear to relinquish, and hereby reserve to themselves, whatever claim or right they may have acquired to one fourth part of the water that grant, as otherwise the grantee might be deprived of that for which he contracted. Davis v. Muncey, 38 Me. 90.

The purchaser of milling property together with the water power appurtenant thereto may extend an end of the dam higher up the stream after its destruction by flood, where rendered necessary by the washing away of the bank at that end, and may increase the height of the dam sufficiently to supply the water necessary to operate the mill according to its capacity at the time of the grant, as against grantees of the remainder of the grantor's property on both sides of the mill race and dam upon which, by the creation of the mill site, the grantor had imposed a burden in favor of the latter premises, which passed with the grant thereof, and subject to which the grantees of the remaining property necessarily took. Riverdale Park Co. v. Westcott, 74 Md. 311, 22 Atl. 270.

When the owner of a mill privilege with three mills thereon grants the first mill with a limited amount of power to be taken after his gristmill is supplied, and then grants the gristmill with the amount of power then used, a subsequent grantee of the third mill will be entitled to only that power remaining after the prior granted mills receive their stipulated amounts. Klaer v. Ridgway, 86 Pa. 529.

A grant of a lot upon one shore of a river divided into two branches by an island, and a certain amount of the water power of such river, entitles the grantee to such amount of water from that pertaining to the shore on which such lot is situated; and, if such water is insufficient because of prior grants from the same grantor, then from the water pertaining to the island, also owned by such grantor. Dexter v. Jefferson Paper Co. 22 Misc. 389, 50 N. Y. Supp. 557.

Where the owner of two mill sites situate on a stream of water conveyed the upper one and one half of a pond flowed by a dam, with a reservation that the grantor was to have and retain the privilege of conveying water from said dam in a prescribed method until the same should arrive at the upper mill and thence on to the lower mill, for its necessary accommodation and use, it was held that no prior right was reserved to the grantor, but that the grantee was to have one half the water, and the grantor the other half with the privilege of carrying that half across the premises granted to the lower mill. Scovill v. Kennedy, 14 Conn. 349.

A provision in a deed of premises and the water rights appurtenant thereto, that the grant of the water right is subject to the right of the grantor and his legal representatives at all times to draw from the dam an amount of water corresponding in extent to a water right appertaining to other property of the grantor whose right was originally subordinate to that granted by the deed, will be construed as intending merely to prevent any possibility of embarrassment of the grantor in his ownership of the subordinate right, and not to change the original order of the rights, where the deed provides that the grantee shall have the right to the use of the water in operating the factory upon the premises as fully and amply as the same is now employed by the grantor. Dexter Sulphite Pulp & Paper Co. v. Frontenac Paper Co. 20 Misc. 442, 46 N. Y. Supp. 363.

A deed conveying a factory site together with an undivided eighth of the land flowed and subject to flowage, and further providing that, if the eighth of the water power intended to be conveyed does not amount to a specified number of inches, the grantee shall be entitled to use enough water to make up such amount, subject to the grantor's right to use first a sufficient quantity to drive four run of millstones, does not entitle the grantor to use the entire power for his mill if necessary to operate the four run of stone, but conveys absolutely to the grantee one eighth of the land subject to flowage, including the water thereon, together with the qualified right to additional power if not needed by the grantor. Emery v. Three Rivers, 78 Mich. 438, 44 N. W. 401.

A deed conveying land on one side of a stream, together with one half the water power of a dam, to be drawn or taken from any point between the bank and the center of the stream, passes the right to the use of the momentum of water in its passage, and not a given quantity of water, and the grantor's right to the use of the other half of such water power is necessarily restricted to the opposite half of the stream; and therefore the grantee will have the undisputed control of the use of the water which has passed through a sluiceway from the main dam into a lower dam or pond constructed by him from a slough on his side of an island, at the head of which the main dam is located, inasmuch as the water, when it reaches this pond, has passed beyond any point where it can be used as motive power on the op-may flow in the Fox river, diminished as that quantity may chance to be, in the just measure of its proportion, by the leakage, evaporation, etc., necessarily incident to such good and workmanlike dam and lock structures as shall be deemed requisite for the said feeder and basins and useful to the state and after the necessary quantity has been drawn out for the purpose of the navigation of said canal, but agreeing that, in the application or use of said fourth part aforesaid, the same shall be drawn out of said feeder, within $\frac{1}{4}$ of 1 mile from the head of the guard lock, according as and in the manner to be directed by said commissioners or other authorized agents. This reservation being subject to the farther limitation that it shall not at any time authorize the subscribers, even within the quantity of said proportion, to reduce the water of the said Illinois & Michigan Canal during the season of navigation below the depth of 6 feet, which, only, shall be done by the permission of some authorized agent of the state. They, the said subscribers hereby relinquishing to the people of the state of Illinois, for the reasons and purposes assigned, as aforesaid, all and whatever right and claim they may have to the residue and all other portions or portion of the waters of the said Fox river beyond and above the one-fourth reserve as aforesaid, and they do hereby acquit and discharge the people of the said state of Illinois and the board of commissioners of the said canal from all liability whatsoever for the constant use posite side of the main channel of the stream; and such grantor can, at most, but object that, by the enlargement of the sluiceways, more water is drawn into this pond than his grant authorized; and a subsequent sale by him of the right to draw more than one half of the water into such pond, since it cannot be a sale of the water of the river or its momentum, which he can only use on his own side of the stream, can amount only to an estoppel of his right to use the momentum of so much water, leaving the water, after passing into the lower pond, to be used in accordance with the rights of those entitled, by grants from the original grantee, to share with him in such power. Batavia Mfg. Co. v. Newton Wagon Co. 91 Ill. 230.

An increase of water power created by the enlargement of a dam belongs to all the owners of water power in proportion to their respective interests, and not to the original owners of the dam or their successors in interest, where such owners sold all the water the dam would afford, except what they reserved for their own use, exacted covenants from the various purchasers for the repair and maintenance of the dam, both the owners of sold water and reserved water have in every way treated each other as owners of the dam and all its power, and the improvement of the dam has been paid for by assessments upon all the owners of water in proportion to their respective interests, although the deeds conveyed but a given number of square inches of water at a certain head, or water sufficient under any greater head to be equivalent in power. Janesville Cotton Mills v. Ford, 82 Wis. 416, 17 L. R. A. 564, 52 N. W. 764.

Grantees of a residue of a water power who join a voluntary association formed for keeping up the power, and pay assessments on the interest granted to them, will be estopped from claiming that the conveyance of the prior interest was void as an attempted severance of an appurtenance from the land to which it was attached, both by the deeds of their grantors, in whose position they stand, and by their conduct with reference to the association. Forrest Mill Co. v. Cedar Falls Mill Co. 103 Iowa, 619, 72 N. W. 1076.

A reservation by the original owner of mills located on both sides of a dam and having water privileges in common, in his deed to joint grantees, of half of that mill which, by private partition, was later made servient to the other in the matter of water power, is no answer to 67 L. R. A.

the complaint by the subsequent owner of the dominant privilege, that the water has been unlawfully diverted, when it is not shown that the reserved rights vested in the defendant. Rogers v. Bancroft, 20 Vt. 250.

On the determination of the water rights of two mill owners who claim through a common grantor, evidence of the manner in which such water rights had been exercised between the grantor and his immediate grantee is admissible as defining the water rights of each as they understood them, and not as tending to vary the terms of a written instrument. Fuller v. Daniels, 63 N. H. 395.

III. What rights conveyed.

a. By general grant.

1. In general.

As in case of other grants the question of the effect of a grant of water power will be determined chiefly from the intention of the parties so far as that can be ascertained. If the conveyance is of a parcel of land containing the water power, or of the right to use water to create a power, or of a portion of an already accumulated store, the solution of the question what is conveyed usually is plain. So if a particular tract of land or mill to which a water power is appurtenant is conveyed the power will be held to be included in the grant.

In construing a grant of a water right, the situation and circumstances of the parties may be considered. Strong v. Benedict, 5 Conn. 210.

A grant from the state of water rights will be construed the same as a similar agreement between natural persons, although the remedy for its breach may not be the same. Com. ex rel. Cass v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 51 Pa. 351.

Where tenants in common owning mills served from the same dam simultaneously execute partition deeds of their joint lands and appurtenant water rights, the conveyances are to be construed together as one instrument, and a limitation of the use of water contained in one, the other being silent in respect thereto, is binding upon both parties and their successors in interest. Rogers v. Bancroft, 20 Vt. 250.

The right of each party to the conveyance must be exercised so as not to interfere any further than possible with those of the other party.

A grant of a right to draw water as shall and exercise of the rights and powers herein declared: Provided, if the board of commissioners shall alter or change the dimensions of said feeder as now located, the said board are to pay to said subscribers, or either of them, such damages as they may sustain in consequence of said change.

In witness whereof we hereunto set our hands and seals this 5th day of June, in the year of our Lord, 1838.

John Green. [Seal.]

William Stadden. [Seal.]

Signed, sealed, and delivered in presence of Giles Spring and James Turney.

A dam was constructed by the commissioners across Fox river at this point; also a lock at the dam on the premises of said

Green and Stadden on the west side of the river; and the commissioners also dug the feeder from the lock to the outlet thereof in the canal at Ottawa. The feeder was, when constructed, a channel of the width of 60 feet at the top and 40 feet at the bottom, and was capable of conveying water to the depth of 5 feet a portion of the way and 4 feet the remainder of its length. Four flumes were by the commissioners put in the banks of the feeder within the limits of the Green and Stadden land for the purpose of receiving water for power uses reserved by said Green and Stadden. These flumes were constructed in 1838 or 1839, and remain in practically the same condition to this day. The water power reserved by Green and Stadden by proper assignments best convenience grantee must be exercised in a reasonable manner, and so as not, by wantonness or negligence, unnecessarily to injure the grantor. Raler v. Beaman, 49 Me. 207.

A grantee of water power from a canal has no right to use more than the amount stated in his deed, under the claim that the canal has a greater capacity than was estimated. Powers v. Perkins (Mich.) 9 Det. L. N. 516, 92 N. W. 790.

A grantee of water power is not entitled to use more power than his deed grants him, where the power of an artificial canal is divided into two classes, the grantees of first-class runs being entitled to be supplied first, under the claim that he has the right to use all power of both classes which has been granted to him so long as all the first-class runs have not been conveyed. Ibid.

When a deed of a mill site and privilege includes a provision that grantee shall leave a place in the race to pass off as much waste water as he, in his discretion, may think proper, grantee cannot arbitrarily or capriciously deprive grantor of the beneficial use of the waste water which was undoubtedly contemplated at, and has been enjoyed since, the time of the grant. Paschall v. Passmore, 15 Pa. 295.

Purchasers of a manufactory with all water rights appurtenant thereto cannot be restricted by the grantor to the returning of water to the stream at a point where the land conveyed is situated on both sides of the stream, where it is so situated for but a short distance below the dam, so that to compel such a return would render the water power of little value, and at the time of the purchase it is returned lower down the stream at a point where the premises conveyed were located on one side only, opposite other lands of the grantors. Ely v. Stewart, 2 Md. 408.

A grant of the right of commanding and conducting water from a pond for the use of mills through any gates that may be erected, whenever the same may be necessary for the use of the mill privilege, gives no right to require the grantor to open the gates for the benefit of the mill, but merely a right to the grantee to open the gates whenever he finds it necessary to do so. Revere v. Leonard, 1 Mass. 90.

An agreement to convey land by the same description as used in former deeds will not imply that the parties intended to include a right, 67 L. R. A.

as the right to have water flow to a mill which passed under such deeds, not by force of special mention, but by virtue of its then appertaining to the land, and which both parties know has since been extinguished. Smith v. Thayer, 155 Mass. 48, 28 N. E. 1131.

Reference to a prior deed for a description of a water right conveyed will limit the extent of the right to that described in that deed, and it cannot be measured by the use to which the grantor has put it. Perry v. Binney, 103 Mass. 156.

Purchasers for a nominal consideration of lots between a stream and a canal cut under the authority of the legislature for the improvement of navigation and for the purpose of securing hydraulic power from the surplus water by means of a dam constructed at the head of the canal for that purpose, in whose conveyance there was no express grant of water power and whose lots as platted were not intended to extend to the canal, are not entitled to the use of the water power created thereby as appurtenant to their lots, and they are estopped from claiming such right and from claiming that leases thereof were taken by them by mistake as to their legal rights, where for many years they continued in possession and paid rent thereunder and permitted the lessor to make improvements at great expense. Lawson v. Mowry, 52 Wis. 219, 9 N. W. 280.

The grant of land on both sides of a stream, including mills, dams, and water rights, to one who, prior to that time, owned only a piece of land bounded by the margin of the stream and the right to draw water only for tanning purposes, extinguishes the limitations of the first grant, and thenceforward the grantee possesses all the common-law rights of a riparian proprietor having the right to the reasonable use of all the water of the stream, subject, only, to the rights of a lower proprietor. Rackliff v. Rackliff, 96 Me. 261, 52 Atl. 839.

The grant of so much of the waters of a stream as may be spared from a water power gives the implied right to erect such structures as may at any time be necessary for the purpose of diverting such waters to the purpose for which they were appropriated; such a right being indispensable to the enjoyment of the rights granted. Denton v. State, 72 App. Div. 248, 76 N. Y. Supp. 167.

The grant of a right to the waters of a spring for the use of a mill does not include the use came to be owned, at the time of filing this bill, as follows: Three parts thereof by the appellant Merrifield, three parts by the Standard Fire Brick Company, and two parts by the Columbia Straw Paper Company.

In 1852 the canal commissioners entered into a contract with the Ottawa Hydraulic Company, by which they purported to sell and lease to the Ottawa Hydraulic Company for a term of twenty years from the 1st day of May, 1852, so much of the water and water power furnished by the Fox river feeder to said canal as could be used, in the manner stated in said contract, by said Ottawa Hydraulic Company without interfering with an ample supply of water for said canal, and agreed that said Ottawa Hydraullic Company should have the privilege of using and subleasing the said water. At the expiration of this lease, in 1872, it was renewed for a further period of twenty years, and on the expiration of that term was again renewed for a third period of twenty years, thereby continuing the same in force until the 1st day of May, 1912.

On and before the 2d day of March, 1899, the appellant Merrifield had one of the flumes connected with a plant which he operated, for the purpose of generating electricity, and had another of the flumes connected with a tile factory owned by him, and drew water from the feeder through these two flumes for the purpose of operating the machinery at these respective plants. On said last-mentioned date the Ot-of it for domestic purposes at the private residence of the miller, who is the grantee. Woodring v. Hollenbach, 202 Pa. 65, 51 Atl. 318.

A grant of water power, made by a riparian owner who subsequently becomes the owner of an island in the river, gives the grantees no right to any water pertaining to such island, or to the opposite shore on the other branch of the river. Dexter v. Jefferson Paper Co. 22 Misc. 389, 50 N. Y. Supp. 557.

A partition deed executed between tenants in common, by which one of them acquires the premises on which a mill is situated, vests in the grantee the whole water power contained therein, unless restricted by the terms of the deed. Mandeville v. Comstock, 9 Mich. 536.

A grant of a parcel of land which contains "2 acres . . . and embraces all the mill privileges" on one side of a river, does not create any mill privileges appurtenant to the land, but only passes such water rights as are already appurtenant to the land conveyed. Pray v. Great Falls Mfg. Co. 38 N. H. 442.

A water right acquired by grant from an upper to a lower riparian owner on a natural stream will pass by the latter's deed of his property under the term "appurtenances." Hall v. Sterling Iron & R. Co. 148 N. Y. 432, 42 N. E. 1056.

A sale or conveyance of mill property, either voluntarily by the owner or by judicial process, will invest the purchaser with title to an appurtenant water power, race, and dam which are on state land, although they be not described or mentioned in the conveyance. Hoover v. Hale, 56 Neb. 67, 76 N. W. 457.

A grant of land with mills thereon, with a "privilege of flowage, use of water and repairing of dam, to have and to hold, with the privileges and appurtenances to the same belonging," merely enumerates the rights passing as incidents of the land and mills, and does not warrant or convey any more rights than would pass without such enumeration as appurtenant to the property conveyed. Sevey v. Jones, 43 N. H. 441.

The sale of land on a stream with mill privileges, with a prohibition to raise the water beyond a stipulated point, is not a guaranty of any quantity of water, or of sufficiency of water power for any particular use in machinery. The right to use the stream for mill purposes is restricted by the limit to the height of the dam, implied in the inhibition against the over-

A grant of a dam with all of the water power on grantor's land will not limit grantee to the use of but one dam. Nitzell v. Paschall, 8 Rawle, 76.

And the right given by an instrument apportioning the power created by waterworks, of erecting a new building and placing wheels and gates adapted to the action of such machinery, will give as an incident the right to make new flumes and openings into the reservoir for the purpose of drawing the quantity of water to which the party is entitled and applying it most beneficially to his works. Bardwell v. Ames, 22 Pick. 333.

A grant of a right to take water from an upper to a lower pond will not include the right to take it to a wheel below the lower pond. Johnson v. Jaqui, 25 N. J. Eq. 410.

A representation by a grantor that there will always remain sufficient water in the dam to furnish the quantity conveyed is not fraudulent, as it is merely the expression of an opinion. Nor can a representation that the supply furnished by the milldam is about three times that conveyed be considered fraudulent, where the grantees receive the quantity so conveyed, as they are not prejudiced thereby, and such representation is merely the expression of an opinion or estimate of the quantity discharged by the dam. Morrison v. Koch, 32 Wis. 254.

The reasonable implication from the grant of a surplus of the water power of a mill pond is that the grantor shall preserve a surplus or make reasonable efforts to that end, upon which the grant can take effect; and where such grantor permits water to escape through the dam because the same is out of repair, which by the exercise of reasonable care could be repaired, the loss must fall upon him, and cannot be charged against the grantee, where the former has the right to enter upon and keep the said dam in repair, which right does not exist in the latter; and especially as the latter is charged a certain proportion of the expense of keeping the same in repair. Batavia Mfg. Co. v. Newton Wagon Co. 91 Ill. 280.

Under a deed conveying certain flowage rights in general terms in order to effect the purposes of the grantee, stated in the recital of the deed, of obtaining a greater head of water by raising the grantee's old dam or building a new one higher than the old one, the tawa Hydraulic Company commenced an action of trespass on the case in the circuit court of La Salle county against the appellant Merrifield for the purpose of fixing the respective rights of the parties thereto in said water and water power furnished by said Fox river feeder, and for the purpose of determining whether said Merrifield was using more water than he was entitled to. In said suit such further proceedings were had that on or about the 1st day of February, 1901, this court, by its judgment rendered in said cause, found said defendant, Louis W. Merrifield, guilty, and entered a judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant for $1 and costs, only nominal damages being sought in said suit, which said judgment still remains in full force and effect.

grantee may build the dam in contemplation only at the site of the old one, and not at some other place. Woods v. Nashua Mfg. Co. 5 N. H. 467.

When a riparian proprietor reserves from a grant of land on his stream, to himself, "his heirs and assigns forever, the right to all the water power created by a dam on the premises of the present height of the rolling part of the dam now standing on the premises," he has the right to have all the water that would naturally come down the stream to the dam flow over it; and any substantial diversion by the grantee of water that had once got into the stream, and which, but for such diversion, would have flowed over the dam, will constitute an interference with grantor's rights. Whitney v. Fitchburg R. Co. 178 Mass. 559, 60 N. E. 384.

One who has granted another the right of using the water in a creek for mill purposes is not entitled to injunctive relief against a diversion of the water from a lake of which the creek is the outlet and a discharge of it into a neighboring river instead of the bed of the creek, where the grantor did not object until after the grantee had erected his mill, dug a race, and built a dam at large expense. Jacox v. Clark, Walk. Ch. (Mich.) 249.

The grantee of a right of using the power generated at a dam will also have such easement over grantor's land as will enable him to have full enjoyment of that right. Elliot v. Shepherd, 25 Me. 371.

A deed executed by the owners of the bed of a water-power canal to persons having an easement in the water power thereof appurtenant to mill lots owned by them, whereby the right was granted to them to make certain improvements upon the canal, which they, in connection with the grantors, had agreed with others to make, reserving to each grantor an interest equal to his right to water power, and providing that the rights should be enjoyed by the parties as tenants in common in proportion to the right of each to use the water power,—does not estop the grantors from asserting title to the bed against the grantees, each of the grantees being the owner of a mill lot as well as of an undivided interest in the bed as tenants in common in proportion to their respective rights to the water power. Nichols v. New England Furniture Co. 100 Mich. 230, 59 N. W. 155.

After the termination of this litigation between appellant Merrifield and the Ottawa Hydraulic Company, the canal commissioners installed in each of the flumes by means of which Merrifield was drawing water from the feeder a contrivance called a "weir," for the purpose of regulating the amount of water that should pass from the feeder through each of said flumes. The weir that was placed in the flume at the electrical power station was so constructed and installed as to give to said Merrifield all of the water power of said feeder which, in the opinion of the canal commissioners and according to the decision of the court in the trespass case brought against him by the hydraulic company, he was entitled to take, and the weir installed in the flume of the said Merrifield at his tile mill permitted him to use

2. Construction of grants.

There are many cases which depend so entirely upon the peculiar language of the instrument, or upon the special circumstances of the transaction, that little more can be done than to state the holding of the particular case, general rules being of little or no application.

A grant of a mill "to have the first privilege of water for running the same" purports to give as much water as is necessary, and not merely as much as is not subject to valid claims. Hapgood v. Brown, 102 Mass. 451.

A sale of land on one side of a river, including one half of the water power of the river controlled by a dam adjacent to such land, has reference only to the one half of the water power of the river on that side thereof adjacent to the land conveyed. Jobbins v. Gray, 34 Ill. App. 208.

Where a corporation, having, pursuant to statute, constructed a leat or water course for the purpose of supplying a town with water, conveyed certain mills situated on the leat, "together with the fourth part of and in the said close, and the leat or watercourse coming and going to all the said mills," the grantee did not take a one-fourth part of the leat, but merely became entitled to such amount of the water as remained after satisfying the public purposes. Atty. Gen. v. Plymouth, 9 Beav. 67, 15 L. J. Ch. N. S. 109.

Under a grant of a mill with "privilege of drawing water," grantee is entitled to draw water from grantor's head of water in that locality, even if it be in two reservoirs, except so far as he may interfere with rights previously granted. Elliot v. Shepherd, 25 Me. 371.

A grant of a privilege of drawing water from a river "to the full extent and capacity of the bulkhead now there" will limit the quantity to such as would pass through the existing structure, and such quantity after a lapse of time and change of conditions must be determined as one of fact. Appleton Paper & Pulp Co. v. Kimberly & C. Co. 100 Wis. 195, 75 N. W. 889.

Where the owner of two mills located on a watercourse covenanted to maintain a dam of sufficient height to turn the waste water into a wing dam of the covenantee, by waste water was meant all of the water remaining after the use of all which was reasonably necessary for the beneficial enjoyment of the mills as they

two thirds as much water as the weir in the flume at said electrical power station. Such division of the water was made at the request of said Merrifield, and upon his agreement not to use water through both flumes at the same time. The appellant Merrifield contended these weirs so obstructed the flow in the flumes as to deprive him at all times of a portion of the quantity of the water and of the "head" of water that he was entitled to receive under the Green and Stadden contract, and to deprive him at other times, when the stage of the water is low in the feeder, of all water whatever, and he and his coappellant, George Galloway, an employee of his, removed the weirs from the flumes. The canal commissioners notified said Merrifield and said Galloway that their action in removing said device was unlawful, and again put in said device in said flumes, and warned the said Merrifield and the said Galloway not to interfere with the same. Afterwards, in the night between the 10th and 11th days of March, 1901, the said Merrifield caused said device to be again destroyed and torn out, and the said Merrifield thereafter threatened that he would tear out and destroy any device or weir placed in his said flumes which would prevent him from using all the water he might need for his electrical power station. The canal commissioners replaced the weirs, and filed this, their bill to enjoin the removal of the same, and the decree appealed from granted the restraining order asked in the bill.

The appellant Merrifield contends that under the proper construction of the con-

then existed. Fowler v. Kent (N. H.) 52 Atl. 554.

A grant of the undivided half of a sufficiency of water to operate specified mills entitles the grantee to but one half of the entire quantity of water in the stream, and he has no right to draw a constant quantity unvaried by the fact of the diminution of the stream from natural causes. Dow v. Edes, 58 N. H. 193.

A grant of a portion of the powers created by a dam by the clause "to the capacity of the bulkhead now there" will not give a right to draw down the head so as to use the water in a wasteful way to the injury of the rights of other proprietors, although more power can be obtained from the particular flume by sacrificing volume to velocity of flow. Appleton Paper & Pulp Co. v. Kimberly & C. Co. 100 Wis. 195, 75 N. W. 889.

An agreement by adjoining landowners that one shall have a right to have all the water drawn by him from a canal feeder to run his mill flow over the land of the others, and that the latter shall have the right to have all the water drawn flow over his lands, will give them the right to all the water actually drawn, although the amount is in excess of what the former had a right to draw. Armstrong v. Poits, 23 N. J. Eq. 92.

A right to maintain a dam and reservoir on certain land, which has been acquired by one of the heirs of the former owner by an independent grant as appurtenant to land on which he has a mill, will not be given by a deed in which he joins with the heirs of such person in granting "all right, title, and interest of us and each of us in and to" the land, "hereby quitclaiming all our right, title, and interest in and to all the real estate" owned by their ancestor at the time of his decease, with covenants against "all encumbrances made or suffered by us or either of us respectively." Kendall v. Brown, 7 Gray, 210.

The owner of the water power, land, and mills on each side of a stream, who, after conveying one undivided half of the land and mill on one side, grants the other undivided half therein "with a privilege to draw the water . . . sufficient for one tub wheel at all seasons of the year," conveys only an undivided half of the quantity of water so specified, to correspond with the interest in the land and 47 L. R. A.

A conveyance of land "with appurtenances" did not pass to the grantee the right to water power to operate a tannery, where he erected the tannery after having taken possession under a parol sale, and was permitted by parol license, without consideration, to cut a race to grantor's mill race and draw water therefrom when the same was not needed to operate the grantor's mill, and the deed referred to, although executed after the mill and race were built, was made to carry out the parol sale, and made no mention of the mill or a right to take water, and did not by its terms purport to convey any such right. Moore v. Sinks, 2 Ind. 257.

A grantee of land with the privilege of taking 50 square inches of water, to be applied 5 feet from the surface of the river opposite the place of taking it from the race, is entitled to use such quantity, to be applied directly to his machinery by a race conducting the same from the grantor's race to the place where it should be applied, but cannot draw it into a flume or reservoir and afterward apply it by a larger discharge than 50 square inches. Padack v. Pardee, 1 Mich. 421.

A grant by the owner of land on both sides of a river, who has constructed a dam and a canal to convey water to mills, of one of the mills together with "all the canal-water privilege," excepting sufficient water to furnish a certain amount of power to the remaining mills, conveys all the water of the river which will flow through the canal, subjecting the entire river and bed to the servitude of the canal privilege. Cummings v. Parker, 61 N. H. 516.

A deed granting the "right to control the water, for the purposes of a gristmill, to the top of a stump standing in the pond, and reserving the right to draw water down to the top of such stump in any shape and for any purpose, from the dam or flume, so as not to interfere with the gristmill privileges," conveys an unimpeded right to the water after it has settled to the level of the top of the stump, not an exclusive use of the water as a mass below such top; and retains the free use of all the water when it is above such top, not merely an upper stratum. Douglass v. Whittemore, 32 Vt. 685.

Where, upon the partition of land and a mill tract between Green and Stadden and the canal commissioners one half of the water in the Fox river was to be diverted from that stream and caused to flow through the feeder, and that said Green and Stadden reserved the right to withdraw from the feeder and use for their own purpose one half of the water so to be taken from the river. "diminished as that quantity may chance to be, in the just measure of its proportion, by the leakage, evaporation, etc., necessarily incident to such good and workmanlike dam and lock structures as shall be deemed requisite for the said feeder and basins and useful to the state, and after the necessary quantity has been drawn out for the purpose of the navigation of the said canal, but agreeing that, in the application privilege, the tenant in common who becomes the owner of the pond and dam appurtenant to and above a mill grants to the tenant in common who becomes possessed of the mill under the partition the mill estate which borders on the stream, "together with a privilege to build and keep in repair a trench not exceeding 7½ feet wide, including all necessary materials of stone, plank, or timber, from the dividing line westward into the pond, bounding," etc., "with six tenths of the water appertaining to said divided premises," the grant will be construed as granting six tenths of the water power, and not merely that portion of the water; and in such case those claiming under the owner of the dam and pond cannot destroy such dam to the injury of those who claim under the owner of the mill estate,—especially where, at the time of the partition, the water power from the pond was necessary to the operation of the mill, and the deed of partition described the estate as "certain lot of land and water privilege;" and where it appears that for more than forty years the water has been conducted from the pond, through the trench, to the mill without objection or question as to the right, during which time the expense of repairs in the dam and flowage drainage has been paid by the owners of the dam and owners of the mill, proportionally. Matteson v. Wilbur, 11 R. I. 545.

The conveyance of a grain elevator together with the perpetual use of water power and the machinery of the grantor's adjoining mill, by which the elevator is operated, for which right consideration equal to that paid for the elevator is given, conveys an easement, not merely to a water power, but a right to have that power delivered to the elevator so as to operate the same without any further cost than the purchase price, and is a conveyance running with the land, and may be enforced by the grantee of the elevator against the grantee of the mill property, and is not a mere personal license to use water from the mill race by means of the machinery in existence at the time of the sale. Hottell v. Farmers' Protective Asso. 25 Colo. 87, 53 Pac. 327.

When a deed of a mill site grants the right to draw a given proportion of the water when and so long as it runs over the dam, and none at any other time, except that if the grantor or his assigns should not want to use it, the grantee may do so (subject to a factory right); 67 L. R. A.

or use of said fourth part aforesaid, the same shall be drawn out within ¼ of 1 mile from the head of the guard lock, according as and in the manner to be directed by said commissioners." The Ottawa Hydraulic Company, in the action of trespass brought against the appellant Merrifield, contended that, under the true construction of the contract between Green and Stadden and the canal commissioners, Green and Stadden reserved, and that they and their heirs and assigns were entitled to, the one-fourth part, only, of the water which came into the feeder from the river, diminished as that quantity might chance to be by evaporation, etc., and for the purpose of navigation of the canal, as specified in the contract. The canal commissioners construed the

the grant is to be construed as conveying, (1) all the water in the river (except the factory right) when the grantor or his assigns do not want to use it, and (2) the stated proportion when it runs over the dam, the grantor being confined to his then customary use; and whenever, with such use, there is sufficient water to run over the dam, then the grantee has a right to use his proportion of the water in the stream; and a construction of such instrument is not to be adopted whereby there passes to the grantee only the specified proportion of water when it runs over the dam, with a reservation to the grantor of everything else,—a tenancy in common of the water running over the dam, and a lesser wholly subordinate interest in any more according to the will and desire of the grantor and his successors in title. Safford v. Gaysville Mfg. Co. 71 Vt. 86, 42 Atl. 615.

Under a conveyance of land and water privilege describing the latter as the right to raise and pond back the water of the river running through the premises to a designated point, with the right to use all the water then used or which might thereafter be used at the two privileges owned by the grantor and situated above the premises conveyed, and followed by a covenant that the grantee should at all times have as much water to use as would equal the amount usually required, with a properly constructed breast wheel, to run six complete sets of woolen machinery during twelve hours of each working day, provided that the dam of the grantee should be kept properly graveled and the flume kept in suitable repair,—it was held that the privilege conveyed was limited by the provisions of the covenant, and the grant was of only sufficient water to run six sets of machinery during twelve hours of each day. Fitch v. Belding, 49 Conn. 469.

Under a grant from the owners of a mill pond conveying the right at all times of taking and using the water from the pond for any other mill which should thereafter be erected upon the site of the grantee's present gristmill to the same extent that they now have a right to do, or have been accustomed to do, for the operation of their said gristmill, the grantees acquired, not only a confirmation of their existing rights, but the right to the use of the water which they had been accustomed to use, although such customary use had not ripened into a right. Avon Mfg. Co. v. Andrews, 30 Conn. 476.

Green and Stadden contract as did the hydraulic company.

It appeared from the transcript of the proceedings had in the trespass case which the hydraulic company brought against Merrifield that the circuit court, in hearing and disposing of that proceeding, gave to the Green and Stadden contract the same construction contended for by the Ottawa Hydraulic Company, and under such interpretation of the contract entered judgment against Merrifield. The canal commissioners accepted this interpretation and decision of the circuit court as the true and legal meaning and construction of the Green and Stadden contract, and as fixing the rights of Merrifield and the Ottawa Hydraulic Company in respect to their rights,

The purchaser of a mill site under a grant conveying all the water power thereat and giving the right to construct dams on the grantor's land in aid thereof is not restricted to the water power which had at one time been used at such site by the grantor, but is entitled to whatever water power might be created at such point; and to make such water power available the height of dams may be increased, and, if necessary to the security and most beneficial use of his mill, the location of a guard lock may be changed, providing such changes do not interfere with or impair the free enjoyment of an upper mill by the grantor or his successor in interest. Mack v. Bensley, 63 Wis. 80, 23 N. W. 97.

A grant of water power equal to the quantity which a third person is entitled to draw from a reservoir under an indenture between the owners of rights thereon, which right is by the indenture fixed at the amount of water which will pass through a certain number of gates of specified dimensions, will convey only the amount of water which will pass through like gates, and not enough additional to make up for the difference in flow between the location of the works of the grantee and those of the person mentioned. Bardwell v. Ames, 22 Pick. 333.

Under a grant of 375 cubic inches of water under a 13-foot head at all times when there shall be so much water in the race more than shall be necessary to drive advantageously the mill on the premises granted with two run of stones and certain other machinery, the grantee is entitled to 375 inches under the head of 13 feet in addition to the amount necessary to drive the mill and machinery, and not simply what is left of it after deducting what shall be used under the prior right; and the grantor is bound to make reasonable effort to remove ice and slush which prevent the water from flowing into the race. Torrence v. Conger, 55 N. Y. 680.

Where a person acquires title to land on one side of a river and a milldam, including the use of one half the water power of such dam, which is situated at the head of an island in the river, such water to be taken from his side of the stream to its center; and by means of a dam across a slough between his land and the island he constructs a mill pond into which he conducts the water through a sluiceway from the main dam; and afterwards by deed he conveys respectively, in the water which came into the feeder.

It appeared from the record of the proceeding in the action of trespass that the issue was whether the appellant Merrifield was receiving more water from the feeder than he was entitled to take as an assign of the said Green and Stadden, and that the determination of this issue involved the construction by the court of the provisions of the contract between Green and Stadden and the canal commissioners in respect of the reservation by Green and Stadden of the right to use water from the feeder. The trespass case was heard by the court without the intervention of a jury. The litigants presented to the court propositions to be held as the law applicable to the contentions to another the right to one sixth of the water power of such mill pond remaining after he has reserved and set apart as preferred water power for his own use a certain quantity of water to be drawn under the full head that can or may be obtained,—such grantee acquires thereby the right to the use of one sixth of the whole residue of the water power, after such stated quantity has been reserved, and not merely of the half, and this, too, not only of the water power then obtained, but of the additional water power subsequently acquired by such grantor by purchase from the owners of the other half thereof on the other side of the river; and such purchaser is not entitled to preference as to such additional supply as against his grantee. Batavia Mfg. Co. v. Newton Wagon Co. 91 Ill. 230.

A subsequent general clause in a deed granting all the water of a designated river which can be conducted through a ditch and flume, the grant of which by a prior clause minutely and specifically describing the same is specifically limited to a half interest, conveys only a half interest therein, and not the whole thereof, as such first clause clearly indicates the intention of the parties thereto and the subsequent general clause must be construed as limiting the extent of the grant to its specific and particular description. Fogus v. Ward, 10 Nev. 269.

Where the owner of a tract of land through which a small stream flowed and on which had been erected a tannery and three dams conveyed, at a time when two of the dams had gone out of existence and entirely disappeared and the third was in a dilapidated condition, the water privilege, with the power and appurtenances thereunto "as they now exist," including absolute title to the tannery with appurtenances, with the right to repair and rebuild the dam, it was held that the grantee acquired only the dam existing at the time of the conveyance, and could not construct one at a different place. Ferries v. Knowles, 41 Conn. 308.

Under a covenant that a grantee should have the privilege of using water from a pond "when and at all times when water is and remains in said pond sufficient for driving and running the machinery of a gristmill, the property of grantor, and the said fulling and carding machine hereby sold to grantee;" and "provided always that when and whenever there is a between them. These propositions asked the court to construe and interpret the Green and Stadden contract according to the respective views of the parties. The court refused to hold the propositions asked on behalf of the appellant Merrifield and held that the propositions presented in behalf of the hydraulic company correctly construed the contract.

Proposition No. 1 asked by the hydraulic company and held by the court declared that, under the proper construction of the Green and Stadden contract, the water which the said Green and Stadden reserved "was the one-fourth part of the water of the Fox river which passed through the guard lock at Dayton, Illinois, into said feeder, diminished as that quantity might chance to be, according to the provisions of said release in that regard."

Proposition No. 2, presented in behalf of the hydraulic company and held by the court, was as follows: "That, under the release of water power in question made by John Green and William Stadden, the said John Green and William Stadden, their heirs and assigns, did not become entitled to withdraw from the Fox river feeder a quantity of water equal to one-fourth part of all the water in the Fox river at Dayton, Illinois, only diminished by its proportion of leakage, evaporation, and water for the navigation of the canal, as more particularly set forth in said release, even though such quantity of water might be all the water flowing in said feeder; but the true in-scarcity of water in the said mill pond the said grantee shall be at liberty to use only so much of the water in the said ponds as shall be sufficient to turn one water wheel,"—the grantor was entitled to sufficient water to drive his mill before the grantee could use any, and grantee was not, by the proviso, entitled at all events to enough to turn one water wheel. Craske v. Huffman, 27 U. C. Q. B. 116.

3. Exceptions and reservations.

Rights to water power may be created by exceptions from grants and reservations of rights when granting others, and they have been frequently created in this manner. The same rules apply which apply in case of exceptions and reservations in instruments conveying real estate. The exception must not be repugnant to the grant.

"Under a lease of a fulling mill together with the water course and flood gates in trust for the benefit of the lessor's family, an exception of free liberty to the lessor at all times to divert the water from the mill for the watering of meadows which he shall think proper is not repugnant to the grant, and includes water rents for flooding meadows with water which is wholly diverted from the mill. Lambert v. Bennet, 3 Smith, 84.

A clause in a deed granting land which includes an unmentioned stream, reciting that it is the intention "to convey so much of the privilege of the water as shall be sufficient for the purpose of a mill whenever there is a sufficiency therefor," is not repugnant to the grant, but is good as a reservation to the grantor of the surplus water. Sprague v. Snow, 4 Pick. 54.

The tendency is to construe the reservation most strongly against the grantor, since, the instrument being his, it will be presumed that he mentions all he intends to reserve.

A reservation in a grant of the right to draw water from a mill pond of the right to use water necessary for a gristmill will not include the right to continue the use of water for domestic purposes, which is not necessary for the operation of the mill. Crawford v. Parsons, 63 N. H. 438.

A grant of water privileges sufficient to run a certain mill, with a reservation of water sufficient at all times to work grantor's mills as now used, will be held to reserve only the quantity of water then actually used, rather than to refer to the total capacity of the mill for using water; and grantor is not entitled to more water, except when there is a surplus over that required by the grantee's mill. Wyman v. Far- rar, 35 Me. 64.

A grant of all water power in a river except sufficient to operate certain mills, which is limited to 100 horse power, reserves only as much power, up to the stated amount, as may be enough to drive the described mills. Moore v. Wilder, 66 Vt. 33, 28 Atl. 320.

A reservation in deeds of water power of sufficient power to drive six run of millstone and necessary machinery will be limited to a certain amount, which was at the time and has been since sufficient for that purpose, where the grantors, on the execution of subsequent grants, represented that as the amount so reserved, and were assessed for their proportion of the cost for repairing and rebuilding the dam on the basis of that amount. Janesville Cotton Mills v. Ford, 82 Wis. 416, 17 L. R. A. 564, 52 N. W. 764.

In an action for unlawfully diverting water, a reservation in a deed, the common source of title of both parties, of the privilege of half the servient mill owned by a third party, being in effect only an exception from the privileges conveyed, is to be measured by the extent of such third party's title at the time of the grant. Rogers v. Bancroft, 20 Vt. 250.

But the language will be given a reasonable construction to effectuate the intention of the parties as far as possible.

A reservation of water from a privilege for grantor's sawmills will reserve water power for mills about to be erected, although the evidence shows that grantor owned no mills at the time of the grant. Blake v. Madigan, 65 Me. 522.

A reservation in a deed of "the free and unobstructed use of the water which shall run or be turned into" a channel means and is equivalent to "the natural flow of the water that may run or be turned" into that channel. Skowhegan Water Power Co. v. Weston, 94 Me. 285, 47 Atl. 515.

A reservation in a conveyance of land adjoining a mill pond of the right to a mill then in operation, together with its appurtenances, includes the right to sufficient water to run the mill; and the grantee constructing a mill on the land conveyed can use the water to such an extent only as will not interfere with the terpretation of the meaning of said release is that said John Green and William Stadden, their heirs and assigns, are only entitled to withdraw from said feeder one fourth of the water flowing in said feeder, and that one fourth subject to the limitations and reductions set forth in said release, and said one fourth subject to the further limitation and control of the canal commissioners or some authorized agent of the state to the extent that the water of the canal should not be reduced below the depth of 6 feet during the season of navigation."

Other propositions, giving the like construction to the contract, were presented to the court by the hydraulic company, and were approved as correct construction of grantor's full and perfect use of the water. Leggett v. Kerton, 2 Rich. L. 156.

A grant of a mill site "with the right of use of all water not necessary in driving the wheel, or its equal, now used to carry the machinery in the shingle mill," belonging to the grantor, reserves the right to the water necessary to drive such wheel, although more machinery was operated by it than the shingle machine; and the same quantity may be used for other purposes. Warner v. Cushman, 82 Me. 168, 19 Atl. 159.

When an owner of both sides of a stream, in the middle of which is a ledge dividing it into main and subsidiary channels, who maintains a dam across the main channel ordinarily sufficient to furnish power to a gristmill on that side, but supplemented by temporary obstructions diverting the lesser to the greater current, deeds a sawmill site opposite the gristmill, with a right to dam and use the surplus water on the inferior side so as not to injure the gristmill,—there is reserved to the gristmill an unimpaired right to use all the water from both channels that may be needed to run it to its full capacity at the time of the grant; and the servient mill power will be enjoined from drawing down the level of the subsidiary channel so that its waters do not flow into the main one. Eastman v. Parker, 85 Vt. 643, 27 Atl. 611.

An exception by one owning both sides of a stream with a dam and mill pond serving a sawmill on the one bank and a gristmill, carding machine, and fulling mill on the other, in a deed of the sawmill site "with the privilege of drawing water to carry said mill, except in times of low water, when it is wanted for the carding and cloth dressing and for the gristmill," the grantee further having "the privilege of water to carry a turning lathe when it can be spared from the other wheels,"—was construed to be a reservation in favor of the works on the opposite side of the creek of all the water requisite successfully to operate them whenever it was low, either naturally or in consequence of the sawmill's use not leaving a sufficient supply. Rood v. Johnson, 26 Vt. 64.

In a reservation in a deed of a claimant for damages for the continuance of a canal for the benefit of a mill, the word "trench" was held to include a section of a canal, used as such at the time of the execution of the deed, as necessary to effect the avowed purposes of the reservation, and to carry out the intent of the parties; notwithstanding there was another, but insufficient, outlet of water from the pond to the mills supplied by it, called "a trench." Bailou v. Harris, 5 R. I. 419.

Under a deed reserving to the grantor the privilege of drawing water from the grantee's ditch, and providing that the grantee keep a spout 10 inches square at the bottom of said ditch, to which the grantor shall have access for the purpose of drawing such water, it became the duty of the grantee, upon his acceptance of the deed, to put in the spout; and a court of equity will compel him to do so, although it is to be placed upon land other than that conveyed to him by the grantor. Randall v. Latham, 36 Conn. 48.

4. Sufficiency of conveyance.

To be effective the language of the grant must be such that it can have some operation upon existing conditions or those in the immediate contemplation of the parties. But it will be given effect if it is possible to do so. The insertion in the instrument of language intended to be of no effect will not be presumed.

A deed conveying the right to use water "for any purpose whatever" is a sufficient grant of the water, not only for canal, but for mill, purposes. Lonsdale Co. v. Moles, 21 Monthly Law Rep. 658.

A grant of water is not invalid for uncertainty because it is to be measured by the necessities of machinery to be subsequently erected. Valley Pulp & Paper Co. v. West, 58 Wis. 599, 17 N. W. 554.

A reservation in a deed of sufficient water to supply and work a No. 5 hydraulic ram is not void for uncertainty when such quantity is a matter capable of ascertainment by computation. Walker v. Lillingston, 137 Cal. 401, 70 Pac. 282.

An agreement to deliver a deed to land with the right of erecting a dam and flowing grantor's land is not fulfilled by the offer of a deed to the land alone, if the omission of the flowage right was a substantial defect. Wilson v. M'Neal, 10 Watts, 422.

A deed conveying property on which a water right is used, together with the appurtenances belonging thereto, is sufficient to pass title to the water right though it is not expressly mentioned or described, where the use of the power in connection with the premises is open and visible and essential and incidental to the rea-

Rep. 608. That is to say, as between the Ottawa Hydraulic Company and the appellant Merrifield the question as to the quantity of water Green and Stadden and their assigns were entitled to take under the correct construction of the contract with the canal commissioners arose for decision and was conclusively and finally settled in the trespass suit, and that the court in such litigation having decided that under said contract said Green and Stadden reserved for their own use and for the use of their heirs and assigns the one-fourth part, only, of the water which came into the feeder from Fox river, subject to be diminished by evaporation, etc., and after the necessary quantity had been drawn out for purpose of navigation of the canal, etc., that decision is final as between the parties to that litigation.

The Green and Stadden contract provided that in the application or use of the said one-fourth part of the water reserved by Green and Stadden, the same should "be drawn out of said feeder within $\frac{1}{4}$ of 1 mile from the head of the guard lock, according as and in the manner to be directed by the said commissioners." It was within the power of the commissioners of the canal to control and direct the withdrawal of the water from the feeder by Green and Stadden, and by the appellant Merrifield, the assign of Green and Stadden; and, the commissioners having sold and leased to the hydraulic company all of the water and water power furnished by the said Fox river sonable and intended enjoyment of the property, notwithstanding that the land was described by metes and bounds, or that the water power is not derived or taken from lands owned by the grantor. Dexter Sulphite Pulp & Paper Co. v. Frontenac Paper Co. 20 Misc. 442, 46 N. Y. Supp. 363.

b. Grant of flow of stream.

Where a grant of land excepts and reserves to the grantor, his heirs and assigns, the sole and only right of the stream of water running through it, and the grantee is not to erect any kind of waterworks whatever on said stream, but the grantor reserves the same to himself, there is reserved only the right of using the water power, the water, and all other rights in it passing to the grantee. Provost v. Calder, 2 Wend. 517.

A grant of the free use and privilege of a stream flowing through other lands of the grantor, with the unobstructed right of conveying the water in an open race to a certain mill as it is now running, with a right to enter to cleanse, repair, and scour the race, confers a right to use the quantity required for the mill for such purpose as the grantee may desire. Davis v. Hamilton, 6 Pa. Super. Ct. 562.

A grant of mill property and water power, together with the "privilege of excavating and drawing said creek as low as he pleases at all times," conveys to the grantee, not only the right to the use of the water power, but the right to divert such creek from its natural bed permanently and perpetually if it becomes necessary for the purpose of using the water power at the mill. Potter v. Burton, 15 Ohio, 196.

A grant by a riparian owner of the lower part of his land, together with the use of the water of the stream for the purpose of operating the mill of the grantee "free from interference or detention," does not convey the use of all the water in a regular flow or in its natural condition uninterrupted or unaffected by the reasonable use of the stream above; but the grant must be construed as subject to the reasonable use of the stream above by the grantor, leaving the question of what constitutes such reasonable use to be determined by general principles of law independent of the grant. Red River Roller Mills v. Wright, 30 Minn. 249, 44 Am. Rep. 194, 15 N. W. 187.

Purchasers from the owners of a sawmill of land lower down, with the right at all times to use "all the water which naturally flows below said sawmill in said stream unobstructed by" the grantors, take only the right to the water which flows below such mill when the same is in operation, and not the natural flow unobstructed by the grantors' dam, in view of the limitation therein, on the construction of a dam by the grantees at a point "below" such sawmill, and the limitation of the back flow therefrom to the foot of the overshot wheel of the sawmill, and the fact that but for the sawmill dam, which stores the waters of the wet season, the grant of water power would be comparatively useless during the summer. Oregon Iron Co. v. Trullinger, 2 Or. 311, Affirming 3 Or. 1.

A grant by the owner of a head race, mill, and water power, of a small tract of land below the mill, together with all the water power on said mill lot "below" such mill and clear of the wheel thereof, does not give superior rights to the grantee, nor entitle him, as against a subsequent owner of the mill, to have the water come to his mill in the same volume, or with the same constancy, as if the upper mill was not there; but he takes subject to the reasonable use thereof at the upper mill. Patten v. Marden, 14 Wis. 473.

The grantor of the full and uninterrupted right and use of all the water falling into a dam and race, with the ground so used thereby, has no further interest therein, and cannot prevent a subsequent purchaser from diverting the stream for domestic uses by a community. Hannum v. West Chester, 70 Pa. 367.

c. Grant of dam.

A deed conveying the right to erect and maintain a dam, with the right to so much of the land as may be necessary therefor, will convey all of the grantor's interest in the land. Monmouth v. Plimpton, 77 Me. 556, 1 Atl. 693.

The reservation in a deed of land bounded on one side of a stream of the right to butt a dam on both shores of the stream will not reserve to the grantor the right to the use of the whole water of the stream. Arthur v. Case, 1 Paige, 447.

But a grant to a corporation engaged in constructing a water-power plant on one side of a river, and to "its successors and assigns forever," of the right to abut the dam upon the opposite bank and to keep the same in repair is a grant of an easement in fee appurtenant to feeder which the said commissioners could lawfully sell, and which could be used without interfering with an ample supply of water for said canal, it became the duty of the said canal commissioners to take such steps as might be found proper to so control the withdrawal of water from the feeder by Merrifield as should be necessary to enable the hydraulic company to obtain the quantity of water it was entitled to have and use under the contract between it and the canal commissioners. Merrifield and the hydraulic company having submitted to a court of competent jurisdiction, in the action at law regularly pending between them, the question of the quantity of water Merrifield was entitled to have from the feeder under the proper construction of the Green and Stadden contract, and that construction having been settled by the judgment of the court, which judgment remained unreversed and in no manner impeached, the canal commissioners would be fully justified in taking such steps as might be necessary and proper to restrict the outflow of the water in Merrifield's flumes in accordance with his rights as determined by the court in the suit between himself and the hydraulic company. It was within the power, and seems fairly to have been the duty, of the canal commissioners to adopt some adequate and proper means to restrict the flow of the water into Merrifield's flume so that he should receive the quantity it had been determined by the court that he was entitled to use and enjoy under the Green and Stadden contract. The the power plant, so as to pass to successors in title; and it will pass by a grant of the dominant estate without special mention thereof. Sweetland v. Grants Pass New Water, Light & P. Co. (Or.) 79 Pac. 337.

A reservation, by one owning the bed of a stream, in a conveyance of one half of such bed to the opposite owner, of the right to butt a dam on both shores as he shall think necessary, does not deprive the grantee of the right to participate equally in the use of the water. Case v. Haight, 3 Wend. 632.

The conveyance of a certain half of a milldam, together with "the privilege of taking the water from any part of the said northerly half of the milldam," confers upon the grantee the right to one half the water power raised by such dam. Runnels v. Bullen, 2 N. H. 532.

A deed of a dam with the privilege of flowing during the winter only land of the grantor higher up the stream "for the benefit of carrying on the blacksmith business" does not limit the right to use the stream at all seasons for any reasonable purpose, including additional power subsequently created by the grantor's improvements. Tourtellot v. Phelps, 4 Gray, 370.

The reservation in a deed of the right of erecting a dam on the bank of a creek at a place specified, and of the right to occupy and possess the aforesaid premises without any let, etc., creates such an interest in the soil that ejectment may be maintained. Jackson ex dem. Loux v. Buel, 9 Johns. 298.

A grant of lands and one half of a designated dam "with all the privileges thereunto appertaining in said proportion" makes the grantees tenants in common with the grantor in the whole of the dam and water power, with the right to use one half the water therein when the head is above a designated height, although such half exceeds the amount specified in subsequent clauses as that to which such grantees are entitled when the head is above that height, where such specified amount is one half the estimated number of inches created by the dam, as such subsequent clauses are not intended to restrict the general grant, but only to define the interests and obligations of the respective parties in respect to the dam. Richards v. Koenig, 24 Wis. 360.

The conveyance, by general description, of lots on which a dam rests, gives the purchaser no title to the dam or land thereunder in the 67 L. R. A.

bed of the stream, where, previous to such purchase, the owners thereof had sold and leased part of the water power created thereby, and subsequently sold and leased other portions thereof, with covenants on the part of the grantees to contribute to the maintenance of the dam, and the consideration paid for such lots was but a small part of the value of the dam and water power; as an intention is clearly manifest thereby to separate the property in such dam and water power from the upland. Smith v. Ford, 48 Wis. 115, 2 N. W. 134, 4 N. W. 462.

The conveyance of premises on one side of a river, together with one half of a milldam, with the privilege of taking water from any part of the half granted by the grantor, who owns the other half of the dam and a mill on the other side of the river, does not confer upon the grantee such an absolute ownership in his share of the dam, or such unlimited rights to the water power, as would permit him totally to destroy or injure his portion of the dam, or draw water from it in unlimited quantities, or in any manner or at any period of time. Runnels v. Bullen, 2 N. H. 532.

The grantee of the use of a dam, who agrees to keep in repair one-twelfth part of the dam, as it is expected that he will use about that proportion of the whole, cannot be restricted to that proportion under a grant of power for "tanning purposes in all its various branches." Deshon v. Porter, 38 Me. 289.

A reservation in a deed of the right of raising, as well as of rebuilding, grantor's dam does not refer to one operation; but, after a dam has been raised, if it is swept away, he may enter and rebuild it. State v. Suttle, 115 N. C. 784, 20 S. E. 725.

The actual building of a dam under authority to construct it near a point specified will fix the location so that neither party can change it without the consent of the other. Evangelical Lutheran St. John's Orphan Home v. Buffalo Hydraulic Assn. 64 N. Y. 561, affirming 4 Hun, 419.

But the grantee by deed of the use of the water of a creek running through the grantor's land and the privilege of building a dam and race across such creek on such lands so as to get the entire benefit of the water of such creek, having once selected a site and erected his dam and race, is not thereby restricted to that spot if it is found impracticable to secure canal commissioners caused the weir in question to be constructed and placed in Merrifield's flume for the purpose of so controlling the flow of water from the feeder that he should withdraw no more than he was entitled to have and use under the decision of the court in the suit which the hydraulic company had instituted against him for the purpose of obtaining the judicial ascertainment and declaration of the rights of Merrifield under the Green and Stadden contract. Whether this weir was so contrived and constructed and so placed in the flume as to effect the correct apportionment of the water in the feeder demanded careful consideration of the chancellor. Our investigation of the record as to this point has brought us to the conclusion that the appellant Merrifield had just cause to contend that the weir deprived him, during a portion of the time, of water which he was entitled to have flow into the flume, and that it deprived him at all times of the full benefit of what is known to the parties as the "head" of water.

The flume was built in 1838 or 1839, and, so far as the evidence discloses, no material change has since then been made in it,—certainly not since 1855, a period of more than forty years,—before any contention arose as to the rights of the assigns of Green and Stadden to take water from the feeder through the flume. The flume was constructed with a permanent stone bottom, which put it on a level with the bottom of the feeder. The mouth of the flume was by that dam the benefit of the water. Conwell v. Brookhart, 4 B. Mon. 580, 41 Am. Dec. 244.

A grant of a joint interest in the water in a raceway, with the right to repair or rebuild the dam, does not limit the right of the grantor to enlarge the dam if it can be done without impairing the rights of the grantee. Butler Hard Rubber Co. v. Newark, 61 N. J. L. 32, 40 Atl. 224.

The right granted by deed to the use of the water of a creek and to build a dam and race on the grantor's land for that purpose implies a right to the exclusive use and possession of so much of such land as may be necessary to that end, which continues so long as such dam is maintained and used for the purpose for which it was built. Conwell v. Brookhart, 4 B. Mon. 580, 41 Am. Dec. 244.

The conveyance of a water privilege will include the right to maintain the dam as it then exists and has been used previous to the grant. Oakley v. Stanley, 5 Wend. 523.

The partial destruction of a milldam by a freshet is not a natural and reasonable wear and tear, within the meaning of an exception to delivery of possession of a mill property at a future day under a contract to convey. Green v. Kelly, 20 N. J. L. 544.

A deed from the owner of the land on one side of a milldam, conveying the title to the lands upon which an abutment to the milldam stands, with, all and singular, the rights and appurtenances thereto belonging, vests in the purchaser all such owner's right to the water power created by the dam, at the height it was erected at the time of such purchase; and a court of equity will enjoin his use thereof, without such purchaser's consent, either through the dam or by a race cut through his own lands to the pond created by such dam, above. Wall v. Cloud, 3 Humph. 181.

Where tenants in common of a dam and mills partition them, and each covenants with the other to keep in repair a distinct and separate portion of the dam, case will not lie by one against the grantee of another for not repairing, but the remedy must be covenant. Wilbur v. Brown, 3 Denio, 356.

d. Head and flow.

Where a right is granted to construct a dam for a water power of a certain number of feet head, the distinction between the general or 67 L. R. A.

apparent and the efficient head of water power cannot be considered in ascertaining the proper method to be employed in measuring the number of feet head, it appearing that no such distinction was known or recognized at the time of the grant. Langness v. Pettigrew, 5 Dak. 45, 37 N. W. 758.

The grantee of a specified head of water from the works of a navigation corporation obtains no contract rights different from those of a riparian owner of a natural waterfall. McKeen v. Delaware Div. Canal Co. 49 Pa. 424.

The fact that a conveyance of a mill site and the right to a certain number of inches of water describes the lot by metes and bounds, and fixes the river boundary of the lot at low-water mark, does not limit the "head" of water power so as to prevent the grantee from excavating his tail race below the then low-water mark. Forrest Mill Co. v. Cedar Falls Mill Co. 103 Iowa, 619, 72 N. W. 1076.

In ascertaining the lowest practical point where a mill wheel can be set, reckoning from the top of a dam, to determine the quantity of water up to a definite limit of horse power excepted in a water grant, the location of the wheel respecting the bed and banks of the stream, the character of the mill business, and the expense of making and benefit accruing from a change, are properly taken into account. Moore v. Wilder, 66 Vt. 33, 28 Atl. 320.

A deed that conveys "the right of drawing as much water as will vent off through a gate or opening that is equal to 10 inches square" in a dam is not impaired by the subsequent diminishing of the head of water at the dam by grantor or his successors. Gray v. Saco Water Power Co. 85 Me. 526, 27 Atl. 455.

e. Races, channels, and flumes.

One to whom a lot abutting on a raceway is granted, with the right to maintain the raceway, enter the channel, and take power therefrom, acquires a perpetual easement therein, and is entitled to have the channel kept open and unobstructed. McMillan v. Lauer, 24 N. Y. Supp. 951.

A grant of land with a right to draw water from a dam across a brook flowing alongside of it is subject to a proviso that the flume shall be constructed so as not to exceed a foot in depth when the pond is full, and that the grantee shall never draw any water when none provided with two gates, which were moved up and down by cogs designed and made for that purpose. By means of the gates the quantity of water which would flow from the feeder into the flume could be restricted or the flow thereof entirely obstructed. The inside dimensions of the flume were 7 feet in width by 5 feet in depth, and the bottom of the flume being on a level with the bottom of the feeder, the flume would therefore receive water whenever there was any water in the feeder, unless the gates were closed entirely down. The flume was of the length of 25 feet, the water being discharged from it into what is called the "penstock." The weir placed in the flume by the direction of the canal commissioners was so constructed that no water could flow through the flume into the penstock unless there was more than 3.2 feet of water, in depth, in the feeder. The flume as originally constructed in 1838 or 1839, and as maintained continuously from that early date, received water from the bottom of the feeder, whenever there was any water in the flume, unless the gates were closed down. The flume was maintained during the long years after its construction before the Ottawa Hydraulic Company had contracted for water, and for many years thereafter, received water from the feeder under conditions and circumstances under which no water could flow into it after the weir was installed. The flume, in the absence of the weir, received the water with a head of water at all times when water runs over the dam. Cowdrey v. Colburn, 7 Allen, 9.

Under a reservation in a deed of land bordering upon a mill pond, of a right of drawing from the pond such a portion of the water as may be necessary for fulling cloth or skins, the grantor is entitled to an easement for the passage of water from the pond through the premises conveyed. Cocheco Mfg. Co. v. Whittier, 10 N. H. 305.

The owner of a mill operated by water power is also the owner in fee of the land covered by the mill race through which the water supply is conducted, and of water privileges necessary to operate the mill, under a deed conveying a parcel of land as a mill site and water privileges from a certain race, with the right to widen the race and to keep the same in repair, reserving in the grantor the privilege to pass over the same and to put his fences on its bank, although such land is not specifically described in the deed,—especially as he has been in continuous and uninterrupted possession thereof for more than twenty years. Branson v. Studabaker, 133 Ind. 147, 33 N. E. 98.

The grant by the owner of the lower of a series of mills supplied by a flume, together with a certain fraction of the water power and flume, of an intermediate mill on the flume, with the water rights and portion of flume belonging thereto, will refer to the flume as it visibly exists, so as to prevent his claiming against his grantee the right to enlarge the flume across the granted property, on the ground that it does not carry water enough to give him the share of the power belonging to his lower mill. Gilford Hosiery Co. v. Pitman Mfg. Co. 63 N. H. 500, 3 Atl. 641.

A provision in a deed granting the rights of the grantor in a raceway which includes the right to enlarge it, which gives the grantor a right to build a dam below that from which the race leads, and to flow the granted land to within 5 feet of the top of the former dam, will not restrict the right of the grantee to enlarge the raceway. Butler Hard Rubber Co. v. Newark, 61 N. J. L. 32, 40 Atl. 224.

Under a grant of an artificial water course together with the springs or streams of water flowing into or feeding it, the grantee is entitled only to the water flowing through the water course from the several springs and streams of water flowing into it, and cannot enlarge the channel so as to enable it to carry off a greater amount of water than its capacity would have permitted at the time of the conveyance. Taylor v. St. Helen, L. R. 6 Ch. Div. 264, 46 L. J. Ch. N. S. 857, 37 L. T. N. S. 251, 25 Week. Rep. 885.

A grant of "so much of any land" as will conveniently convey water to grantee's mill conveys an easement for the race determined on by the parties at the time of grant to be necessary for the mill. Merriman v. Russell, 53 N. C. (2 Jones Eq.) 470.

One who is in possession, using a mill race under a contract by which he is entitled to its use in the place where the race now runs, although the width mentioned in the contract is 22 feet, is entitled to use it to the full width as it existed at the time of the purchase of an upper mill upon the race subsequent to making the contract, although that width was 28 feet. Daniels v. Chaffin, 28 Iowa, 327.

Where the owners of two pieces of land and a mill pond conveyed the upper piece together with one half of the mill pond, reserving the privilege of "conveying water from said dam through a conductor similar to the one now in use," for the purpose of supplying the lower mill, and at that time the water was being taken to the upper mill through a flume, and to the lower mill by means of a conductor inserted in the flume, it was held that the grantors retained the right of taking the water in the accustomed manner, and were not compelled to take it directly from the dam,—especially in view of the fact that the parties had placed a similar construction on the grant by their conduct for several years after the conveyance. Kennedy v. Scovill, 12 Conn. 317.

A conveyance by one owning land having thereon a saw, a grist, and a clothing mill supplied with water from a flume connected with the flume of the gristmill, of the clothing mill "and water privilege for said mill, flume, etc., as now enjoyed," does not confer the right upon the grantee to enter upon the premises belonging to the owner of the gristmill to repair or rebuild the flume then existing, so that it will be of different dimensions, or occupy a different location or draw more water than the original flume, even though the change might be more advantageous to the owner of the gristmill. Dewey v. Bellows, 9 N. H. 282.

A purchaser of a mill and mill pond with the right to run water through a raceway over adjoining land is not restricted to maintaining flowed into the flume at all, and this the weir interfered with and entirely destroyed, or at least materially diminished. In these two respects the weir injuriously deprived the appellant of the full use and benefit of the water to which he was entitled. The engineer of the canal commissioners who devised the weir conceded that the weir would produce a "slight loss of head," but insisted that he had so designed the weir that the loss of head would be compensated for by an extra quantity of water which the weir would admit for that purpose. He also testified that the water in the flume between the weir and the feeder would have to rise to a depth of 3.2 feet before any water could pass over the crest of the weir into the penstock. Before the installation of the weir the feeder would receive and convey the water at all times when the gates were raised, as the bottom of the flume and the bottom of the feeder were on the same level.

The adjudication created in the trespass case reached but a single question, namely, the quantity of water the assigns of Green and Stadden were entitled to receive from the feeder. The manner or mode in which they were entitled to take the quantity they had the right to receive was not brought in question in that action. Whether the weir permitted such assigns to receive the quantity in the mode and manner they were entitled to have it under the contract remained to be determined by the chancellor in this proceeding. The chancellor was called upon to determine, among other the raceway as it was when purchased, but he may make necessary improvements in it to obtain the full enjoyment of the easement. And this will include the removal of deposits from the bed of the race to the land adjoining so as to restore it to its original depth, although it is thereby made deeper than it was when the purchase was made. Beals v. Stewart, 6 Lans. 408.

A grantor is not, for the purpose of conducting water to land sold, bound to deepen and widen a race into and through which at the date of the grant water did not and could not come and flow, but is only bound to keep that and another race in such order and repair as that the water may always continue to flow as freely therein as at the time of such grant, under a covenant by the grantor that the grantee shall have the right to the use and benefit of certain races on the unsold land as soon as they intersect a designated line of the land granted; that the grantor will permit water to flow therein without interruption to such line, he keeping the races in good order and repair through his tract; and giving the grantee free access to the sources of the races to increase the streams of water or do any other thing necessary for their improvement. Carroll v. Cockey, 3 Harr. & J. 282.

When a grantor deeds premises including a spring and cistern and an aqueduct between them, reserving all the waste water from the reservoir to use on his adjoining lands, with the right to go upon the demised premises and dig up and repair a conduit from the cistern to the adjacent land by paying all damages thereby occasioned,—the grantee is bound to maintain in its original efficiency the supply aqueduct from spring to tank, and if he omits doing so the grantor may restore any impairment, and is not liable for damage resulting from doing so; nor can the grantee thereafter avail himself of the benefit of repairs made at the grantor's expense. Hill v. Shorey, 42 Vt. 617.

A grant of the use of a stream of water, declaring that it shall flow in a free and uninterrupted course through a channel therein described into the grantee's land, operates as a grant of the easement of the water course therein described; and, inasmuch as the channel is specified, the grantor has no right to change it where it crosses his land, although no injury is thereby inflicted upon the grantee. 67 L. R. A.

Northam v. Hurley, 1 El. & Bl. 655, 22 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 183, 17 Jur. 872.

Under a conveyance of the privilege of constructing a ditch on the land of the grantor bounded by a river, in the most convenient place to convey the water from the river to lands therein conveyed to the grantee, for the purpose of carrying a mill or any other works that may be erected on said premises, the grantee is entitled to take the water of the river from a point at the upper line of the grantor's land, thereby getting the entire fall of the river,—especially where such fall is scarcely enough for one mill privilege, and the parties by their conduct have placed the same construction on the grant. Brigham v. Ross, 55 Conn. 373, 11 Atl. 294.

1. Right to convey; rescission.

The fact that a river is navigable will not prevent a riparian owner from acquiring a right to a power created by the erection of a dam, which he can sell so as to be bound by his deed in favor of a grantee, whatever his rights may be so far as the public is concerned. Hamelin v. Bannerman [1895] A. C. 237, 64 L. J. P. C. N. S. 66, 11 Reports, 368, 72 L. T. N. S. 128, 43 Week. Rep. 639, 60 J. P. 22.

One whose ordinary riparian rights have been changed to those of an owner in common with others of a mill pond can convey only an interest in riparian rights which pertain to land thus owned by himself and others, and which had previously been converted into a water power. Fowler v. Kent (N. H.) 52 Atl. 554.

The owner of an estate on a stream, entitled to share in the water power belonging to an upper privilege on the stream, cannot affect the rights of other owners in the privilege by a grant to an owner of a lower privilege. Atlanta Mills v. Mason, 120 Mass. 244.

An owner of a sawmill and box factory with the right to use a certain amount of water for power, but who is subsequently limited by an award to draw water for the box factory through a certain penstock, which he has enlarged from the original one, only when water is running over the wasteway, can convey only that right to a grantee of the box factory, and not the right he originally had as to both sawmill and box factory. Horne v. Hitchins (N. H.) 51 Atl. 651.

A grant of land subject to an easement of flowage for mill purposes entitles the grantee things: (1) Whether, under the Green and Stadden contract, it was competent for the commissioners to so divert and control the flow of water from the feeder to the flume, as did the weir, that no water could flow into the flume of the appellant Merrifield except at times when there was more than 3.2 feet of water in the feeder; and (2) whether, under that contract, it was competent for the canal commissioners to so construct the weir as to prevent the water from flowing into Merrifield's flume from the bottom of the feeder at all times when he was entitled to have water under the contract. The provisions of the contract with Green and Stadden touching upon the propositions are as follows: "Agreeing that in the application or use of said fourth part, as aforesaid, the same shall be drawn out of the said feeder within $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 mile from the head of the guard lock, according as and in the manner to be directed by the said commissioners or other authorized agent. This reservation being subject to the farther limitation that it shall not at any time authorize the subscribers, even within the quantity of said proposition, to reduce the water of the said Illinois and Michigan Canal, during the season of navigation, below the depth of 6 feet, which, only, shall be done by the permission of some authorized agent, of the state." The contract, it will be observed, clothed the canal commissioners with authority and discretion in respect of these matters. Immediately after the execution of this contract of reservation by Green to receive the rent payable therefor, notwithstanding an exception in the conveyance of the right to flow the land, since the reservation is invalid because appertaining to a thing which the grantor, having conveyed, had no right to grant, and because the thing reserved does not issue out of the thing granted in the deed. Pollock v. Cronise, 12 How. Pr. 368.

It is no defense to the specific performance of a contract for the purchase of real estate, including water power of a river dam, that such dam had been washed away at the date of the contract, and, if rebuilt of sufficient height to be of any value, it would overflow lands above the dam and on the opposite side of the river, the right to do which does not exist in the grantor, where such purchaser was acting on his own knowledge and that of his agent of the land and the water power and the value thereof at the time he made the purchase, and bought with the knowledge that the grantor had never seen the land, and knew nothing about it except as informed by his agent. Jobbins v. Gray, 34 Ill. App. 208.

Where a tenant in common conveys his undivided share in a mill estate "together with all the privileges and appurtenances thereto belonging or appertaining to the same," and afterwards purchases a lot of land on the stream below, he is estopped, as against his grantee, from making any claim for the diversion of the stream so long as the water is used at the mill in the manner that it was when the conveyance was made. Olney v. Fenner, 2 R. I. 211, 57 Am. Dec. 711.

A grant to a navigation company of power to sell in fee simple such water as is not required for navigation does not refer to quantity of interest in the water, but to the period of time in which the grant may be exercised. Lehigh Coal & Nav. Co. v. Scranton Gas & Water Co. 6 Pa. Dist. R. 291.

A hydraulic company whose duration and power to make leases was limited by its original charter is authorized to make permanent leases by a subsequent amendment of its charter repealing the provisions limiting its duration and restraining its power to make leases. Beckett Paper Co. v. Hamilton & R. Hydraulic Co. 18 Ohio C. C. 200.

A conveyance by three of four cotenants of an aliquot part of water power, together with a mill and mill seat owned entirely by them, is of no validity against subsequent grantees of 67 L. R. A.

all the proprietors, unless the interest in the water power had theretofore been made appurtenant to the lot. Forrest Mill Co. v. Cedar Falls Mill Co. 103 Iowa, 619, 72 N. W. 1076.

A grant of a right to use the water of a reservoir when the grantors, who were the owners of an undivided half interest therein, were not using it, is not void on the ground that it impairs the rights of cotenants. Adams v. Manning, 51 Conn. 5.

Conveyances made by the owners of lands, riparian rights and water powers in pursuance of an agreement entered into for the purpose of consolidating all interests in such water powers, and contemplating the formation of a corporation for that purpose, will be canceled where some of the signers refused and could not be compelled to convey and others did not own the lands scheduled in their names, so that the original purpose of the corporation could not be carried out and has been abandoned. Mack v. Consolidated Water Power Co. 42 C. C. A. 67, 101 Fed. 869.

g. Other matters.

One receiving a deed of a water power subject to the conditions and covenants in a lease thereof to a third person, who takes possession and receives the lands under the lease, will be liable on the covenants to repair. Cargill v. Thompson, 50 Minn. 211, 52 N. W. 644.

The grantee in a partition deed of that portion of an entire tract on which is located a distillery erected by the original owner of the tract, together with "the necessary and useful water privileges for the benefit" of the distillery, reserving to one of the grantors the use of the water in the race for his stock as heretofore, is entitled to have the water so used by such grantor as not to pollute it or divert it from its natural flow so as to make it unfit and interfere with its use for distillery purposes, since the incidental use thus reserved cannot be construed to defeat or interfere with the dominant right of the grantee to the beneficial use of the water for his distillery. Price v. Lawson, 74 Md. 499, 22 Atl. 206.

Where the lessee of a stream of water is entitled to it in its natural state, so that the turning of heated water into the stream is a violation of the lessor's covenant for quiet enjoyment, the lessee may restrain such action without showing the extent of his injuries where and Stadden, the commissioners proceeded to construct the feeder and the flumes. The manner in which they caused the flumes to be made disclosed the views entertained by the commissioners as to the rights of Green and Stadden and their assigns in the mode and manner of the use of the water reserved under the contract. The commissioners caused the flumes to be built with the stone bottom of the flume and the bottom of the feeder on an exact level. They caused to be framed in the mouth of each flume two gates, which could be raised or lowered. These gates could be shut entirely down and made to rest on the bottom of the flume, thereby, if both gates were down, excluding all water from the flume; or the gates, or either of them, could be partially raised, in which event the water would flow into the flume at the bottom thereof. The gates provided the means of controlling and directing the flow of the water from the feeder into the flume, and were placed there for that purpose when the flumes were constructed. If controlled by the gates, the water would enter the flume at the bottom whenever allowed to flow into it at all, and the water would always have a head of water in proportion to the depth of the water in the feeder. If the flumes thus operating should withdraw the water during the season of navigation to such an extent as to reduce the water in the canal to a depth of 6 feet or less, the commissioners could, in pursuance of the conditions of the reservation by Green and Stadden, close the gates some injury must necessarily result from it. Tipping v. Eckersley, 2 Kay & J. 264.

IV. Limitation of rights.

a. As to use.

1. General rules.

In granting water rights the purpose for which they are to be used is frequently mentioned, and the question then arises as to whether or not the grant was limited to such use, so that upon its abandonment the right will revert to the grantor.

The grantor of an easement to use water is entitled to restrict such use to specified purposes, such as cabinet making and furnace operations. Mandeville v. Comstock, 9 Mich. 536.

But in grants of water rights where the construction is doubtful, that interpretation should be preferred which will give the grantee an unrestricted, rather than a limited, right to the quantity granted. Fisk v. Wilber, 7 Barb. 395.

When by the express terms of a deed an appurtenant right to use water is limited to particular purposes, not merely to a quantity measured thereby, and the grantor reserves the water for all other purposes, upon the permanent cessation of the designated enterprises the use of the entire water reverts to the grantor. Clement v. Gould, 61 Vt. 573, 18 Atl. 453.

The mere mention of the mills to be operated by water granted does not limit the water to such mills if the limitation is not made in terms. Fisk v. Wilber, 7 Barb. 395.

When the grant of an easement in the use of water is measured by the height of the dam, it is no objection to the assertion of the right that the capacity of the mill has been enlarged, so long as no more water is used than the dam affords. Casler v. Shipman, 35 N. Y. 533.

Conditions in a deed which relate to grantee's rights to the use of water at different conditions of the river do not relate to the manner in which, or the place from which, it should be taken, but have reference to the amount granted. Hammond v. Woodman, 41 Me. 177, 66 Am. Dec. 219.

The owner of a water power has a right to change his wheel and the manner of using the water, provided he uses no more than formerly; and it is immaterial that thereby the ready and easy way for determining the amount of water used is destroyed. Miller v. Lapham, 46 Vt. 525.

In general neither a granted nor a reserved water privilege is restricted to the purposes expressly specified, but these are rather to be deemed measures of the quantity permitted to be used, unless the language employed evinces a clear intention to limit the use to particular purposes, and the actual use has been uniformly consistent with such limitation. Adams v. Warner, 23 Vt. 395.

Although one reason, to wit: That it is more favorable to the grantee, for construing a grant of water privileges for specified purposes, that such purposes measure the quantity rather than restrict the use, if controlling in the construction of a reservation expressed in similar terms, leads to the contrary conclusion,—really that rule is one of strict equivocation, applying only where the words employed bear either of two interpretations equally well, and there is no other legitimate mode of determining the equi-poise. Ibid.

The controlling reason for construing a grant or reservation of water privileges for designated purposes, that these measure the quantity that may be used, rather than limit the use, is because it is all important to the interests of business and to the owners of water power that there should be as little restriction upon its use as is consistent with the rights of other adjacent proprietors. Ibid.

Whenever the description in a conveyance of water power is in such terms as to leave it in doubt which species of grant is intended, the general rule is to interpret the deed so as to make the privilege conveyed a grant of a certain quantity of power, and not a power limited to a specific use. Pratt v. Lamson, 2 Allen, 275.

If it is doubtful from the terms of a grant whether the kind of mill or particular machinery mentioned therein, for which water is to be furnished, indicates the quantity of water and measures the extent of the power intended to be conveyed, or is referred to as a limit of the use to the particular kind of mill or specified machinery, the former construction will be favored. Carleton Mills Co. v. Silver, 82 Me. 215, 8 L. R. A. 446, 19 Atl. 154.

Where the grant is of a water power in terms described, and where the privilege itself is the principle subject, if it is left in doubt whether it is a grant of a sufficient quantity of water to

of the flumes and thereby retain the water in the feeder so far as might be necessary to maintain the requisite depth in the navigable channel of the canal. The flumes remained as originally constructed, the gates constituting the means of controlling the inflow of the water, and the owners of the Green and Stadden water powers were supplied with water in this manner during all the time after the construction of the canal until the weirs were installed. This was the condition and the mode of operation in force long before and at the time the Ottawa Hydraulic Company leased water rights from the canal commissioners, and so remained after the hydraulic company became interested in the quantity of water withdrawn from the feeder by these flumes until the weirs were designed and installed,—a period of more than forty years. The contract between the hydraulic company and the canal commissioners was entered into in 1852, and from thenceforward until the weir was installed—a period of more than forty-eight years—the assigns of Green and Stadden continued to receive water from the feeder through the flumes in this manner. For a period of over sixty years the flumes have been maintained in the same condition, and those entitled to the water power have enjoyed such rights in the same beneficial mode and manner.

The manner of the construction of the flumes, the acts and conduct of the commissioners continuously since then, the uninterrupted enjoyment of the benefits thereof carry a particular kind of mill, making reference to such mill to indicate and measure the quantity of water power intended to be conveyed, or whether it is a grant of the use of the water to carry such particular kind of mill only, the former construction will be most favored because in general it is most beneficial to the grantee, by allowing a latitude of choice in the use he may make of it without being more onerous to the grantor. Ashley v. Pease, 18 Pick. 268.

A deed which leaves doubtful whether a reservation of a certain quantity of water for certain purposes intended to prescribe the uses to which it was to be put will be construed as defining the quantity only; so that a reservation in a grant of "a sufficient quantity for two runs of stones in said gristmill" would retain to the grantor the quantity of water necessary for the purpose specified, which could be used in any manner or for any purpose convenient for him. Dewey v. Williams, 40 N. H. 222, 77 Am. Dec. 708.

Where the right to use water for a specific purpose is granted without being appurtenant to a grant of land, the presumption is strong that the grant is intended to be limited to the purpose named; but if the grant is appurtenant to the land conveyed by the same deed, unless the contrary intention is clear the use designated will be taken merely as the measure of the water granted which the grantee may use for that or for other purposes. Garland v. Hodsdon, 46 Me. 511.

A clause in a deed conveying a mill and water power to run the same, excepting and prohibiting the use of the water for any other purpose than to run the said mill, which is made in favor of a grantee of a mill on the same stream, is a mere prohibition of the use of the thing granted, and is void. Craig v. Welles, 11 N. Y. 315.

But a proviso in a grant conveying the right to draw water from a gristmill flume and pond at all times for the purpose of manufacturing every description of textiles, that in case the grantees draw more water than they previously had a right to then they shall not take the additional water so as to interfere with the privileges reserved to the gristmill, nor those belonging to the sawmill of a third party, is not an exception so inconsistent with the general grant as to be void. Adams v. Warner, 23 Vt. 395.

Express limitation.

The language may be such in any grant as to limit the grantee to the specified use.

If a grantee of a water right for use in a paper mill covenants that the water shall be used for no other purpose, he will not be permitted, against the objection of the grantor, to change the use to a cotton mill. Wells v. Chapman, 13 Barb. 561.

Under a grant of "a water privilege for tanning purposes in all its various branches," the grantee can use the easement in the water power created in the dam previously constructed by the grantor only for the specified purpose. Deshon v. Porter, 38 Me. 289.

The grant of a right to draw water from an upper dam "for the use of all tanning purposes" is a limitation to tanning purposes, and not a measure of power. Rackliff v. Rackliff, 96 Me. 261, 52 Atl. 839.

A grant of a water power may be limited to the carrying of the particular mill then standing, or one of the same kind and capacity which may replace it. Ashley v. Pease, 18 Pick. 268.

A water grant reciting that it is for the purpose of having a clothier's business where the grantor lives, and conveying a right to take water from his gristmill pond sufficient to run a fulling mill and shears, reserving enough, when the supply is scanty, for the gristmill, with habendum, so long as the grantee, his heirs and assigns, carry on the clothier's business and bear a sixth of the cost of repairing the dam and flume, does not authorize the use, even of no greater quantity of water, for any other purpose than that specified. Shed v. Leslie, 22 Vt. 498.

When a deed of a mill site, in unambiguous terms, declares that it is for the express purpose of erecting a gristmill and textile factory, with the right to draw from flume and dam enough water to grind grain and weave cloth, and "for these purposes only," with a reservation of the right to take water from the flume for a sawmill, or any other purpose not injurious to the grantee as a miller or manufacturer of cloth, the water privilege is limited to the particular uses specified, and these are not a mere measure of the quantity usable. Clement v. Gould, 61 Vt. 573, 18 Atl. 453.

A grant of land through which runs a stream of water with the privilege of building a fulling mill and of taking water "as much as shall by the owners of the water, the knowledge and acquiescence on the part of the hydraulic company, constitute a practical exposition and construction by the parties of their rights under the Green and Stadden contract. In view of the great length of time, the uniform and continuous action and acquiescence of all the parties, the chancellor should have regarded the rights of all the parties as fixed by the construction which they have themselves placed upon the contract. They have determined and settled their respective rights by acts and conduct throughout so many years that the court should refuse to consider whether, under the contract, the commissioners have power to so change the flumes by weirs as to effectuate a radical change in the flow of the water into the flumes, to the injury of the appellant Merrifield. It is a doctrine frequently declared in cases where the rights and powers of contracting parties are the subject of investigation that great weight will be given to such acts and conduct of the parties as are indicative of the construction they themselves have placed on their rights and powers under the contract, and not inconsistent with a fair and reasonable rendering of the contract itself. In 9 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 588, it is said: "Where the parties to a contract have given it a particular construction, such construction will generally be adopted by the court in giving effect to its provisions; and the subsequent acts of the parties showing the construction they have put upon the agreement them-be necessary to carry on a good, well-built, over-shot fulling mill at any time when the grantee shall have occasion to use the fulling mill," limits the right to use the water to that purpose, and it cannot be used for the purposes of an oil mill. The court says that a construction which would permit a change of use if no greater quantity were needed is founded in uncertainty, and must be pre-eminently a source of litigation. It is much preferable to let the parties explain themselves in explicit language, and at least not to assume voluntarily as a rule one that would be productive of controversy and probable injustice. Strong v. Benedict, 5 Conn. 210.

A reservation of sufficient water at all times for a gristmill then existing or such as may be erected in its stead, the quantity whereof shall be sufficient for two runs of stones, reserves water only for the use of a gristmill, and the grantee may use the water without restriction unless it is so applied by grantor. Garland v. Hodsdon, 46 Me. 511.

A lease of a building "for the purpose of carrying on the foundry business," "with the right to take water power from the wheel and shaft that now carries the fan bellows" in the lessor's adjoining shop "at all times when there is water sufficient to carry a fan bellows and blow for the stack in said foundry," gives the lessee no right to use the power for any other purpose than the fan bellows, so as to impede the use of the lessor's fan bellows. Sibley v. Hoar, 4 Gray, 222.

A devise of a furnace and "privilege of using water to blow with" will carry only the right to use the water for that purpose, although in the operation of the furnace it is also necessary to use power for drilling and grinding castings, and the devisee under lease from the devisor had used the power to some extent for that purpose, although the word "blow" is used by furnace men to cover all the operations of the furnace. Lincoln v. Lincoln, 110 Mass. 449.

A conveyance of water for purposes of a fulling mill and shearing machine, "but for no other purposes whatever," limits the right to use the water to those purposes. DeWitt v. Harvey, 4 Gray, 486.

Measure of power.

Conversely, the language may be such as plainly to indicate that a measure of power only was intended so that the use may be changed at any time.

A reservation in a lease of water power of a prior right to use sufficient water to run a cotton factory of certain dimensions does not limit the use of the reserved water to a cotton factory, but it may be applied to any use requiring no more than the quantity reserved. Biglow v. Battle, 15 Mass. 313.

Under a grant of water sufficient to operate a sawmill at all times when there shall be more than enough to drive a gristmill with three run of stone, the grantor's right is not restricted to the particular use mentioned, but he may use that quantity of water for another purpose. Cromwell v. Selden, 3 N. Y. 258.

A grant of the privilege to draw water sufficient to carry a water wheel with 12 feet head and fall for two common blacksmith bellows, and, should the head and fall be less than that, sufficient to carry one bellows twelve hours in twenty-four, is a measure of the power conveyed, and not a limitation upon the use to which it can be applied,—especially where the grantee is the owner of the soil through which the water flows, so that he is entitled to the flow of the stream. Tourtellot v. Phelps, 4 Gray, 370.

Under a reserved water right sufficient for a gristmill with three run of stones, quantity, not use, is measured, and the water may be employed to drive any machinery in the mill the owner cares to apply it to. Albee v. Huntley, 56 Vt. 454.

A reservation in a grant of so much water as may be necessary to supply and work continuously a No. 5 hydraulic ram is not lost by the abandonment of the use of the ram, as a reservation of water power for certain machinery is not to be held as fixing the manner of its use, but as fixing the measure of the quantity of water reserved. Walker v. Lillingston, 137 Cal. 401, 70 Pac. 282.

A grant of water power limited merely to as much water as will flow through an aperture of 200 square inches under a head of 15 feet leaves the grantee at liberty to determine for himself the manner in which the water shall be used and the details in the construction of the machinery to use it. Cummings v. Blanchard, 67 N. H. 268, 36 Atl. 556.

A grant of a certain water privilege for the purpose of propelling a factory and its machinery and appurtenances, the building to be of a certain size with necessary appurtenances and machinery, will be construed to measure the selves are to be looked to by the court, and in some cases may be controlling." The general principle there stated has been approved in many cases decided in this court, and cited in note 45 to the text, and also collected in 2 Ill. Cyc. Digest, 677.

The flumes as constructed and so long allowed to remain and be enjoyed by the owners of the water power, secured to such owners, at all times when they were entitled to receive water at all, such head of water as the depth of water in the feeder above the bottom of the flumes would afford. The weir practically deprived them of water and of this head at all times when there was less than 3.2 feet of water in the feeder; and when there was more than that depth of water in the feeder the weir deprived the appellant Merrifield of the head, and substituted therefor an additional quantity of water. It is not and cannot be contended that, under a proper construction of the contract, the owners of the Green and Stadden water power were not entitled to water at all times when there was no more than 3.2 feet of water in the feeder. During the season of navigation this depth of water in the feeder may be requisite to secure the necessary quantity in the canal for navigation purposes, but the weir operates on the theory that this arbitrary depth of water must be maintained at all times in the feeder, and, as a consequence, if installed, would deprive the appellant Merrifield of any water whatever unless there remained more than 3.2 feet in the feeder, whether quantity of water, and will not limit the use of water to carry only such machinery as may be in the main building, if some of the machinery is in an annex and no more power is required to propel it than if it were in the main building, where it could all be placed. Carleton Mills Co. v. Silver, 82 Me. 215, 8 L. R. A. 446, 19 Atl. 154.

The quantity of water granted, and not the purpose to which it shall be applied, is referred to in a grant of water enough, applied to an overshot wheel, to run a gang of thirty marble saws, or a six-horse power. Kaler v. Beaman, 49 Me. 207.

Under a grant of sufficient water for certain mills and machines, grantee may take a quantity not exceeding that required for the machines mentioned in the grant. Garland v. Hodsdon, 46 Me. 511.

A grantee may use the water for any purpose except that against which he particularly covenanted, under a grant of a certain amount of water, or such amount as grantee might require to drive a cupola furnace fan, with the reservation that none of said water should be used for certain purposes. Iszard v. Mays Landing Water Power Co. 81 N. J. Eq. 511, Affirmed in 34 N. J. Eq. 556.

A grant of the right to use water from a pond for the purpose of carrying on certain works, in such quantity as will be sufficient for carrying on and working the furnace situated between the factory and the pond, and for which purpose said water is now used, and no further or greater quantity, provided always that the right so as aforesaid granted shall cease at all times whenever the furnace is in blast, is limited only as to the quantity of water, and not to the purpose of the use. Hall v. Sterling Iron & R. Co. 148 N. Y. 432, 42 N. E. 1056, Affirming 74 Hun, 10, 26 N. Y. Supp. 143.

A grant of the right to erect a mill on a stream, and of the use of the stream "so long as the grantee shall keep a gristmill there in good repair," is not defeated by the fact that while the mill is kept there in good repair part of the power is used for another purpose so that many persons are unable to have their grain ground at the mill. Hadley v. Hadley Mfg. Co. 4 Gray, 140.

A reservation in a grant of 1½ acres of land on which a tannery is erected, and of a certain well and water course laid down for the purpose of supplying the tannery with water, does not limit the use of the well to the purposes of the tannery; but it may be applied to any use which the grantor desires. Borst v. Emple, 5 N. Y. 33.

Mention of particular use.

A mere mention of a particular use is not of itself sufficient to make that use exclusive.

The rule is stated in Hartford Woolen Co. v. Bugbee (Vt.) 56 Atl. 344, as follows: In a grant or reservation of a water right reference to an existing use will be considered as a measure of quantity, merely, unless a contrary intention is apparent from the language used or from the surrounding circumstances; and it was held that a grant with a grist mill of "sufficient water to carry the grist mill when in proper repair as it now is, to wit, to carry four run of stones, corn cracker, smutmill and two bolts," gave a right to draw a certain quantity of water without regard to the use.

A conveyance of land together with a grist-mill privilege, "being the first on the stream for two run of stone," does not limit the use of the water to the mill then standing, but may be used upon the land for any purpose. Mudge v. Salisbury, 110 N. Y. 413, 18 N. E. 249.

Reservation in a grant of a water privilege of so much water as is necessary for the use of a forge and two blacksmith's bellows does not limit the use of the water reserved to the sole object specified. Olmsted v. Loomis, 9 N. Y. 423, Affirming Olmsted v. Loomis, 6 Barb. 152, where it was held that water reserved for carrying a forge and two blacksmith's bellows may be applied to propelling a paper mill, where the objects mentioned simply designated the quantity.

A grant of a mill with the right to the race and privilege of taking water "with the exclusive privilege of grinding grain" does not limit the grantee's right to the grinding of grain, but gives him the exclusive right to such use as against the owners of other rights to water-power. Hartwell v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 50 Hun, 497, 3 N. Y. Supp. 452.

A reservation in a grant of a water right of "water for carding machines and fulling mill," is not a limitation of the purposes to which the water may be applied; but a quantity of water equal to that used for those purposes at the time of the grant may be used by those claiming under the reservation, for any other manu-such quantity was needed to maintain the necessary navigable depth in the canal or was otherwise necessary or useful for the purposes of the state. The contract reserves to Green and Stadden and their assigns the said one-fourth portion of the water in the feeder, diminished in just proportion by leakage, evaporation, etc., necessarily incident to a good and workmanlike dam and structure, etc., and useful to the state, "after the necessary quantity has been drawn out for the purposes of navigation," with the further limitation that the reservation should not authorize Green and Stadden or their assigns to so draw the water from the feeder during the "season of navigation" of the canal as to reduce the water in the canal to a depth of less than 6 feet. The weir retains in the feeder at all times in each year, after the season of navigation has passed, water that the contract reserves to the use of the owners of the Green and Stadden water power, and even during the season of navigation may prevent the flume from receiving water that is reserved by the contract, and not needed to remain in the feeder in order to retain the requisite depth of water in the canal that may be needed for the purposes of navigation. The weir prevented the rightful passage of water into the flume, and injuriously deprived the appellant Merrifield of the full use and benefits of the water power to which he was entitled. The chancellor therefore erred in holding the commissioners had power to place and maintain the weir in the flume.

The decree will be reversed, and the cause facturing purpose. Wakely v. Davidson, 26 N. Y. 387.

An owner of two adjoining tracts, who conveys one and reserves the right "to all water which the grantee shall not use" for a cistern on the granted premises, has no cause of complaint so long as the grantee's use is reasonable, although the manner of its use is changed, if the quantity appropriated is not increased. Willcox v. Kendall, 63 N. H. 609, 3 Atl. 633.

A grant of water privileges for the purpose of a sawmill measures the extent of the power intended to be granted, and not a grant of water to drive a particular mill, because it is most favorable to grantee without being more onerous to grantor. Johnston v. Hyde, 33 N. J. Eq. 632.

The grantor of a mill privilege reserving to himself the right to take water for the benefit of his mill has a right to change the mode in which he uses the water, and may make various changes and alterations in his machinery and gates, provided he takes no more water than was necessary to work his mill before he made the changes. Johnson v. Rand, 6 N. H. 22.

But a reservation in a grant of water rights of sufficient power to run machinery then in a factory, or which may thereafter be placed therein, is, as to the additional machinery, a limitation to that actually placed in such factory. Groat v. Moak, 94 N. Y. 115.

Although as to the machinery then in a factory it is a measure or limit to quantity merely, and the power may be used elsewhere. Ibid.

It requires very little in addition to the mention of a particular use, however, as already indicated by the cases cited supra, to limit the right to the water to that use. There is, however, a New Hampshire case which carries the doctrine that express mention of a use will not limit the grantee to that use rather farther than the other courts have sanctioned, and farther than the language of the limitation would seem to sanction.

A grant of water "for the benefit of clothing works only" is not a conditional limitation by which the grant is forfeited whenever the water is applied to a different purpose. Dow v. Edes, 58 N. H. 193.

It would seem that the language was as explicit as it could be made, and that when it was limited to that purpose "only" any attempt to use it for other purposes could receive no sanction.

Present use.

A grant of a mill with the use of the water in the raceway "as the same is now used and enjoyed" is a limitation upon quantity, and not upon the manner of use; so that the character and location of the same may be changed provided more than the quantity of water used at the time of the grant is not required. Terry v. Smith, 47 Hun, 333.

A grant of the right to draw water "for the use of a mill as it now is," is a limitation as to the quantity of water granted; rather than as to the manner or place in which it is to be used. Fowler v. Kent (N. H.) 52 Atl. 554.

Where land is granted for a mill site together with the right to use the water of the stream for the mills situated thereon, these words are not considered as restrictive of the general right to use the water for a mill which may afterwards be erected there. Ashley v. Pease, 18 Pick. 268.

One purchasing a farm and an artificial water course flowing across it is not limited in the use of the water course to the uses to which it was put at the time of the grant, but acquires the right to it as it existed at that time, and to a continuance of the flow of the water. Wardle v. Brocklehurst, 29 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 145, 6 Jur. N. S. 321, 1 El. & El. 1085, 8 Week. Rep. 243, Affirming 1 El. & El. 1058, 6 Jur. N. S. 319, 8 Week. Rep. 214.

That the water power created by a dam and granted by a deed is to be used immediately for particular purposes is not inconsistent with a change of use, where no change is forbidden. Hathaway v. Mitchell, 34 Mich. 164.

General grant.

Under a grant of so much water as will operate a mill on premises conveyed, the grantee is entitled to use the water for any purpose he sees fit provided the quantity used is not increased and the change in use does not prejudice the rights of others. Fountain v. Perth Amboy, 60 N. J. L. 410, 38 Atl. 676.

A grantor may change the application, but not the extent, of his use of water power reserved in a grant of the use and benefit of water from his privilege, when it can be conveniently spared from his mill. Hanna v. Clarke, 81 Gratt. 86.

The grant of a mill site on a privilege being will be remanded for such other and further proceedings consistent with this opinion as may to justice and equity appertain.

A petition for rehearing was denied on December 22, 1904, when Wilkin, Cartwright, and Hand, JJ., handed down the following dissenting opinion:

The principal legal questions in dispute in this case are whether appellant Merrifield is entitled to draw from the feeder a certain proportion of all the water flowing in Fox river, or only of the water flowing in the feeder, and whether he has a prescriptive right to draw from the feeder as much water as was drawn therefrom by himself and his predecessors in title for a period of years. Both these questions are decided against him. It is held that the rights of the parties were settled in the action at law, and that it became the duty of of the canal commissioners to take such steps as may be found proper to control and restrict the use of water by him to the proportion to which he is entitled. So far we concur in the foregoing opinion, but we do not understand that the commissioners are restricted to the use of gates because they were in use when Merrifield and his predecessors were permitted to take as much water as they chose, and took more than they were entitled to. In our opinion, the commissioners may adopt and install any device that will accomplish the desired result. What Merrifield is entitled to is a definite share of the water power supplied by the feeder, and, if he gets it in any way for practical use on his water wheels, he has

where a sawmill stands will not restrict the grantee from using the site for other purposes than a sawmill, provided, only, that he does not by a new use interfere with rights acquired by long-continued uninterrupted user, and the compacts of previous proprietors. Hines v. Robinson, 57 Me. 324, 99 Am. Dec. 772.

After the grant of a lower mill on a race with a joint interest in the water flowing therein, the owner of the upper mill cannot use the water flowing in the race for any purpose other than power, to the injury of the lower grantee. But such unlawful use will not work a forfeiture to the right of water which can be taken advantage of by a third person who has diverted the water from the stream. Butler Hard Rubber Co. v. Newark, 61 N. J. L. 32, 40 Atl. 224.

Application to other than power purposes.

A grantee of the right to use water for mill purposes, who is required to return it to the stream so that it will reach the canal of the grantor, is confined to the contemplated use in connection with his riparian property, and has no right to collect the water for any other purpose. Hall v. Ionia, 38 Mich. 493.

While the grant by deed of a mill privilege is not limited to the damming of waters of the stream for the purpose of running a sawmill, on the other hand, it does not include the right to withdraw all the water that collects in the pond and sell it to the inhabitants of a city for domestic purposes. Gloucester Water Supply Co. v. Gloucester, 179 Mass. 365, 60 N. E. 977.

Where the question presented is as to the right to take any part of the waters of a spring for domestic purposes when the grant under which the right of use is claimed recites that the water is to be used for running a gristmill, the fact that the quantity of water taken is very small is immaterial. Woodring v. Hollenbach, 202 Pa. 65, 51 Atl. 318.

Acquiescence in change.

A water-power owner acquiesces in grantee's new application of his power when he receives the stipulated compensation and offers no objection thereto for two years. Izard v. Mays Landing Water-Power Co. 31 N. J. Eq. 511, Affirmed in 34 N. J. Eq. 556.

b. As to premises.

One who grants to another the right to dig a race on his land and take water from a creek for mill purposes in consideration of the grantee's building a mill at a point where their lands join is entitled to a reconveyance of the right granted; and the grantee will be enjoined from setting up the deed as a defense to an action at law for diversion, where the grantee built the mill on other lands belonging to him, and took water directly from the lake instead of the creek which formed its outlet, and discharged the water into another stream without returning it to the bed of the creek. Jacox v. Clark, Walk. Ch. (Mich.) 508.

A grant of a right to draw from a canal seven mill powers of water "to be used upon the following described lots," or "upon such other lots or parcels of land" as the grantee shall designate, does not confer an absolute title to the quantity for use upon the designated lots. Minneapolis Mill Co. v. Hobart, 26 Minn. 37, 1 N. W. 45.

A grant of land "with the privilege of drawing water" from a reservoir does not annex the right to use the water to the land so granted so that the right is lost in case, for the improvement of the property, the dam is taken down and reconstructed so as to overflow the land granted. De Witt v. Harvey, 4 Gray, 486.

An exception in a deed of a mill with water privileges denying the use in times of low water when it is wanted for designated works across the stream, being a measure of the quantity required for the superior use, and not a restriction of such use to specified purposes or in a particular way, the dominant owner, by removing his works from their original site, and reconstructing them further down stream, carries his privilege with him, and does not lose the right to complain of an undue diversion of the water by the servient proprietor. Rood v. Johnson, 26 Vt. 64.

c. As to quantity.

A measure of the water granted is contained in a grant of water as now carried in the trunk or feeder, and equity will restrain grantee from taking a greater amount than the quantity carried in the trunk as it existed at the time of the grant. Jaqui v. Johnson, 27 N. J. Eq. 526, Confirmed in 27 N. J. Eq. 552.

no cause for complaint. The evidence shows that a proper distribution of the water power by means of gates operated by an individual is not practicable. The amount of water flowing through a given space under gates depends upon velocity as well as volume, and is governed largely by the head or pressure of the water above. The head is lowered by opening the gates and releasing a portion of the water, and it is constantly changing in some degree. To make and maintain a just apportionment would require the presence and personal attention of an expert. The hydraulic engineer employed by Merrifield testified for him that the theory or system adopted by the commissioners for an automatic distribution of the water according to the rights of the parties was sound and correct, but that the form of the weir should be different, and present a vertical side to the flow instead of a sloping one. Perhaps the form was objectionable, but, according to the evidence, there never was a time when the water did not flow over it, nor when Merrifield did not get more water and water power than his just proportion. The crest of the weir was 3.56 feet below the crest of the dam, and the evidence did not show that there had been or would be a time when water would not flow over the weir. If there was some loss of head as compared with the use of gates, it was fully compensated for by the increased amount of water, and the full share of water power was furnished. If there was a better form of weir, it might properly be adopted, but Merrifield himself proved that a weir is the proper means of controlling the distribution of the power.

A limitation in a grant of water privileges that it shall not be used for any purpose which would in any manner interfere with grantor's mills, does not refer to quantity of water, but forbids competition in business. Klaer v. Ridgway, 86 Pa. 529.

A reservation in a grant of water power of sufficient water to run machinery in a factory does not limit the grantor to the dam at its then height, but he may increase the height of the dam in order to obtain the required power. Groat v. Moak, 94 N. Y. 115, affirming 26 Hun, 380.

A grant contains a measure of power, and is restricted substantially to the amount of water sufficient fully to operate a tannery at or about the time of the grant of "a right to draw water from the sawmill flume sufficient to carry on the business of tanning in said yard, . . . the grantee to make one fourth of all repairs necessary on the dam, . . . and grantee may use more water than aforesaid when there is waste water running over the dam, . . . said grantor retaining the right to . . . use all the water except that herein granted if he choose." Covel v. Hart, 56 Me. 518.

The grantee of a certain amount of water cannot obtain a prescriptive right to the excess thereof of which he may have had use. Stearns v. Richmond Paper Mfg. Co. 86 Va. 1034, 11 S. E. 1057.

A grant of a flouring mill together with the privilege of taking from the race 375 cubic inches of water under 13 feet head, "when there shall be so much water in the race," limits the grantee to that quantity under any head up to 13 feet. Torrance v. Conger, 46 N. Y. 340.

The right of the purchaser of lands and part of a bulkhead, with the privilege of drawing from his portion of such bulkhead as much water as he, his heirs, or assigns, "might need for whatever machinery might be erected on such premises," is not to be measured by the amount of water which could be drawn through a 9 ft. opening therein as it existed at the time of such grant, but by the necessities of the machinery thereafter to be erected. Valley Pulp & Paper Co. v. West, 58 Wis. 599, 17 N. W. 554.

d. Improved machinery.

A grant of sufficient water to run a certain number of stone will carry a right to water sufficient at the time of the grant, although by subsequent improvements the same quantity will operate a larger number. Hartwell v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 50 Hun, 497, 3 N. Y. Supp. 452.

The grantee of an undivided half in land and a mill on one side of a stream "with a privilege to draw water . . . sufficient for one tub-wheel," etc., which has been carried off by a freshet but replaced at time of conveyance, acquires the right to use so much water as would be sufficient for a tub wheel of the capacity of the old one, although he is not restricted in the use of that quantity to this particular kind of wheel. Loverin v. Walker, 44 N. H. 489.

A reservation in a grant of water power of "the first and exclusive right of the use of sufficient water to carry a fulling mill and three breast wheels, each 12 feet in diameter and 15 feet in length, with the machinery which may be connected with them," does not limit the use of the water to breast wheels, but the same amount may be applied by means of a turbine wheel. Coburn v. Middlesex, 142 Mass. 264, 7 N. E. 849.

Under a deed which grants the right to take water for the operation of three runs of mill stones, together with the machinery ordinarily and necessarily used in running a flouring mill, and which defines in the habendum clause "a run of mill stones" as a power sufficient to grind 13 bushels of wheat per hour, or as 15 horse power if used for other purposes, and which further states that the entire power is divided into 66 runs of mill stones, none of which are to have priority against the other in low stages of water, the grantee is entitled to the maximum of 15 horse power per run of mill stones, although insufficient to grind 13 bushels of wheat per hour by the new machinery which he has put in; and in times of low water his right is limited to 3-66 of the existing power. Powers v. Hibbard, 114 Mich. 533, 72 N. W. 339.

A grant made to the owner of a paper mill of the right to water from a race or pond sufficient to propel four 300-pound engines contemplates an amount of water sufficient to operate such machinery as existed at the time of the grant; and the right to use such amount is not affected or impaired by the subsequent use of improved wheels, or by a change in the head or fall which operated them. Grisswold v. Hodgman, 2 Hun. 97.

A grant of power sufficient to run a certain number of spindles "using a wheel as large in proportion to the head and flow as used" in a certain mill named "of the same construction, unless an improvement is made before the wheel shall be constructed," fixes the measure of power to which the grantee is entitled at the time of the construction of the wheel, and is not to be diminished by improvements in wheels or machinery since that time. Agawam Canal Co. v. Southworth Mfg. Co. 121 Mass. 98.

A right reserved to a dominant mill, of enough water to operate it, is controlled by the circumstances at its inception, and, after improved machinery which does the same work in half the time has been put in the mill, the owner is not justified in using, during a part of the time, a greater quantity of water than the old machinery required, on the excuse that by speedier and more efficient operation he used no more water in the whole twenty-four hours than the quantity measured by the reservation; because the servient mill owner is entitled to a steady power, and to know what he can rely on and forecast accordingly. Miller v. Lapham, 44 Vt. 416.

But when a deed of a mill site and water privileges provides that, "in case there is not at any time a full supply of water for the simultaneous operations of the works connected with the dam, a gristmill shall draw its requisite quantity of water exclusive of all other works," there is secured to such gristmill, not merely a right to use the water exclusively in the manner and for the time it was then customary to use it, but a right to use the water in quantity as it was used and for such time in seasons of scarcity, as the business of the mill required. And if a substituted wheel does the work in a third of the time and with less water than the one it replaced, there is no infraction of the covenants of the deed provided such work is the same in character as was done when the deed was made. Howe Scale Co. v. Terry, 47 Vt. 109.

Where a declaration alleged the demise to a mill owner of a sufficient supply of surplus water for four run of stone, and the wrongful and injurious diversion of a portion thereof by the lessor, a plea is not sufficient which sets forth an agreement by both parties to put in improved water wheels, acted upon by lessor only, and averring that, had lessee put in the improved wheels according to agreement, the water would have been sufficient to run his four run of stone, but which did not aver that lessor used less, or no more, water with his new wheels than he was entitled to use with the old ones under the lease. Watts v. Robson, 38 U. C. Q. B. 570.

e. As to time.

Parties have the right to run their factory as many hours a day as they consider proper where they have a grant of water for the purposes of their factory with no limitation therein upon the number of hours per day in which they can run it. Carleton Mills Co. v. Silver, 82 Me. 215, 8 L. R. A. 446, 19 Atl. 154.

A grant by one owning the right to flow a portion of land for a mill pond for the whole year, and an additional portion for part of the year, of a certain quantity of water for twelve hours per day, will, as against the grantor, give 67 L. R. A.

the right to use the power the whole time; but, as against third persons, that right is limited by the extent to which the land may be flowed. Phelps v. Tourtellot, 9 Gray, 102.

A grant between owners of a reservoir dam parcelling the right to use the water giving a right to use so many feet per second during working hours will be construed as referring to the working hours of the mills then located on the stream, and will not be extended so as to cover a use for a mill erected for the purpose of using the power both day and night. Binney v. Phoenix Cotton Mfg. Co. 128 Mass. 496.

The owner of a mill pond, who has granted to another a portion of the residue of the water power afforded by such pond remaining after he has reserved a certain quantity for his own use, is not entitled to draw his preferred water power from the pond at all times of day and night without being required to hold it even for a short time so as to afford a surplus for his grantee, in the absence of express stipulations in the grant giving him that right, but will be restricted to a reasonable use thereof so as not to prejudice or injure the other in the use of his residue; and such reasonable use is not to be measured alone by the necessities of his business, but also by the condition or stage of the water and the rights of the parties with reference to customs among mill owners above and below as to the use of the water power of such stream; and where there is a custom of such mill owners to shut down their gates by night to accumulate a head of water, if the grantor runs his mill by night so as to draw off the water in the pond leaving no head from which the grantee can take his portion during the daytime, such grantor cannot maintain an action against his grantee for taking and using of the water in the pond an amount equal to his portion if the same had been used in a proper and reasonable manner, even though it deprives such grantor of his preferred quantity. Batavia Mfg. Co. v. Newton Wagon Co. 91 Ill. 280.

V. Protecting rights.

a. By repairing works.

A grant of the right to draw water from a dam does not bind the grantor to maintain the dam for the benefit of the grantee, even though the deed runs to the latter and his heirs forever. Trudeau v. Field, 69 Vt. 446, 38 Atl. 162.

But an understanding in a lease of water power to a mill owner that the lessor is to keep the dam in such a state of repair as to insure to the lessee the power demised to him may be shown by the lessor's reservation of water rights in himself, and the retention by him of the title, possession, control, and use of the dam. Crawford v. Parsons, 63 N. H. 488.

Deeds poll of water rights in a milldam, providing for payment by the grantees of certain proportions of the expense of keeping the dam in repair, impose no obligations to contribute to the cost of building a new dam when the existing one decays or is destroyed. Trudeau v. Field, 69 Vt. 446, 38 Atl. 162.

A grant of the right to draw water from a milldam confers on the grantee no right to exact contribution toward the cost of rebuilding the dam from one succeeding to the interest of the grantor through deeds which did not impose such a liability, although his immediate grantor exacted it from him, for there is no privity between these two. Ibid.

A conveyance of land and certain water rights with a stipulation in the deed that the grantee should contribute to the keeping up of the dam belonging to the grantor in proportion to the amount of water used, imposes a burden which is a condition of the grant of the water, and runs with the land, and binds the subsequent grantees or mortgagees thereof. Maxon v. Lane, 102 Ind. 384, 1 N. E. 796.

Under a covenant by grantees to pay the ratable share of the expenses of keeping a dam and raceway in repair in proportion to the number of square inches of water by them owned or used, the ratio of contribution is the proportion the water owned or used bears to the whole amount of water used from the power by the proprietors and their several grantees and lessees, and not the proportion to the whole amount of water available,—especially where such was the contemporaneous construction thereof by the parties. Woolscroft v. Norton, 15 Wis. 198.

A conveyance, by the owner of waterworks, of land for mill purposes together with water power thereof of a specified quantity and force, with a condition that the grantee should contribute a certain proportion of the expense of keeping such works in repair, and that the grantor might enter such premises at any time for that purpose, does not, in the absence of express stipulations on the subject, impose upon the owner of such waterworks the duty to bestow more than ordinary care and diligence in keeping the same in repair for the protection of the property of the grantee, or to afford him a continuous supply of water power of the requisite force and quantity. Sterling Hydraulic Co. v. Williams, 66 Ill. 393.

A mortgage on land having certain water rights subject to the burden imposed by the original grant and running with the land, that the owner should contribute to the keeping up of the dam in proportion to the amount of water used, is not affected by a subsequent contract entered into between the mortgagors and the owner of the water power interpreting the extent of that burden, to which the mortgagees were not parties; and the fact that the principal owners of the stock of the mortgagor corporation were the owners of the note and mortgage at the time the contract was entered into, and acted for the company in consummating the contract, does not estop them or their assigns from controverting it, in the absence of fraud or unfair dealing. Maxon v. Lane, 102 Ind. 384, 1 N. E. 796.

One who is entitled under a contract to use a millrace, one side of which is formed by planking nailed to the posts of another mill, and is also entitled to keep the race in repair, may, after the washing away of his flood gates, construct new ones from 1 to 3 feet distant from the place where the old ones were situated, and, in order to fasten them securely, use the posts of the mill beside the race, provided no special damage results from the acts, when the mill owner whose mill forms the side of the race purchases it after the other's contract has been made. Daniels v. Chaffin, 28 Iowa, 327.

Under a conveyance of land and a felling mill, giving to the grantee the privilege of supplying himself with water from a mill pond whenever needed, he may enter upon and repair the dam, taking stones and earth from the bed of the pond for that purpose, if necessary. Miller v. Scofield, 12 Conn. 335.

A grant of a right to use the water, the dam, and race appurtenant to a mill confers upon grantee the right merely to maintain the erections existing at time of grant. He may rebuild the dam on the same site, but may not erect other dams at other points on the creek, or increase the flowage. Switzer v. McCulloch, 78 Va. 777.

The grantee of a right to alter, repair, or renew the old feeder of water to which he acquires title may be restrained in equity from doing more than to maintain it in its present position with the capacity of carrying water as at the time of the grant. Jaqui v. Johnson, 27 N. J. Eq. 526, Confirmed in 27 N. J. Eq. 552, Affirming 25 N. J. Eq. 410, and Reversing 26 N. J. Eq. 321, where it was held that a grant of the right to take water from one pond to another "as now carried in the trunk or feeder," the grantee "to have the right at all times to enter upon the land of the grantor adjoining said trunk or feeder and alter, repair, or renew the same at his convenience," gives the right to change, not only the form, material, and size of the trunk, but its location, so far as necessary, to give the full benefit of the grant.

Where the lessee of a mill continues to go onto adjoining land to repair the banks of a stream that flows to his mill, after the expiration of his lease of such land, such conduct will be presumed to be under a claim of right, and not under the lease, and will be sufficient to establish such right by prescription. Clay v. Thackerah, 9 Car. & P. 47, 2 Moody & R. 244.

b. By action.

The grantor of a dam who has reserved the right to maintain a sluiceway "at or in" a certain place in grantee's dam may recover damages resulting from any wilful disturbance of that right by his grantee. Hammatt v. Russ, 16 Me. 171.

The grantor of a privilege of taking water for a specified purpose from a stream within the limits of a subsequent deed to another cannot sue for a misuser of the first grant. Waahabaugh v. Oyster, 18 Pa. 497.

A forfeiture of a grant of a dam and an appurtenant water right cannot be taken advantage of by assignees of the grantor's remaining interest, when such grantor in his assignment expressly excepted the rights of his grantees, and reserved water rights in himself, whenever any could be exercised without damage to his assignees. Peaslee v. Tower, 62 N. H. 434.

Equity has jurisdiction to grant relief against the diversion of water from a mill in violation of the terms of a deed, although the right has not been established at law. Olmsted v. Loomis, 9 N. Y. 423.

One who promised to release to another his right to use the waters of a lake in consideration of the latter's building a mill is not entitled to an injunction restraining the mill owner from taking the water from the lake by means of the race constructed, where he allowed the mill owner to construct his building and works at great expense, and did not notify him that he would not keep his promise until the works were nearly completed. Payne v. Paddock, Walk. Ch. (Mich.) 487.

But the successors in interest of a purchaser of laud and part of the bulkhead, with the privilege of drawing from his portion of the bulkhead as much water as might be needed for the machinery to be erected on the premises, are entitled to an injunction to restrain the original grantor from obstructing, interfering with, impairing, or injuring any of the rights or privileges so secured, and especially from drawing any water through a conduit pipe or from such bulkhead, at any time, to such an extent as will in any way obstruct, diminish, or lessen the quantity of water which they have the right or privilege of drawing from their portion of such bulkhead. Valley Pulp & P. Co. v. West, 58 Wis. 599, 17 N. W. 554.

Waste of water by a grantor's wilfully opening the gates of a dam may be restrained by his grantee on the other side of the stream to whom the grantor has conveyed the right to draw from his pond all the water not needed for his use. Fuller v. Daniels, 63 N. H. 395.

Equity will not deny relief to a mill owner who waits four years before filing a bill alleging that his grantor of water power has unlawfully deprived him thereof. Iszard v. Mays Landing Water Power Co. 31 N. J. Eq. 511, Affirmed in 34 N. J. Eq. 556.

But equity has no jurisdiction to award damages for breach of a contract to supply a certain amount of water power, except such as are ancillary to a specific performance. Ibid.

A lessee of water power, entitled by the terms of the lease of a prior right to a designated quantity of water under a working head of a certain height, will be granted a temporary injunction, pending a final hearing, restraining a subsequent lessee, having full knowledge of and taking subject to the prior lease, from drawing water from the same race above so as to deprive the other of his full amount of water, thereby interfering with the operation of his mill; and the fact that the water wheels are so set as to cause a needless waste of water does not affect his legal right to the quantity purchased. Home Electric Light & P. Co. v. Globe Tissue Paper Co. 146 Ind. 673, 45 N. E. 1108.

Purchasers of property receiving water power for use therewith under a contract therefor made by their grantors are not entitled to have such contract canceled for failure to supply the stipulated water power, where the contract itself provides a remedy for such failure by deductions from the stipulated rent, and declaring the liability of the water power company for damages over and above rent so deducted. Beckett Paper Co. v. Hamilton & R. Hydraulic Co. 18 Ohio C. C. 200.

The loss of profits resulting from the enforced abandonment of a starch factory because of the unlawful interference by its lessor of the appurtenant water power included in the lease may be considered in determining the damages to be awarded for such injury, where the profit of the business is a large, if not the only, element of the rental value of the property. Crawford v. Parsons, 63 N. H. 438.

VI. Measurement.

A grant of 100 square inches of water conveys what will flow through an aperture of that size in the ordinary way, and the flowage cannot be increased artificially unless that was contemplated in the grant. Schuykill Nav. Co. v. Moore, 2 Whart. 477.

A grant of a right to draw from a canal as much water as will pass through an aperture of a given size and a given position in the side of the canal is substantially a grant of a right to take a certain quantity of water in bulk or weight. What that quantity is may be ascertained from the character and height of the canal, the circumstances under which the water is to be drawn, and the state of things existing at the time the grant is made. Chesapeake & O. Canal Co. v. Hill, 15 Wall. 94, 21 L. ed. 64.

A grant of the right to draw 1 inch in diameter of water will be held to apply to a pipe discharging such quantity and placed in position about two years after the grant thereafter used for a period of fifty years, although its location does not conform exactly to the terms of the grant, rather than another pipe leading from the pond the use of which had been only occasional and the existence of which is not shown to have been known to the owner of the pond. Smith v. Beach, 5 App. Div. 624, 39 N. Y. Supp. 351.

A deed granting the right to take 800 inches of water from the grantor's raceway for the purpose of operating the mill and machinery of the grantee, and which further covenants that there shall be water in the race at all times for the grantee's use, does not grant power sufficient to run his mill, but merely grants water which is to be measured where it is taken from the race, and not at the mill at which it is used. Palmer v. Angel, 69 Hun, 471, 23 N. Y. Supp. 397.

A lease of the right to draw from a race at any place within a specified distance of the head gate as much water as will run through an aperture 2 feet square under a head of 4 feet from the top, provided the lessee shall require so much, and that in case he needs more he may take it at a proportionally increased rental, entitles the lessee to draw the specified volume of water emanating from the race under a pressure of 4 feet head, but not to such quantity of water as will flow through an aperture of the size mentioned under the pressure of the head indicated into an open space without the obstruction of any channel; that is, he has no right to such quantity of water independent of the mode of taking it. Norris v. Showerman, 2 Dougl. (Mich.) 16, Affirming Walk. Ch. (Mich.) 206.

A grantee of a right to water power measured by "the quantity which shall be discharged through an aperture of 200 square inches at the gate under 15 feet head" is entitled to the constant flow of that quantity, and no more, in all stages of the water; and equity on a bill to fix the respective water rights will direct that the size of the aperture be diminished or increased as the head rises above or falls below 15 feet. Cummings v. Blanchard, 67 N. H. 268, 36 Atl. 556.

A grant of a right to take water from a dam through "a gate 12 inches square, or equal to that," will not authorize grantees, either to place any device in the dam, or to take the water through any other device than "a gate 12 inches square, or equal thereto." Drummond v. Hinkley, 30 Me. 483.

One who, under a grant of the right to use water for power, is entitled to "the amount of the issue of the wheel" under an established mill, supposed to be 600 inches more or less, may not use more water than is thus specified, although the amount that would pass through that wheel may be used with a different wheel or wheels. Doan v. Metcalf, 46 Iowa, 120.

A grant of 150 square inches of water for propelling machinery to be taken from the side of a flume or race at an opening or openings between the bottom and top of the same, provided that no more water shall be taken by said openings than will be discharged by an aperture of 150 square inches at a point as low as the surface of the river, conveys the right to draw all the water which will naturally flow through an opening of 150 square inches at the side of the main race or flume as low as the surface of the river, and does not grant as much water as will flow through the aperture into open space to be measured at the tall race. Blanchard v. Doering, 21 Wis. 477.

When, by an exception in a deed of water privileges, enough horse power up to a certain limit to drive described mills is reserved, and is to be determined by a designated wheel book, if there is more than one edition, differing in measurements, it must be shown which was in the minds of the parties, or alone in existence, when the exception was made. Moore v. Wilder, 86 Vt. 33, 28 Atl. 320.

The rule for determining the flow of water per second through a spout from a flume, as adopted in Hartwell v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 50 Hun, 497, 3 N. Y. Supp. 452, was multiply the square root of the number of feet in the head by 8.025, and multiply this result by the square feet of the area of discharge, and the result is the cubic feet per second.

The term "inch of water" had not, prior to 1880, acquired any fixed, certain, and technical meaning. Janesville Cotton Mills v. Ford 82 Wis. 416, 17 L. R. A. 564, 52 N. W. 764. Nor even in 1882. And in 1892 in its opinion the Wisconsin supreme court says that the conclusion seems irresistible that the term "inch of water" has not acquired any fixed technical meaning which must control when used in a grant, although the testimony shows that the tendency among wheel venders and millmen for some years has been and is to attach to it the meaning of the theoretical inch; but it does not appear that such theoretical arbitrary meaning has yet crystallized so as to be controlling. Jackson Milling Co. v. Chandos, 82 Wis. 437, 52 N. W. 759.

The term "inch of water" as used in deeds of water power means so much water as will under a given head flow through a small orifice of a specified number of square inches of superficial area in the side of a flume, where to construe it as a stream of water with a cross section area at right angles with itself of one square inch moving with the velocity of a given head would take nearly all the water the canal afforded, and it appears that the grantor intended to run a mill of twice the capacity of the grantee's, and that the grantee for the purpose of using his water power constructed openings with a superficial area within a few inches of the number of inches granted. Ibid.

The term "square inch of water" as used in deeds of water power which at the time of the first grants had no technical meaning will be construed to mean a stream of water with a cross section area of one square inch measured at right angles with its flow, measuring with the velocity of whatever head is acting upon it, where subsequently such construction was placed upon the term for several years by the consent of all those then interested therein. Janesville Cotton Mills Co. v. Ford, 82 Wis. 416, 17 L. R. A. 564, 52 N. W. 764.

VII. Loss of rights.

A grant of water privilege is not lost through nonuser without intention to abandon it, although at times the raceway is dilapidated, and 67 L. R. A.

for about one year the mill lies idle because of a disagreement between the owner and his tenants. Johnston v. Hyde, 33 N. J. Eq. 632.

The right to use water for mill purposes is not lost by the mere neglect to assert, use, and enjoy it for the period of twenty years, where the easement was created by a perpetual and unconditional grant. Day v. Walden, 46 Mich. 575, 10 N. W. 26.

No part of a grant of all the water power on grantor's land will be lost by nonuser for twenty-one years. Nitzell v. Paschall, 3 Rawle, 76.

A reservation in a grant of flowage rights that a mill on a certain other privilege shall not be injured thereby is not lost by nonuser of the reserved privilege for more than twenty-one years. Butz v. Ihrie, 1 Rawle, 218.

A right to take water from a stream, acquired by deed, is not lost by nonuser for thirty-two years. Pennsylvania R. Co.'s Appeal, 125 Pa. 189, 17 Atl. 478.

An easement to take water from the lands of another for mill purposes, granted as an appurtenance to the building, and not to the land upon which it stands, is extinguished where the mill is burned down and not rebuilt. Day v. Walden, 46 Mich. 575, 10 N. W. 26.

The destruction by fire, without fault of the owner, of a mill, the machinery of which was utilized to transmit water power for the operation of an adjoining elevator, does not destroy an easement in the land on which such mill was situate for a perpetual water power and the transmission thereof to the elevator where the reason for the easement did not cease by the destruction of the mill, and was attached to the land, and not the mill and machinery in esse, and could be enjoyed by means of other appliances. Hottell v. Farmers' Protective Asso. 25 Colo. 67, 53 Pac. 327.

Under a deed reserving to the grantor the privilege of drawing water from the grantee's ditch, for the accommodation of the grantor's mill, and providing that the grantee keep a spout 10 inches square at the bottom of said ditch, for the purpose of enabling the grantor to draw such water, the right to compel the grantee to put in the spout was a part of the easement to draw water from the ditch, and was not barred by a period of time less than that necessary to bar the entire easement. Randall v. Latham, 36 Conn. 48.

The condition subsequent in a deed of lands for the purpose of building a raceway for water power and an embankment or tow path, to such extent as may be necessary, with reversion to the grantor if used for other purposes, is not broken so as to forfeit the estate so long as the same is primarily used for the granted purposes, even if incidentally used for other purposes; and a subsequent deed by the grantor of adjacent lands bounded by the tow path is an admission that all the land to that boundary is necessary for the granted purposes. McKelway v. Seymour, 29 N. J. L. 321.

Where the owner of a water power conveys a parcel of land with a portion of the power under the express provision that it shall not be used for any purpose other than paper manufacturing, after which both parcels are mortgaged and, subject to the mortgage, come into the possession of a single owner, the estates do not, as against the mortgagees, become merged so that he can alter the use of the water power contrary to the terms of the covenant, although his attempt to do so will not work a forfeiture of the right to the power. Wells v. Chapman, 4 Sandf. Ch. 312.

Where the owner of two tracts of land, one at the outlet of the pond, having on it a dam, and the other farther down on the stream flowing from the pond, having on it a sawmill and gristmill, who was also entitled to the use of the water flowing in the stream for the operation of the mills, conveyed both tracts of land and water rights to the owners of a tract situated on the stream between the pond and the mills, and such owners partitioned the three tracts, the right of the mill property to the use of the water was not lost, or the right of the shop on the intermediate tract increased, by a clause in the deeds of partition conveying separately the grist and sawmill, which granted to each mill one half of the privilege of the fall of the water from the trip-hammer shop to the gristmill. Tucker v. Jewett, 11 Conn. 311.

Where dominant and servient characters are respectively impressed on separate mills afterwards acquired by a single owner, his subsequent conveyance of the mill formerly dominant, even without express references to the water privileges, but only generally with all the privileges and appurtenances thereof, and the passing of the formerly servient mill by virtue of a mortgage antedating the common ownership and under a description referring to the old deed which created the servitude, will revive the respective easements as before. Albee v. Huntley, 56 Vt. 454.

If the right to the water is restricted to its use in connection with specified property an attempt to transfer the use to prohibited property will terminate the water right, and the owner can confer on third persons no greater rights than he possesses.

Where after the construction of a reservoir and flume to convey water to a mill the mill is sold, together with a right to use the water of the reservoir for the mill upon condition that if the mill is not kept in use the water privilege and right of dower shall revert to the grantor, and the mill owner subsequently contracts for land of the grantor lying along the flume between the reservoir and the mill, in which contract no mention is made of the water right, and erects a new mill upon it, abandoning the old mill, he will by his acts abandon the water right; and the fact that before the reservoir is destroyed and before the deed to the new property is delivered, the mill owner sells his right to a third person with the water right visibly attached to the new mill, to whom the deed is delivered, is immaterial, since the original grantor did not create the artificial arrangement and the contract of sale relates back to the time when it was made, and not when it was consummated. Simmons v. Cloonan, 47 N. Y. 3, Reversing 2 Lans. 848, where the recovery was in favor of the assignee on the ground that the deed included the appurtenances and the conveyances merged the prior agreements, and it was evident that the assignee of the contract bought the premises intending to use them for milling purposes, and that the original grantor knew of the purpose for which they were designed and had been used when he delivered the deed to the assignee.

VIII. Compensation.

A contract to pay for water power as it is developed at so much per horse power per annum, and then only when it is in actual use, 67 L. R. A.

should be construed so that the user need only pay for the fractional parts of a year in which it is used. Columbus R. Co. v. City Mills Co. 110 Ga. 273, 34 S. E. 581.

Purchasers of land and assignees of a permanent lease of water power for use in connection therewith, whether they are liable or not for the stipulated annual rent under such lease, which makes no provision for the payment of rent by the assignee thereof, are bound to pay such rent in order to discharge the lien on the land for the payment thereof created by the contract for such water power, subject to which they took, so long as the contract remains in force. Beckett Paper Co. v. Hamilton & R. Hydraulic Co. 18 Ohio C. C. 200.

Where the owner of a lower mill from which water had been wrongfully diverted by an upper mill owner granted to him the free use and benefit of the water course for a term of years, after which the grantor's mill was destroyed and the grantee continued to enjoy the water course paying the rental for it, a person claiming under the grantee and continuing the use of the water after the expiration of the term is liable for the value of such use to the person succeeding to the grantor's title. Davis v. Morgan, 4 Barn. & C. 8, 6 Dowl. & R. 42.

A purchaser of water power for mining and milling purposes, under a contract for a term of years, is not liable therefor after a sale of the mine and mill, where the right to make such sale is expressly recognized in the contract, and a provision thereof attempts to bind his successor in interest to take and use the water during the term at the agreed price,—especially in view of the practical construction put thereon subsequent to the sale by the furnishing of water to the purchaser of the premises and the receipt of pay for it in accordance with the terms of the contract. Table Mountain & S. A. Water Co. v. Chavanne, 70 Cal. 616, 11 Pac. 678.

Power furnished by water, pumped through a main, by power developed on a dam, and distributed through a pipe system to a village about a mile distant, and there furnished to various parties who used it in water motors for driving small machinery; and also by electricity developed by the power at the dam and transmitted to the village and there used for heating, lighting, and propelling electric motors,—is within the provisions of a contract by which a water company agreed to pay the town each year one half the net income derived from the sale or lease of power on said dam; and it is not necessary that the power leased or sold by the water company should be used upon its dam in order that the company should be liable to the town for one half of the net proceeds derived therefrom. Caribou v. Caribou Water Co. 96 Me. 17, 51 Atl. 287.

IX. Covenants.

a. In general.

Most grants of water power contain express covenants as to the amount granted and the conditions under which it may be enjoyed. Such stipulations should be inserted in the contract, for a mere statement by the vendor of a mill to the vendee that "a stream will furnish water to run a mill day and night eight months in the year" is not a warranty, but a mere expression of opinion, upon which the vendee is not authorized to rely. Clark v. Ralls, 50 Iowa, 275.

Whereas a covenant, and not a condition, is created by a clause in a lease of water power,—“it being understood and agreed that the lessees, their heirs and assigns, are not to make any waste of the water or suffer any to be made through their carelessness or negligence.” Gould v. Bugbee, 6 Gray, 371.

So, an undertaking of a grantor is not a condition in the grant of a water privilege if it is a self-imposed duty to which no forfeiture is specifically attached, and its performance was not necessary to or demanded by the grantee during twenty-four years. Paschall v. Passmore, 15 Pa. 295.

A provision in a lease of water power that the same is subject to the interruptions provided for in a certain other lease is not an exception, but a mere proviso, allegation or proof of which is not essential to a recovery by the lessee in an action of covenant for failure to furnish the water power as agreed, but is a matter of defense, the burden of proof as to which is upon the lessor. La Point v. Cady, 2 Chand. (Wis.) 202, 2 Pinney (Wis.) 515.

Where one seised in fee of upper and lower mills leases the lower with the stream thereto appertaining and covenants for quiet enjoyment, and afterwards leases the upper, and the lessee covenants not to divert or pen up the said stream to the prejudice of the lower mills, the lessee of the lower mills is entitled to the benefit of the covenant, and on its breach may bring a bill for an injunction without first bringing an action of trespass. Martin v. Stiles, Mosely, 145.

A remote grantee of mill property cannot maintain an action against the original grantor for breach of covenant of the right to maintain the dam at the height it was when the original conveyance was made, where the immediate grantees could maintain no action therefor because they had fraudulently raised the height of the dam prior to the conveyance, so that the deed was executed in ignorance of the fact of such increased height, as the remote grantee's rights do not rise above those of such immediate grantees through whom he derives title. Scott v. Stetler, 128 Ind. 385, 27 N. E. 721.

Purchasers of land with water rights from one holding the land by deed with warranty against the claims of all other persons take subject to the equities existing between the warrantors and their grantor, where there had been a conveyance by the grantor to the warrantors and a reconveyance from them to him, and cannot recover for a breach of the warranty by the destruction of the dam by legal proceedings at the instance of the owners of other lands overflowed by the backlog of water from the dam, where the warrantors held under a deed from their grantor containing the same warranty, and the cause of the breach existed at the time of his deed to the warrantors, although the consideration of the retransfer to him was larger than he received from such warrantors. Fields v. Willingham, 40 Ga. 344.

In an action to recover instalments due on the purchase money of a water power conveyed by instrument under seal, a breach of a covenant therein that a corporation from which the seller derived title should fulfil its covenant to build a canal of specified width cannot be set up as a counterclaim, where the purchaser knew that for twenty years previously the seller had rested content with the canal as originally constructed by the corporation. Doty v. Lawson, 14 Fed. 892.

The owners of sawmill property are not estopped to deny the right of a lower gristmill owner, who purchased from the estate to which both properties belonged, to the flow of water from the sawmill dam at all times the same whether the sawmill is running or not, although one of their grantors was so estopped by her covenants, where the owners of the remainder of such estate were in no way bound thereby. Mable v. Matteson, 17 Wis. 1.

The purchaser of a part of a milling privilege with covenant by the grantor to maintain the works so as to secure to the purchaser his water power cannot enforce the covenant against a purchaser on foreclosure, if the creditors and assignee in bankruptcy joined in the deed, but not in the covenant, the covenant, therefore being a mere personal undertaking. Stanton v. Sauk Rapids Co. 74 Minn. 286, 77 N. W. 1.

A complaint for breach of covenant in a grant of an easement to use water from a mill pond is not sustained by proof of a tort in wrongfully interfering with the easement without showing any covenant. Beard v. Yates, 2 Hun, 466.

In an action to enforce the unpaid purchase money of a mill and dam with all appurtenances, the record of a judgment in a suit pending against the vendor at the date of the sale, wherein it was adjudged that the height of the dam must be reduced, is competent as showing an eviction from part of the property conveyed, so as to enable the purchaser to recover for breach of covenant of a right to maintain the dam at a greater height; and the fact that the judgment has been appealed from does not destroy its competency. Scheible v. Slagle, 89 Ind. 323.

b. Runs with the land.

Whenever the covenant is incorporated into a conveyance of land it will run with the land, although it relates to water power merely.

Thus, when an agreement to furnish water power is in terms between the parties, their executors, administrators, and assigns, and where it affects real estate and the value thereof, if the conveyance of the water rights and real estate recites that the grant is taken subject to the agreement, the agreement constitutes a covenant running with the land. Witherbee v. Meyer, 84 Hun, 146, 32 N. Y. Supp. 537.

A covenant in a deed that the grantor of mill property had a right to maintain a dam connected therewith at the height it was at the time of the conveyance runs with the land and vests in a remote grantee the right to maintain an action for its breach. Scott v. Stetler, 128 Ind. 385, 27 N. E. 721.

Covenants as to increase of water power, raising of a dam, and renewal, in a lease of water to be taken from a dam in a water power of the lessors and by the latter conveyed in a flume to the lessees' mill, run with the land, as such agreement is not a lease of water distinct from the land, but vests in the lessee an interest in the dam and water power of the lessors; and a purchaser of such land with notice of the lease takes subject to the easement and is bound by such covenants. Noonan v. Orton, 4 Wis. 335, 27 Wis. 300.

Where a covenant was the owner of land upon a creek embracing a water-mill privilege, the covenantor, a water company, proposing to take water from a lake out of which the creek flowed, and the covenant was to maintain such a stage and volume of water in the lake that the quantity flowing in the creek should not be diminished by the diversion, the covenant runs with the land of the covenantee, and is continuing, so that damages for its breach and the right of action therefor accrue to him who holds the property when the breach occurs. Shaber v. St. Paul Water Co. 30 Minn. 179, 14 N. W. 874.

An instrument under seal calling itself an indenture, leasing the right to take and use sufficient water to run a cheese factory, and "to have the use of any water so long as same shall be used for the purpose of running a cheese factory," will not be personal to the grantee, but will run with the land so long as the conditions of the grant are performed. Whitney v. Richardson, 59 Hun, 601, 13 N. Y. Supp. 861.

A covenant made by a lessor, in a demise of property to be used for mill purposes, runs with the land, and binds the assignee of the reversion at the suit of the assignee of the lessee, where it provides that it shall be lawful for the lessee, his heirs, and assigns, during the continuance of the demise, to make use of a conduit made for carrying off waste and superfluous water from the canal of the lessor to the demised premises, and to take, use, and enjoy such superfluous water for their own use. Athol v. Midland G. W. R. Co. Ir. Rep. 3 C. L. 333.

A mortgagee of mill property is entitled to avail himself of the mortgagor's right to set off, against a prior mortgage to secure water rentals, a claim for damages arising from the failure to furnish water according to the contract, where the property is insufficient to pay both mortgages. Gordon v. Constantine Hydraulic Co. 117 Mich. 620, 76 N. W. 142.

In case property owners convey to each other an interest in their several contributions to a common water privilege, covenants to construct and maintain canals and a dam will run with the land, since they are connected with the subject of the grant, and enter into the value of the same. Nye v. Hoyle, 120 N. Y. 195, 24 N. E. 1.

A covenant in a deed of a water lot whereby the grantee agrees to pay a certain proportion of the expense of improving a dam and canal or reservoir for water-power purposes runs with the land, and makes such proportion of the expense a permanent charge on such lot unto whomsoever the title thereto may be conveyed or assigned. Howard Mfg. Co. v. Water Lot Co. 53 Ga. 689.

A covenant in a grant by the owner of a water power operating two mills, of one of the mills, together with the first use of the water power, that he would at all times be at equal expense in keeping up and repairing the dam for the mutual benefit of the mills, will run with the land into the hands of a subsequent grantee of the other mill. Denman v. Prince, 40 Barb. 213.

Covenants in a deed conveying a mill together with water power from a dam belonging to the grantor, necessary to run the mill, by which the grantor binds himself to keep the milldam in repair so as to enable the grantee, his heirs, and assigns, fully to use and enjoy the water granted, and giving such grantee the right to enter upon and repair the same at the grantor's expense in case of his failure to do so after a certain time, such grantee binding himself to pay a certain fraction of the expense of keeping the same in repair, are covenants running with the land, and may be enforced by the assignee of the mill against the assignee of the milldam. Fitch v. Johnson, 104 Ill. 111.

A covenant in a deed of a mill site and water power that the grantee will pay, for keeping a dam and raceway in repair, his ratable share in proportion to the number of inches of water owned or used by him, runs with the land and water granted. Woollscroft v. Norton, 15 Wis. 198.

A covenant in a deed conveying land upon a stream with the use of half of the water power afforded by a dam on such stream, whereby the grantor undertakes to keep the dam in repair, and giving the grantee that right at the grantor's expense in case of his neglect to do so, is a covenant running with the land, and may be enforced by the assignee of such grantee, but not by a remote grantee of a part of the premises and a fraction of the water power, to whom no right is conferred to enter upon the dam and make repairs. Batavia Mfg. Co. v. Newton Wagon Co. 91 Ill. 230.

A deed which conveys a portion of land, together with sufficient water to turn a shaft and portable machinery to be kept in good condition by the grantee, who is to contribute pro rata towards the expense of maintaining the power, creates mutual easements between the land conveyed and that retained; and a subsequent grantee may enforce the easement as against one who succeeded to the interest of the original grantor in the premises retained, with notice of the covenant, although it did not in express terms bind the grantor's heirs and assigns. Gould v. Partridge, 52 App. Div. 40, 64 N. Y. Supp. 870.

But a conveyance of a privilege of drawing water from a pond is not a conveyance of land, so that a covenant respecting the privilege can be said to run with the land. Wheelock v. Thayer, 16 Pick. 68.

So, an agreement by each of several persons interested in a water power for himself and his assigns, to pay his share of the expense of improving the power, is not a covenant running with the land so as to bind his grantee; nor does it create a charge upon the respective estates in favor of the other parties to the agreement which can be enforced after the estates have passed into the hands of third persons. Clarke v. Sibley, 13 Met. 210.

And a covenant by the grantee of water power as to the repair of a dam, contained in a separate instrument executed after the conveyance of such water power, does not run with the land so as to charge a subsequent grantee of such covenantor, where the conveyance of the water power and the agreement for repair do not constitute one transaction, as the burden of a covenant cannot be imposed upon land so as to run with it where there is no privity of estate between the covenantor and the covenantee at the time of the making thereof. Wheeler v. Schad, 7 Nev. 204.

So, an agreement between owners of a water power on one side of a stream, who have purchased land on the other side for the purpose of controlling the water power for use on the side where they originally owned their property, that the purchaser shall be entitled to use the water on that side of the stream, contains no grant or transfer of anything from one to the other, so that the covenants for use do not run with the land on that side, but remain personal, and will not result in stripping purchasers of the land on the other side to which the water rights pertain of its natural rights. Lawrence v. Whitney, 115 N. Y. 410, 5 L. R. A. 417, 22 N. E. 174.

A condition in a grant of right of way to a railroad company that it shall build a dam over a brook crossing the land to furnish a water power for the grantors, their heirs and assigns, and that the grantee shall repair all damages which the dam shall sustain, is a condition subsequent, and the title vests in the grantee subject to be defeated by the neglect to repair; but the condition cannot be enforced by assignees, since the condition is not a covenant running with the land. Underhill v. Saratoga & W. R. Co. 20 Barb. 455.

A conveyance of land with the privilege of drawing off from mill race on adjoining land, which also belonged to the grantor, a certain quantity of water for purposes specified, leaving always sufficient to supply a mill on grantor's land, as covenanted by grantee for himself, his heirs, executors, and assigns, is a covenant running with the land, upon which grantor may maintain an action against the grantee's assignee. Warren v. Munroe, 15 U. C. Q. B. 557.

c. Breach.

The question whether or not there has been a breach of covenant involves the further question of the existence of a covenant. Under statutes providing that no covenants shall be implied, the question has arisen whether or not a grant of a dam on water power in its existing condition involved a covenant that the subject of the grant had a rightful existence. Obviously in many instances it would be a fraud on the grantee if it had no existence, and he had no redress. On the other hand, the question arises as to the scope of the statute abolishing implied covenants. If there is a covenant of warranty it will include whatever is an essential part of the grant.

Thus, a covenant of warranty in a grant of a mill with a water power and dam will cover the right to maintain the dam at that height and flow the land of an adjoining proprietor sufficiently to maintain it there. Adams v. Conover, 87 N. Y. 422, 41 Am. Rep. 381, Affirming 22 Hun, 424.

This case distinguishes Green v. Collins, 86 N. Y. 246, 40 Am. Rep. 531, on the ground that in the latter case the deed did not cover the right to drain across the neighbors' land, the loss of which was the subject-matter of the action.

The lease of a water lot and mill privilege which contains no covenant of quiet enjoyment will not, where the statute provides that no covenant shall be implied in any conveyance of real estate, sustain an action for breach of covenant of quiet enjoyment upon the cutting by the lessor of a drain which lowers the water in the mill pond. Kinney v. Watts, 14 Wend. 38.

Under a statute providing that no covenant shall be implied in any conveyance of real estate, whether such conveyance contains special covenants or not, in a deed whereby a mill lot and right to draw a certain amount of water from a race are granted with the condition that grantee shall make one third of all necessary repairs upon the dam and race, no covenant can, in the absence of express words, be construed out of the deed that grantor shall make the remaining two thirds of the repairs. Koch v. Hustis, 113 Wis. 599, 87 N. W. 834.

It has been held that a purchaser of a mill site, who accepts a deed without a covenant for his protection as to the height of the dam, is without remedy in case he is compelled to lower the dam. Hopper v. Lutkins, 4 N. J. Eq. 149.

But the right to maintain a dam at the height at which it existed at the time of a conveyance of mill property is of itself property and a part of the thing sold, and the covenants of the deed extend to and cover the right to maintain the dam at such height as an incident to the estate and necessary to its enjoyment; and, if a grantee is deprived of such right because the grantor had no right to maintain it at the height covenanted, he is entitled to compensation for the loss. Scott v. Michael, 129 Ind. 250, 28 N. E. 546.

A covenant of seisin in a deed granting mill property with the privilege of raising water to a certain height is broken where such privilege cannot be exercised without flowing lands which the grantor had no right to flow. Hall v. Gale, 20 Wis. 292; Walker v. Wilson, 13 Wis. 522; Hall v. Gale, 14 Wis. 54.

Where the height of a milldam adds materially to the value of the property, the right so to maintain it must be considered a part of the thing purchased; and, if the purchaser be deprived of it because his vendor did not possess it, he may treat the case as one of partial failure of title, and, without surrendering possession, maintain a defense against an action for the recovery of the unpaid purchase money. Schellie v. Slagle, 89 Ind. 323.

A purchaser of mill property, including the water power afforded by a milldam, is entitled to damages for breach of a covenant on the part of the grantor that he was lawfully seised of the right to raise the milldam to a certain height, whereas he had no right, title, or authority to raise it beyond the height at which it was when conveyed. Traster v. Snelson, 29 Ind. 96.

The grantee of mill property can maintain an action for breach of warranty contained in the deed conveying it "together with all privileges, water powers, flowage, and appurtenances of every kind whatsoever thereunto belonging" where he has been deprived of the right to maintain the dam at the height it was at the time of the conveyance because the grantor had not the right to maintain it at that height. Scott v. Michael, 129 Ind. 250, 28 N. E. 546.

One conveying a tract of land containing a mill seat with a dam under covenants of warranty as to the mill seat, pond, and appurtenances is liable on such warranty where, after the grantee had erected a mill, it transpired that the pond as maintained at the time of the sale and which both parties supposed flowed only the land conveyed, in fact covered land belonging to a third person, who compelled the grantee to lower the pond so as to flow only the land conveyed, which left it insufficient to turn a mill.—the purpose for which the land was purchased. Lide v. Thomas, 2 Brev. 334, 4 Am. Dec. 581.

The grantor of a mill privilege who conceals from the grantee knowledge that the dam is then higher than it can lawfully be maintained, is liable to an equitable reduction in the purchase price. Light v. Stoeve, 12 Serg. & R. 431.

A covenant to maintain a dam at the height of 10 feet for the purpose of enabling a grantee to draw water from the pond is broken at the time it is made when the grantor has a right to maintain the dam at the height of only 6 feet, so that it is not subject to assignment. Wheelock v. Thayer, 16 Pick. 68.

In an action for a breach of covenant of a right to maintain a milldam at a certain height, parol evidence is admissible to show at what height the dam was being maintained when the deed was made, where the height was not fixed in the conveyance, but was described as a certain mill property "together with the mill race and dam and all the ways, appurtenances, and privileges to said property belonging," and the right to maintain it at that height is what was warranted. Scheible v. Slagle, 89 Ind. 323.

Fraudulent representations on the part of the grantor of a mill that he had a right to maintain the milldam at a certain height when in fact his right was limited to a less height, and from which the purchaser suffered injury, will entitle the latter to recoup his damages against the unpaid purchase-money notes, in an action by the grantor to enforce their payment. Ibid.

A right, not existent by grant or prescription at the time of the conveyance, to overflow land belonging to a third party, is not included under the general habendum in a deed, "with the appurtenances," containing warranty against encumbrances and covenant to defend against all claims and demands. Swazey v. Brooks, 34 Vt. 451.

A contract for the sale of land including one half the water power of the river as controlled by a dam does not contain an implied warranty that the purchaser shall have the right to raise the dam high enough to throw the water back upon and submerge other lands above the dam. Jobbins v. Gray, 34 Ill. App. 208.

A covenant of seisin in a grant of mill property with the privileges and appurtenances "thereto belonging" is not broken by reason of there being in the grantor no right to flow certain other premises by back water, where such right is not necessary to the useful operation of the mill property in the manner in which it had existed and had been used previous to the grant, but the necessity therefor is created by the grantee's enlargement of the capacity of the mill. Jackson v. Trullinger, 9 Or. 393.

A covenant in a deed to a mill pond, the title to the shores and bed of which remained in the grantor and others, providing that, as an appurtenance thereto, such mill pond "shall be and continue a mill pond, appropriated to the use of the mill and the site whereon it stands, as it now is, forever," provided the same should never be raised above its present height, is not such a covenant as would protect a subsequent purchaser against a future abatement of such mill pond as a nuisance, by the acts of the government. Oldham v. Kennedy, 3 Humph. 260.

A covenant in a deed of a water lot, that the vendor will so finish all the eyes in a canal or reservoir as to "furnish and contain" in said canal water in sufficient quantity to propel the machinery placed and erected on that lot, is to be construed to refer to the capacity of the canal, on a proper completion of the works, to furnish and contain water sufficient to propel the machinery if it receives it from the river, and not as a covenant against general drought or unusual or excessive low stages of water in the river. Water Lot Co. v. Leonard, 30 Ga. 560.

The diversion of water from a ditch by the tortious acts of third persons is not a breach of a covenant to warrant and defend the title to an exclusive water right sufficient to operate a specified plant. Poley v. Lacert, 35 Or. 166, 58 Pac. 37.

A deed conveying a tract of land with the privilege of erecting a dam across a river, and of making a raceway across the land of the grantor, and making all necessary embankments, walls, and troughs to convey as much of the water from said river to said piece of land as the grantee shall choose, did not convey the right to use the water so as to make the grantor liable on his covenants of warranty, upon a riparian proprietor below the raceway subsequently evicting the grantee from the right of using the water. Griswold v. Allen, 22 Conn. 89.

In a grant, containing full covenants of warranty, of a certain amount of water from a race, subject to a prior grant of a certain amount, but not expressing in the warranty clause any exception as to the prior grantee, the exception in the granting clause applies to the warranty clause also. Koch v. Hustis, 113 Wis. 604, 89 N. W. 838.

When the successors of a lessee of water power operate said lessee's mill a contract similar in terms to that between the original lessor and lessee will be implied so long as it is left to mere implication to determine whether the occupation is with the assent of the owner and in submission to the legal title. Page v. McGilinch, 63 Me. 472.

Liability for breach of a covenant for water power in a conveyance of land and water power is not confined to the result of acts done subsequent to the conveyance, but may extend to the diversion of water to the injury of the grantee after such conveyance by a mill constructed without authority of law, but with the permission of the grantor prior to the conveyance. Hollingsworth v. Dunbar, 5 Munf. 199.

The lessor's covenant for quiet enjoyment of a demised water course is not broken by persons taking the water under contracts made with the lessor prior to the execution of the lease. Blatchford v. Plymouth, 3 Bing. N. C. 691, 4 Scott, 429, 3 Hodges, 86.

d. Damages.

The measure of damages for the breach of covenants in a deed of a water lot, which require the performance of work for the betterment of a canal to the use of which for water-power purposes the vendee is entitled, is the interest on the vendee's investment, or such part thereof as he could not employ on account of such breach, for the time that such part of the whole could not be so employed. Water Lot Co. v. Leonard, 30 Ga. 560.

The expense to a mill owner of putting in a new wheel cannot be recovered against one from whom he procured his water power, although the latter advised him to put in such wheel in order to operate his mill with a decreased amount of water, such decrease being due to his inability to furnish the required amount. Moline Water Power Co. v. Waters, 10 Ill. App. 159.

The measure of damages for breach of covenants in deed to water rights warranting title and for quiet enjoyment is the value of the rights at the time the conveyance was made, with interest, costs, and reasonable expense incurred in defending the title, and does not include the value of improvements made by the vendee, notwithstanding the language of the deed and the nature of the property conveyed showed a knowledge on the part of the vendor that it was necessary, and the intention of the vendee to expend money in the construction of a ditch necessary to carry the water to the place indicated. Taylor v. Holter, 1 Mont. 688.

The measure of damages for the breach of a covenant of seisin in a deed of mill property granting the privilege of raising the water to a certain height, but which could not be so raised without flowing lands which the grantor had no right to flow, is the difference in the value of the mill at the time of the purchase, with the privilege of raising the water to the specified height, and with only the right to raise it so as not to overflow or damage such lands. Hall v. Gale, 20 Wis. 292.

The measure of damages for a breach of covenant of the right to maintain a milldam at a certain height from which the purchaser had been evicted by a judgment decreeing that the dam must be reduced, is the value of the right from which he was evicted, measured by ascertaining the proportion it bears to the whole purchase price. Schieble v. Slagle, 89 Ind. 323.

Loss of profits cannot be recovered for breach of a covenant to repair a milldam. Thompson v. Shattuck, 2 Met. 615.

A judgment against the grantor of a mill and dam, in an action pending at the date of conveyance, adjudging that the dam must be reduced from the height at which the grantor had covenanted that he had a right to maintain it, binds his grantee and fixes his right to maintain the dam; and he has a right to treat the judgment as an eviction of a part of the premises, and, without rescinding the contract, may maintain an action for damages for the partial failure of title, without proof of the enforcement of the judgment by a ministerial officer. Schieble v. Slagle, 89 Ind. 323. H. P. F.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

Re William B. KENNEDY.

(144 Cal. 634.)

The sufficiency of the evidence before a grand jury to warrant an indictment cannot be inquired into by habeas corpus proceedings to obtain the release of accused from custody consequent upon the indictment, and it is immaterial that, by statute, the evidence offered before the grand jury may be taken down and a copy of it delivered to the accused, so that the proceedings before that body are no longer incapable of proof.

(September 10, 1904.)

APPPLICATION by petitioner for a writ of habeas corpus to obtain his release from custody to which he had been committed to await trial upon an indictment for murder. Writ discharged.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William H. Schooler and A. S. Newburgh for petitioner.

Mr. I. Harris for respondent.

McFarland, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a petition to this court in behalf of William B. Kennedy for his discharge on habeas corpus. The writ issued, and upon the return of the sheriff who holds Kennedy the matter was heard and submitted. The petition sets forth a large number of arrests of Kennedy on various charges, and subsequent discharges from such arrests by superior-court judges on habeas corpus; but, while these various proceedings may tend to support the contention that these prosecutions were somewhat in the nature of persecutions, they are irrelevant to this present case. Kennedy is now held under a warrant of arrest regularly issued upon an indictment found against him by a grand jury charging him with murder. There is no question of the regularity of the formation of the grand jury, or that the requisite number of jurors acted on the indictment, or as to any other matters touching the general jurisdiction of the grand jury to find the indictment here in question, or that it does not charge a public offense, or as to any deficiency of the indictment in the matter of form or substance. His claim to a discharge is founded on these facts: He was once before tried on a former indictment for the same alleged crime as the one charged in the present indictment. On the former trial he was convicted, but the superior court granted him a new trial on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to warrant the verdict, because there was no evidence supporting the charge except the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice. The people took an appeal from the order granting a new trial, and this court affirmed the order, deciding that the only direct testimony against Kennedy was that of an accomplice, and that there was no sufficient corroborating evidence, and inti-

NOTE.—For a case in this series holding that on habeas corpus proceedings the court has jurisdiction to examine into the sufficiency of the complaint to charge a criminal offense and the sufficiency of the evidence, see State ex rel. Durner v. Iluegin, 62 L. R. A. 700.

facto grand jury finding indictment, see State ex rel. Dunn v. Noyes, 27 L. R. A. 776.

For a case holding that it is the duty of the court on habeas corpus to see that at least a prima facie case of guilt is supported by the evidence against accused, see Com. ex rel. Wadsworth v. Shortall, 65 L. R. A. 193.

mating that the testimony of the accomplice himself would not have been sufficient even if the law did not require corroborating evidence. After the remittitur had gone down, the prosecution not being able to state its ability to furnish additional evidence, the court dismissed the indictment under § 1385 of the Penal Code, and ordered Kennedy discharged from custody. Afterwards the grand jury found and returned the said indictment under which he is now held. The testimony introduced before the grand jury upon which the last indictment was found was, on demand of the district attorney, taken down and written out by a stenographer, under § 925 of the Penal Code, as amended in 1897 (Stat. 1897, chap. 142, p. 204), which provides that the testimony should be so taken if the district attorney demands it, and that a copy of it shall be given to the defendant upon his arraignment. This testimony is made part of the petition in this present proceeding, and it is contended by petitioner that it is the same testimony that was given at the former trial, which was held by this court to be insufficient to support a verdict of guilty, and that, therefore, it was insufficient to justify the grand jury in finding a second indictment. And this is the sole ground on which the discharge of Kennedy is asked for on this present proceeding.

We think it clear that upon habeas corpus the sufficiency of the evidence before a grand jury to warrant an indictment is not a proper subject of inquiry. If it could be inquired into in this case, it could be in any case, and the writ of habeas corpus would, for this purpose, be turned into a writ of review for the purpose of inquiring whether the grand jury committed an error reversible on appeal, and an entirely new field of litigation in criminal cases would be opened up, and few indictments would come to trial without this preliminary contest. But there is no such appeal, and no provision for reviewing the action of a grand jury in finding an indictment. Upon habeas corpus we can look only to the matters hereinbefore indicated. We cannot look to the sufficiency of the evidence on which it acted, for as to that matter its action is conclusive. There are no cases decided by this court which are directly in point, this being the first time, within our knowledge, where the validity of an indictment has been attacked upon mere ground of insufficiency of evidence to support it; although in People v. Tinder, 19 Cal. 539, 81 Am. Dec. 77, it was held that for the purpose of determining whether an indicted party should be admitted to bail the evidence taken before the grand jury could not be considered, and in Ex parte Starnes, 82 Cal. 245, 23 Pac. 38, 47 L. R. A.

although the point was not necessarily involved, it is correctly stated in the opinion of Mr. Justice Fox that an indictment is a charge "made by a judicial body," and that it is held so conclusive that for centuries, until an information was recently allowed in this state, all courts have been powerless to put a man on trial for felony except upon indictment, "or to dismiss one without trial who had been in proper form so charged." But in other jurisdictions the question has been directly raised, and we are satisfied that the law always has been and is as stated in Bishop on Criminal Procedure, § 872, that the court cannot inquire into the sufficiency of proof, or the mode of examining witnesses, to invalidate an indictment. See State v. Boyd, 2 Hill, L. 288, 27 Am. Dec. 376; Smith v. State, 61 Miss. 759; Hight v. United States, Morris (Iowa) 407, 43 Am. Dec. 111; United States v. Reed, 2 Blatchf. 437, Fed. Cas. No. 16,134; Hammond v. State, 74 Miss. 214, 21 So. 149, and cases there cited. In United States v. Reed, 2 Blatchf. 437, Fed. Cas. No. 16,134, it is said: "No case has been cited, nor have we been able to find any, furnishing an authority for looking into and revising the judgment of the grand jury upon the evidence for the purpose of determining whether or not the finding was founded upon sufficient proof;" and in Hammond v. State, 74 Miss. 214, 21 So. 149, it is said: "The doctrine appears to be general that the court cannot inquire into the sufficiency of the proof . . . to invalidate an indictment." There are many other authorities to the same point. The statutes of the states where the decisions above referred to were made do not differ materially on the subject of grand juries and indictments from those of this state.

The fact that § 925 of the Penal Code now allows the district attorney, if he so desires, to have the testimony given before a grand jury taken by a stenographer, does not affect the rule as above stated. It is true that judges and text writers, when stating the rule, have sometimes alluded to the secrecy of proceedings before the grand jury, and the difficulty of proving what the evidence before a grand jury was; but the rule itself does not rest upon these considerations. An indictment is a record of the action of a judicial body, and such action is final when there is no appeal therefrom and no other method provided for revising it; and there is no method for revising it on the ground that there was not sufficient evidence to support it. The provision that a party who has been "committed" without probable cause may be discharged refers to the preliminary commitment by a magistrate. See Ex parte Sternes, 82 Cal. 245, 23 Pac. 38. The provision of § 925 is evidently for the benefit of the district attorney,—probably for the purpose of preventing witnesses of a certain character from safely giving testimony before the trial jury different from that which they have given before the grand jury; but the district attorney need not have a stenographer before the grand jury, and clearly the provision does not change the rule as above stated. The provision of § 921 of the Penal Code that a grand jury “ought to” find an indictment upon certain evidence is “plainly only matter of advice to the jury.” State v. Boyd, 2 Hill, L. 288, 27 Am. Dec. 376. The case of Ex parte Jenkins, 2 Wall. Jr. 521, Fed. Cas. No. 7,259, cited by petitioner, is not in point. That case involved a conflict between Federal and state courts under the fugitive slave law. A law of Congress provided that judges of Federal courts should have the power to issue writs of habeas corpus where prisoners were confined “on, or by any authority of law, for any act done or omitted to be done in pursuance of a law of the United States, or any order, process, or decree of any judge or court thereof.” In that case the prisoners were held under an indictment in the state court which merely charged them with riot and assault to kill, and contained no intimation that the parties indicted were officers of the United States, and did the things alleged while acting in pursuance of an act of Congress and the Federal court merely held that the act of Congress could not be evaded by the artifice of an indictment in the state court which did not disclose the facts which brought the case within the operation of the law of Congress. That law included cases where Federal officers were held under “any authority of law,” whether by the interposition of a grand jury or otherwise.

Said Kennedy is remanded to the custody of the sheriff, and this writ is discharged.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

IOWA PIPE & TILE COMPANY v.

James CALLANAN, Impleaded, etc.

(.....Iowa.....)

1. An assessment for construction of a sewer upon a strip of property fronting on the street, which is only 8 feet deep, at the same front-foot rate as is applied to full-sized lots, is so manifestly unequal and unjust that it violates the constitutional provisions against taking property without due process of law.
2. Tender of a portion of the assessment for a local improvement is not a condition to equitable relief from an invalid assessment if there is nothing to show that some amount at least is due, but it appears that the entire assessment is illegal.
3. A provision in a contract for a municipal improvement that the contractor shall receive assessment certificates against the abutting property in full compensation for his labor without recourse to the municipal corporation does not relieve the city from liability in case it makes an assessment which is invalid and unenforceable.

4. Notice of an assessment for a sewer improvement is not insufficient because the same document notices other and different improvements.

CROSS APPEALS from a judgment of the District Court for Polk County in a suit to foreclose assessment certificates which resulted in a judgment in plaintiff's favor; the plaintiff appealing from so much of the judgment as refused to hold the city liable for the amount due; and defendant Callanan appealing from so much as held him personally liable for the amount of the assessment against his property. Reversed on both appeals.

Statement by Sherwin, J.:

Suit in equity to foreclose three assessment certificates issued by the city of Des Moines for the construction of a sewer on Tenth street, and asking a personal judgment against the appellant Callanan and a judgment against the city of Des Moines. The undisputed facts in the case are substantially as follows: The appellant Callanan was the owner of lot 9 in blocks 1, 2, and 3 in an addition to the city of Des Moines. The lots were originally each 33 feet wide and 100 feet long. After his purchase thereof, the city condemned 25 feet in width off of the west side of each of the lots for the purpose of opening Tenth street, leaving three strips of ground each 8 feet wide, and each abutting said street their full length, 100 feet. Thereafter a sewer was built on Tenth street, and the lands abutting thereon were assessed to pay for it according to the frontage of the lots. Before the assessment was made, however, Mr. Callanan sold a strip 5 feet wide off of the east side of one of the lots. Each of these three strips of ground was assessed on the basis of its frontage on the street, each an equal amount, and each the same amount per front foot that was assessed to lots on the same street having a depth east and west of from 120 to 175 feet. The answer of Mr. Callanan alleges that the strips of ground are not and cannot be benefited by the sewer; that they were assessed as though they were full lots, equal in value to other full-sized lots along the street benefited by the sewer; that such assessment is inequitable and unjust, and in violation of the Constitution of the United States, in that his property is taken without due process of law. There was a trial, and a personal judgment against Mr. Callanan for the full amount claimed, with interest, and the suit against the city was dismissed. Mr. Callanan and the plaintiff appeal.

Mr. A. F. Chamberlain for appellant Iowa Pipe & Tile Company.

Messrs. Dudley & Coffin, for appellant Callanan:

The assessment certificates are void for want of notice.

Mr. W. H. Bremner for City of Des Moines.

Sherwin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The assessment in this case is so manifestly unequal and unjust, and is so clearly governed by the rule announced by the Supreme Court of the United States in Norwood v. Baker, 172 U. S. 269, 43 L. ed. 443, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 187, that we are constrained to hold it invalid. This court has uniformly upheld the frontage rule of assessment, regardless of the special benefit to the property, the latest pronouncement on the subject being in Hackworth v. Ottumwa, 114 Iowa, 467, 87 N. W. 424; and, were it not for the controlling force of the Norwood-Baker Case, we should perhaps feel bound to follow the rule in this case. It should be said, however, that in no case involving this question upon which we have heretofore passed, have the facts been similar to those before us now, and hence we have never before been called upon to determine the precise question involved here. It is true that we have sustained front-foot assessments regardless of benefits, and justified the power on the ground of the right of taxation for the public good. Warren v. Henly, 31 Iowa, 31, and cases following the rule there announced. But in none of the cases was there such a showing of inequality in the assessment as to make it clearly appear that the assessment could not possibly be just. On the contrary, in none of the cases, as we now recall them, was there a showing of any special inequality, or at least no greater inequality than would inevitably exist under any rule of taxation. In Amery v. Keokuk, 72 Iowa, 703, 30 N. W. 780, the only question was whether the lot-owner was entitled to notice of the assessment of the tax, but in a general discussion of the case it was said that "all that was required . . . was the lineal measurement of the front of the lots . . . abutting on the street. . . . There was no authority . . . to institute an inquiry as to how far back from the street the rights of the abutting owners extended." There was, however, no showing of inequality in that case. The lots in question were originally of such size as to be valuable for business or residence purposes, but, after the city had taken therefrom 25 feet for street purposes, the remaining strips of ground manifestly had no value for purposes of improvement, and could only be used in connection with the lots adjoining them on the east; and, if the adjoining owners did not want them, they would be useless, and practically without any market value. It is doubtful whether the legislature, in conferring upon municipalities the power to assess lots and parcels of land for such improvements, ever intended it to be exercised arbitrarily, and in utter disregard of the principles of equality and justice upon which our laws are supposed to be founded. But, however this may be, and whatever independent conclusion we might reach in this particular case in view of our former holdings, is of little consequence if it be true that this case is controlled by the Norwood-Baker Case. The profession is familiar with the issues and facts in that case, but there may be some question as to the extent to which the opinion of the majority goes. In the second edition of Elliott on Roads and Streets, § 558, it is said, speaking of the Norwood-Baker Case: "But the Supreme Court of the United States has recently held that an assessment in substantial excess of the special benefit is invalid, and that the power of the legislature in such matters is not unlimited. The actual decision in the case . . . does not go so far as it has sometimes been supposed to go. . . . We think it is clearly an authority to the effect that a particular assessment is invalid where it is in substantial excess of the benefits, and there is no right to a hearing on which it can be changed, especially where it is physically impossible that the particular property can be benefited to such an extent." And the author adds: "But it does not necessarily follow that the statute itself is unconstitutional merely because it lays down a general rule for determining the special benefits in the first instance, whether by frontage or by any other proper system." In the Norwood-Baker Case it is said: "The plaintiff's suit proceeded upon the ground, distinctly stated, that the assessment in question was in violation of the 14th Amendment, providing that no state shall deprive any person of property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws, as well as of the Bill of Rights of the Constitution of Ohio." The land taken for the street in the Norwood-Baker Case, as in this case, was taken under the power of eminent domain, but in that case valuable tracts of land were still owned by Mrs. Baker on both sides of the street, while here practically nothing was left to the owner. Speaking of the power of the legislature in that case, Mr. Justice Harlan said: "But the power of the legislature in these matters is not unlimited. There is a point beyond which the legislative department, even when exerting the power of taxation, may not go, consistently with the citizen's right of property. As already indicated, the principle underlying special assessments to meet the cost of public improvements is that the property upon which they are imposed is peculiarly benefited, and therefore the owners do not, in fact, pay anything in excess of what they receive by reason of such improvement. But the guaranties for the protection of private property would be seriously impaired if it were established as a rule of constitutional law that the imposition by the legislature upon particular private property of the entire cost of a public improvement, irrespective of any peculiar benefits accruing to the owner from such improvement, could not be questioned by him in the courts of the country. It is one thing for the legislature to prescribe it as a general rule that property abutting on a street opened by the public shall be deemed to have been specially benefited by such improvement, and therefore should specially contribute to the cost incurred by the public. It is quite a different thing to lay it down as an absolute rule that such property, whether it is in fact benefited or not by the opening of the street, may be assessed by the front foot for a fixed sum representing the whole cost of the improvement, and without any right in the property owner to show, when an assessment of that kind is made, or is about to be made, that the sum so fixed is in excess of the benefits received. In our judgment, the exaction from the owner of private property of the cost of a public improvement in substantial excess of the special benefits accruing to him is, to the extent of such excess, a taking, under the guise of taxation, of private property for public use without compensation. We say 'substantial excess,' because exact equality of taxation is not always attainable, and for that reason the excess of cost over special benefits, unless it be of a material character, ought not to be regarded by a court of equity when its aid is invoked to restrain the enforcement of a special assessment."

In French v. Barber Asphalt Paving Co. 181 U. S. 324, 45 L. ed. 879, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 625, there is a general review of the adjudications on the subject, and the following quotation from 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 752, is cited with approval, and may be said to express the view of the majority of the court: "The courts are very generally agreed that the authority to require the property specially benefited to bear the expense of local improvements is a branch of the taxing power, or included within it. . . . Whether the expense of making such improvements shall be paid out of the general treasury, or be assessed upon the abutting property or other property specially benefited, and, if in the latter mode, whether the assessment shall be upon all property found to be benefited or alone upon the abutters, according to frontage or according to the area of their lots, is, according to the present weight of authority, considered to be a question of legislative expediency." This rule, it will be seen, fully recognizes the principle that the assessment must be made on the theory of special benefits to the property assessed, whether all property benefited be assessed or not. This is apparent, not only from the language used, but from the same author's views expressed in § 761 of the same work, where he says: "Special benefits to the property assessed—that is, benefits received by it in addition to those received by the community at large—is the true and only just foundation upon which local assessments can rest, and to the extent of special benefits it is everywhere admitted that the legislature may authorize local taxes or assessments to be made. When not restrained by the Constitution of the particular state, the legislature has a discretion commensurate with the broad domain of legislative power in making provisions for ascertaining what property is specially benefited, and how the benefits shall be apportioned. This proposition, as stated, is nowhere denied; but the adjudged cases do not agree upon the extent of legislative power. The courts which have followed the doctrine of the leading case in New York (People ex rel. Griffin v. Brooklyn, 4 N. Y. 419, 55 Am. Dec. 266) have asserted that the authority of the legislature in this regard is quite without limits; but the decided tendency of the later decisions, including those of the courts of New Jersey, Michigan, and Pennsylvania, is to hold that the legislative power is not unlimited, and that these assessments must be apportioned by some rule capable of producing reasonable equality, and that provisions of such a nature as to make it legally impossible that the burden can be apportioned with proximate equality are arbitrary exactions, and not an exercise of legislative authority."

In the French Case the majority opinion distinguishes it from the Norwood-Baker Case as follows: "It may be conceded that courts of equity are always open to afford a remedy where there is an attempt, under the guise of legal proceedings, to deprive a person of his life, liberty, or property without due process of law. And such, in the opinion of a majority of the judges of this court, was the nature and effect of the proceedings in the case of Norwood v. Baker. But there is no such a state of facts in the present case. Those facts are thus stated by the court of Missouri: "The work done consisted of paving with asphaltum the roadway of Forest avenue in Kansas City, 36 feet in width, from Independence avenue to Twelfth street, a distance of $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile. Forest avenue is one of the oldest and best-improved residence streets in the city, and all of the lots abutting thereon front the street and extend back therefrom uniformly to the depth of an ordinary city lot to an alley. The lots are all improved and used for residence purposes, and all of the lots are substantially on the grade of the street as improved, and are similarly situated with respect to the asphalt pavement. The structure of the pavement along its entire extent is uniform in distance and quality. There is no showing that there is any difference in the value of any of the lots abutting on the improvement.'"

As we have heretofore said, we are of opinion that this case is ruled by Norwood v. Baker, rather than by French v. Barber Asphalt Paving Co., and, following the former case, as we are bound to do, we must hold the assessment in this case invalid.

It is contended, however, that, even if the assessment be invalid, the court can grant no relief, because the owner of the property has made no tender of the amount which he should pay. This contention is also best answered in the Norwood Case, where it is said: "The present case is not one in which—as in most of the cases brought to enjoin the collection of taxes or the enforcement of special assessments—it can be plainly or clearly seen from the showing made by the pleadings that a particular amount, if no more, is due from the plaintiff, and which amount should be paid or tendered before equity would interfere. It is rather a case in which the entire assessment is illegal. In such a case it was not necessary to tender, as a condition of relief being granted to the plaintiff, any sum as representing what she supposed, or might guess, or was willing to concede, was the excess of cost over any benefits accruing to the property. She was entitled, without making such a tender, to ask a court of equity to enjoin the enforcement of a rule of assessment that infringed upon her constitutional rights." The appellant Callanan claims that the land in question is valueless, and that it was physically impossible for it to be benefited by the sewer. It may be that he is in error on both of these questions, but, under the circumstances, we do not think he was bound to tender any sum before asking relief from the unjust imposition on his property. The judgment against him was wrong, and it is reversed.

The city issued to the plaintiff certificates for the amount assessed against the strips of ground, and the plaintiff contends that, if the assessment was illegal as to the land and its owner, the city is liable for the value of the work. There is no question as to the facts in the case. The work was properly done under a contract with the city, which was authorized by law and by its ordinances, and the city has received all the benefits of the work. The contract between the plaintiff and the city contained these provisions: "Said cost is to be assessed as provided by the ordinances of said city, against the private property fronting or abutting on the street or streets upon which said improvement is made, and said assessment shall be payable within the time and in the manner as provided by an ordinance of the city relating to making contracts for paving and curbing streets and alleys, and the construction of sewers, and providing for the manner of making and collecting assessments and issuing certificates for the payment thereof, passed February 22, 1889. And it is further agreed that the said assessment certificates shall be received by said Lennan & O'Brien in full payment and compensation for all work done by them under this contract and without recourse to the city of Des Moines." And while we do not understand from the appellee's argument that it seriously denies the liability of the city in case the assessment is held invalid, there is a suggestion therein that the stipulation that the assessment certificates shall be received in full payment for all work done without recourse on the city relieves the city from all liability on account of its invalid assessment. This position is not tenable, however. The ordinance under which the work was done provided that the cost thereof might be taxed against the private property abutting on the street, and for making and collecting assessments, and for issuing certificates in payment therefor. The contract provided that the cost was to be assessed and paid as provided in the ordinance, but it was not contemplated by either party thereto that the city would make an assessment against abutting property which could not be enforced, and we think it must be held that the latter clause of the contract means nothing more than the acceptance of certificates which are legal, and representing an assessment valid and enforceable. Such was the holding, in substance, in Ft. Dodge Electric Light & P. Co. v. Ft. Dodge, 115 Iowa, 568, 89 N. W. 7, where the question was quite fully considered, and we think that case controlling here, and that the city is liable for the amount of the certificates. See also Bucroft v. Council Bluffs, 63 Iowa, 646, 19 N. W. 807; Scofield v. Council Bluffs, 68 Iowa, 695, 28 N. W. 20.

The amendment to the abstract shows that the notice of the assessment in question related solely to a sewer, and we know of no reason why other and different improvements may not be legally noticed in the same document.

The case is reversed on both appeals.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

ADAMS EXPRESS COMPANY, Appt.,
v.
I. L. WALKER.
(.....Ky.....)

1. The courts of one state will not enforce the provisions of a contract made in another state as to the time in which actions shall be brought on it, which are contrary to the provisions of the local statute of limitations.

2. Negligence on the part of the carrier will be presumed where three dogs are delivered to it for transportation securely crated, and but two reach their destination, without any account being given of the missing one.

3. Courts will not take judicial notice of the laws of another state.

4. A demurrer admits the truth of a

NOTE.—The general subject of the conflict of laws with respect to carrier's contracts is discussed in the note to Hughes v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 63 L. R. A. 513. It will be observed, upon referring to that note, that the general principle of private international law upon the subject is that, in the absence of an express stipulation as to the governing law, or of circumstances indicating a contrary intention of the parties, the validity of a stipulation limiting the carrier's common-law liability is to be 67 L. R. A.

determined by the law of the place where the contract is made and the transportation commences, without reference to the law of the place of destination, or to the law of the place where the alleged breach of contract or loss or damage occurs. The effect of this general principle, when it would otherwise operate to uphold such a stipulation, may, however, be defeated in a particular case upon the ground that the enforcement of the stipulation is contrary to the distinctive policy of the forum.

plea that the provision for limitation of defendant's liability was valid according to the law of the state where the contract was made, in an action to recover the value of the property lost while in possession of a carrier for transportation.

5. In case of a breach of a carriage contract in a state whose Constitution prohibits the carrier from contracting to limit its common-law liability, the carrier cannot, in the courts of that state, have the benefit of a contract valid where made in another state limiting such liability.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Kenton County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the value of a dog lost while in defendant's possession for transportation. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Maxwell & Ramsey, with Mr. John B. Schindel, for appellant:

The declaration of appellee's agent that the value of each dog was $25 was a fraud upon the carrier, which estopped appellee from claiming any greater amount.

What the law of a foreign state is, is a question of fact, not of law.

Gebhard v. Garnier, 12 Bush, 321, 23 Am. Rep. 721.

The validity of the contract is to be determined by the law of Ohio,—the law of the place where it was made.

The enforcement of such a stipulation, though valid by the law of the place where the contract was made and the transportation commenced, may conceivably be contrary to the distinctive policy of the forum whether the breach of contract or loss occurs at the forum or elsewhere. though, as a matter of fact, it was held in Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Drulen, 26 Ky. L. Rep. 103, 80 S. W. 778, that it is not contrary to the distinctive policy of Kentucky to enforce such a stipulation, valid by the law of the place where it was made and the transportation commenced, if the breach of contract or loss did not occur in Kentucky. It is obvious, however, that when, as in ADAMS EXPRESS CO. v. WALKER, the breach of contract and loss occur at the forum, there is greater reason for applying the exception based upon the distinctive policy of the forum; and the decision in this case seems to rest upon the ground that it is contrary to the distinctive policy of Kentucky, in view of the constitutional provision upon the subject, to enforce such a stipulation when the loss occurs in Kentucky. The decision is, therefore, not an authority against the general principle which refers the validity of such a stipulation to the law of the place where the contract is made and the transportation commences irrespective of the law of the place where the breach of contract and loss occur. If the action upon exactly the same state of facts had been brought in Ohio or in a third state, it would not have been inconsistent with the position taken in this case for the court of Ohio or of the third state to have referred the validity of the stipulation to the law of Ohio. In other words, the decision is not to the effect that the stipulation was invalid, but merely to the effect that, in view of the distinctive policy of Kentucky, it would not be enforced or given effect in the courts of that state. Hobson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee, Walker, was the owner of an English setter bitch. On November 13, 1902, he delivered her, securely crated with two other dogs, to the Adams Express Company at Wooster, Ohio, to be carried to Vanceburg, Kentucky, and there delivered to J. C. Walker, his agent. When the crate reached Vanceburg, the bitch was missing, 67 L. R. A.

and he filed this suit to recover of the express company $250, her alleged value. The defendant, by its answer, denied that it was a common carrier of live stock, or that the bitch was lost by its negligence, or was of value exceeding $25. It also pleaded as follows: "Prior to the delivery of said dogs to the defendant, it notified plaintiff that its charges for carrying the same would be based upon the value of the dogs,—said value being unknown to defendant,—and requested plaintiff to declare the value thereof, in order that defendant might fix its charges; that its charges would be $2.70 if the value of each dog did not exceed the sum of $50, and proportionately greater if the value of the dogs exceeded $50 each; and the plaintiff, in pursuance of said notice and request, then well knowing the value of said dogs, and their value being wholly unknown to the defendant, declared to the defendant that the true value of said dogs did not exceed the sum of $50 each, and on the faith of said declaration, and in consideration of said charge of $2.70, based upon said valuation of said dogs, the plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement in writing, which was valid by the laws of Ohio, whereby the defendant agreed to carry said dogs from Wooster, Ohio, to Vanceburg, Kentucky, for the sum of $2.70, and the plaintiff agreed to, and did, release and discharge the defendant from all liability for loss of said dogs from any cause whatsoever, unless such loss should be caused by the negligence of the agents or employees of the defendant, and that the defendant should not be liable to the plaintiff, in any event, in excess of $25 on account of the loss of any of said dogs. Said agreement further provided that no suit should be brought against the defendant for recovery for the loss of said dogs unless commenced within six months next after such loss should have occurred, and that, if any suit should be commenced against the defendant after the expiration of said six months, lapse of time should be taken as conclusive evidence against the validity of such claim, any statute of limitations to the contrary notwithstanding." The court sustained a demurrer to this part of the answer. On the trial of the case the following agreed statement of facts was filed: "By consent of parties a trial by jury is waived, and the following facts are agreed to: That the bitch in the petition described was shipped as alleged in the petition; that her value was unknown to the defendant; that a special contract of shipment was signed by the parties; that the defendant held itself out as a carrier of live stock only under the conditions of said special contract, a copy of which is filed as a part of this agreed statement; that the bitch was properly crated; that she escaped from the custody of the defendant somewhere between Wooster, Ohio, and Vanceburg, Kentucky; and that her value was two hundred ($200) dollars." The circuit court entered judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals.

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Eubanks, 100 Ky. 591, 36 L. R. A. 711, 66 Am. St. Rep. 361, 38 S. W. 1068, a telegram was sent from Atlanta, Georgia, to Franklin, Kentucky. One of the conditions printed on the back of the message was that no action should be brought for damages unless commenced within sixty days after the message was sent. The court, after laying down the rule that public policy forbids that a carrier should by any contract exempt itself from damages resulting from its own negligence, said in reference to the contract limitation of sixty days for the bringing of the action, that it is the province of the law-making power to prescribe the time in which an action may be brought, and that the limitation of sixty days, if not an attempt to vary the statute of limitation, would, if enforced, have that effect. This case was approved in Davis v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 107 Ky. 527, 92 Am. St. Rep. 371, 54 S. W. 849, where the court again said as follows as to the limitation of sixty days contained in the contract: "That such a provision, as respects telegrams, is contrary to public policy, and will not be upheld, seems to be indicated in Smith v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 83 Ky. 104, 4 Am. St. Rep. 126, and the rule is authoritatively so announced by this court in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Eubanks, 100 Ky. 591, 36 L. R. A. 711, 66 Am. St. Rep. 361, 38 S. W. 1068. It was error to hold that the stipulation presented a valid defense."

It is insisted for appellant that, the contract here having been made in Wooster, Ohio, it must be governed by the laws of Ohio, and that by the laws of Ohio such a limitation is valid. Limitation is governed by the law of the forum in which the suit is brought, and the courts of this state will not, as a matter of comity, enforce a contract made in Ohio as to the time when the suit shall be brought, for this is regulated by our statutes.

From the agreed facts, negligence on the part of the defendant may be inferred, for, if three dogs were delivered to it securely crated, and two remained in the crate when delivered at Vanceburg, no account being given by the defendant of the missing dog, clearly it should be presumed that the defendant or some of its agents converted the dog, or by negligence allowed it to escape. We are referred to decisions of the supreme court of Ohio holding that a common carrier cannot by contract protect itself from its own negligence, and that this rule applies to the carriage of animals. Wilson v. Hamilton, 4 Ohio St. 723; United States Exp. Co. v. Backmun, 28 Ohio St. 144; Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Sheppard, 56 Ohio St. 68, 60 Am. St. Rep. 732, 46 N. E. 61. But we cannot take judicial notice of the law of Ohio. The demurrer admits the truth of the plea. In Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Druen, 26 Ky. L. Rep. 103, 80 S. W. 778, this court had before it the question by what law a contract of carriage is governed where the contract is made in another state, and the goods are to be delivered in this state. The rule was there laid down that, where the contract is valid in the state where it is made, the law of that state governs it, so far as it is to be performed outside of this state, but that the law of this state governs it so far as it is to be performed in this state. In the case of Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Eubanks, 100 Ky. 591, 36 L. R. A. 711, 66 Am. St. Rep. 361, 38 S. W. 1068, it was not pleaded that the contract was valid under the law of Georgia, or that the loss occurred there; and the court seems to have had in mind, in what it said in that case, only the limitation of the action to sixty days. The same is true of the case of Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Graves, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 684, 52 S. W. 961. The cases of Illinois C. R. Co. v. Radford, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 886, 64 S. W. 511, and Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Frazee, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 1273, 71 S. W. 437, involved contracts made in this state. Section 196 of the Constitution governs such contracts. Its language is, "No common carrier shall be permitted to contract for relief from its common-law liability." The Constitution of Kentucky has no extraterritorial effect, and this provision does not govern contracts made elsewhere which are lawful by the law of the place where they are made. It governs contracts made in Kentucky, and these, being unlawful at the place where they are made, are void everywhere; but contracts that are made elsewhere, and are valid where made, will be governed here by the law of the place where they are made, so far as they are not performed here. Under this rule, the court properly sustained the demurrer to the defendant's plea of the law of Ohio, as it did not show that the dog was lost in Ohio; and, to protect itself under the Ohio law, it should have shown, not only that the contract was valid under the law of Ohio, but that the nonperformance of the contract occurred there.

It remains to determine what are the rights of the parties under the law of Kentucky. In Orndorff v. Adams Exp. Co. 3 Bush, 194, 96 Am. Dec. 207, a contract limitation similar to the one relied on here was considered by the court, and it was held that a common carrier could not by such a contract exempt itself from losses by negligence. This case was followed in Louisville, C. & L. R. Co. v. Hedger, 9 Bush, 645, 15 Am. Rep. 740, which was, like this, a case where damages were sought for the carriage of animals. To the same effect are Rhodes v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 9 Bush, 688; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Brownlee, 14 Bush, 590; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Owen, 93 Ky. 201, 19 S. W. 590; Baughman v. Louisville, E. & St. R. Co. 94 Ky. 150, 21 S. W. 757. The precise question here raised was made in Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Graves, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 684, 52 S. W. 961, where it was alleged that the stock was undervalued, and thereby the defendant was misled as to its value. The plea was held bad. That shipment was made from Cincinnati, Ohio, to Lexington, Kentucky. The same question was again made in Illinois C. R. Co. v. Radford, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 886, 64 S. W. 511, where the shipment was from Hopkinsville, Kentucky, to Evansville, Indiana, and Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Frazee, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 1273, 71 S. W. 437, where the contract was also made in Kentucky. While the exact question here made was presented in only one of these cases, and there are expressions in some of the opinions limiting them to the particular facts before the court, still the reasoning in all the cases is against the validity of such contracts, and we regard them as settling the rule in this state under our constitutional provision. In the absence of a special contract, it would not be maintained that the defendant is not liable for the value of the dog lost. But our Constitution declares the contract limiting this liability void. So the contract is as though it had not been made, and the defendant is liable, unless sufficient facts are shown independently of the special contract to avoid the contract for fraud, or to create an estoppel at common law.

Judgment affirmed.

Petition for rehearing overruled.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Thomas DYER
v.

MAINE CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY.

(99 Me. 195.)

1. A clause in a statute making a railroad company liable for losses by fire set out by its engines, which gives it the benefit of any insurance on the property, applies only to cases where the liability is imposed by the statute, and not to those where it is liable because of its own negligence; so that in the latter case it is not entitled to the benefit of the insurance on the property.
2. The burning of buildings near a railroad right of way may be found to have been caused by sparks from an engine where no fire existed before the passage of the engine, which was emitting a large quantity of smoke and fire, and shortly after its passage fire was discovered in the grass, which communicated to and consumed the buildings.
3. Negligence on the part of a railroad company will be presumed when fire is communicated by its engines to property abutting on its right of way.

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Cumberland County for the opinion of the full bench of an action brought to hold defendant liable for the value of buildings alleged to have been destroyed by fire negligently set out by its engine. Judgment for plaintiff.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Clifford, Verrill, & Clifford, for plaintiff:

In the absence of any testimony tending to show that a fire caught in any other way, a jury is justified in finding that a fire was started by a spark from a locomotive.

Where damage is caused by fire which is proved to have escaped from the engines of a railroad company, a presumption of negligence on the part of the company arises, which casts the burden of proof upon it to show affirmatively the absence of negligence.

Powers, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action at common law, brought for the benefit of the Liverpool, London, & Globe Insurance Company, to recover the amount of insurance paid by it to the plaintiff upon his buildings in Freeport, alleged 67 L. R. A.

to have been destroyed by fire communicated by sparks escaping from the locomotive engine of the defendant, through its negligence in the construction, equipment, management, and operation of the same. The defendant has already paid to the plaintiff the full amount for which it is liable under Rev. Stat. 1883, chap. 51, § 64, as amended by chap. 79, p. 77, Pub. Laws 1895, and insists that it is under no further liability. That statute is as follows: "When a building or other property is injured by fire communicated by a locomotive engine, the corporation using it is responsible for such injury, and it has an insurable interest in the property along the route, for which it is responsible, and may procure insurance thereon. But such corporation shall be entitled to the benefit of any insurance upon such property effected by the owner thereof less the premium and expense of recovery. The insurance shall be deducted from the damages, if recovered before the damages are assessed, or, if not, the policy shall be assigned to such corporation, which may maintain an action thereon, or prosecute, at its own expense, any action already commenced by the insured, in either case with all the rights which the insured originally had."

Independently of any statute, and prior to the enactment of chap. 9, § 5, p. 6, Laws 1842, the owner of property had the right at common law to recover damages sustained by fire communicated from a locomotive engine through the negligence of the railroad company using it. The act of 1842, which continued unchanged until 1895, broadened the liability of a railroad company, so that it was made to embrace all cases of fire communicated from its locomotive engine. It was no longer necessary to allege and prove negligence in the use of the engine, and the statute in effect made the railroad company an insurer. If the property damaged was insured, the insurance company was entitled to subrogation. In such case, the owner might collect of either party that he saw fit. If from the insurance company first, then that fact constituted no defense for the railroad company, and any sum collected by him in excess of what was necessary, with the insurance, to compensate him for his full loss, he held in trust for the insurance company. If, on the other hand, he collected from the railroad first, he thereby diminished to the same extent his claim against the insurance company. Both were insurers, the insurance company by virtue of its voluntary contract, and the railroad company by force of the statute which imposed the liability upon it. The liability of the railroad company was, however, primary, and that of the insurance company secondary, not in point of time, but in point of ultimate liability. Hart v. Western R. Corp. 13 Met. 99, 46 Am. Dec. 719.

In this state of the law the statute was amended by chap. 79, p. 77, Pub. Laws 1895, giving to the railroad the benefit of any insurance upon the property, and providing that the insurance should be deducted from the damages if recovered before they were assessed, or, if not, that the policy should be assigned to the railroad corporation, which might then maintain an action thereon with all the rights of the insured. This amendment had special and particular reference to the adjustment of the liability of the two insurers—the insurance company and the railroad company—in those cases falling under the section which was amended, and in which it was necessary for the owner to invoke the statutory liability of the defendant corporation in order to recover against it. The legislature might well deem it just that, as between the voluntary insurer by contract and the one who, without fault on its part, is made such by law, the latter should have the preference. To go further and say that in a case where the railroad company is liable because of its own fault and negligence, and not as an insurer, it should have the benefit of any insurance effected by the owner upon such property, would be a manifest injustice. The consequence of the defendant's negligence would then fall, not upon itself, but upon the insurance company; not upon the guilty, but upon the innocent. We cannot believe that a result so repugnant to justice could have been within the legislative intention. This action, therefore, may be maintained notwithstanding the amendment of 1895. That act is limited in its application to those cases in which the section amended makes the railroad company an insurer; in other words, to those cases in which the liability of the defendant is created by that section, and not by its own negligent act.

The result here reached is not in conflict with Leavitt v. Canadian P. R. Co. 90 Me. 153, 38 L. R. A. 152, 37 Atl. 886. In that case it was admitted that fire was communicated without fault or negligence on the part of the defendant, thus clearly presenting a state of facts under which the railroad was chargeable, not at common law, but solely because of its statutory liability. We are aware, also, that the right of subrogation was denied to the insurance company under a similar statute in Lyons v. Boston & L. R. Co. 181 Mass. 551, 64 N. E. 404; but that, like Leavitt v. Canadian P. R. Co. 90 Me. 153, 38 L. R. A. 152, 37 Atl. 886, appears to have been an action based upon the statutory liability of the defendant, and the questions here decided were not raised or considered.

This case comes before the court upon report, and the defendant contends it is not liable upon the facts. The undisputed facts are that on the date in question the defendant's locomotive engine, sending out an unusual amount of smoke and cinders, passed over its road through the plaintiff's farm, and about 300 feet from his buildings. There was no fire seen before the train passed, but it was discovered shortly after in the grass near the railroad track, extending from the banks of the railroad to the plaintiff's buildings, which it consumed. No attempt is made to account for the fire at this time or place upon any other hypothesis, and we think it is a fair inference that the fire was communicated by sparks from the defendant's locomotive. Gibbons v. Wisconsin Valley R. Co. 66 Wis. 161, 28 N. W. 170; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Esten, 178 Ill. 192, 52 N. E. 954; Smith v. London & N. W. R. Co. L. R. 5 C. P. 98; 13 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 513.

The plaintiff must still prove that the defendant's negligence was the cause of the fire, and there is no evidence of any negligence on the defendant's part, unless negligence in the construction, equipment, or management of its locomotive engine can be inferred from the fact that the fire was communicated by sparks from it. On the question whether that fact alone is sufficient to make out a prima facie case of such negligence, there appears to be an irreconcilable conflict of authority. The most respectable courts, after careful consideration, have arrived at directly contrary conclusions. On the one hand, it has been held that no such presumption arises, because, first, the defendant is carrying on a lawful business in a lawful manner, and, second, that sparks and coals may escape notwithstanding all the safeguards have been adopted which modern science can suggest, and the greatest skill and care are employed in the operation of the engine. On the other hand, we may well presume that the defendant is not running locomotives over its road, the natural and probable effect of which would be to communicate fire to the property along its route if the locomotives were properly equipped and carefully managed, and when fire is so communicated the natural presumption is that it is due to negligence. More than that, such a presumption has its foundation in the necessities of the case. The locomotives of railroad companies by night and day rush with great velocity through the land. They are here to-day, and to-morrow may be hundreds of miles away. They are within the control of the defendant. The method of their equipment and manner of their operation are known to its employees, who are always present with the engine, and evidence touching this subject is easy of production on its part. The owner of the property destroyed has no such opportunities of knowledge. It may be often exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, for him to even identify the engine which has caused the injury, or to obtain the names of those who know about its equipment or its use. He is frequently absent, and, if present at the time and place of the fire, he can obtain but a momentary view of the locomotive. He has no opportunity for inspection, and knows nothing of its equipment and management. He can judge only by the result, and can often obtain no other proof as to whether the injury which he suffers has been caused by negligence. It is similar to those cases in which the burden of proof is cast upon him who best knows the facts. In this state the question is a new one. We are at liberty to adopt that rule which seems to us most consonant with reason and justice, and we think that negligence in the construction, equipment, or management of the defendant's locomotive engine may fairly be inferred from the fact that the fire was communicated by sparks from it, and that, there being no evidence or circumstances to rebut that inference, it is sufficient to enable the plaintiff to make out a prima facie case of negligence, and maintain this action. This view is amply supported by the following among many authorities: Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Beal (Neb.) 94 N. W. 956; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Mills, 42 Ill. 407; Spaulding v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 30 Wis. 110, 11 Am. Rep. 550, 33 Wis. 582; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Benson, 69 Tex. 407, 5 Am. St. Rep. 74, 5 S. W. 822; Clemens v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 53 Mo. 366, 14 Am. Rep. 460; Burke v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 7 Heisk. 451, 19 Am. Rep. 618; Hull v. Sacramento Valley R. Co. 14 Cal. 387, 73 Am. Dec. 656; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Marbury Lumber Co. 132 Ala. 520, 90 Am. St. Rep. 917, 32 So. 745; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Reese, 85 Ala. 497, 7 Am. St. Rep. 66, 5 So. 283. "In the case of railroad engines it has been repeatedly decided that the fact that fire had been communicated by them to the premises of individuals is sufficient to raise a presumption that the railroad company was not employing the best known contrivances to retain the fire, and to make out a prima facie case of negligence." Cooley, Torts, 2d ed. 702. In the closely analogous case of Dunning v. Maine C. R. Co. 91 Me. 87, 64 Am. St. Rep. 208, 39 Atl. 352, this court felt the necessity of applying to locomotives a somewhat more liberal rule of evidence than is applied in other cases.

Lowney v. New Brunswick R. Co. 78 Me. 479, 7 Atl. 381, is not an authority to the contrary. That case differed from the present in two all-important particulars: First, there does not appear to have been any sufficient proof that the fire was in fact communicated by the defendant's locomotive engine; and, second, the defendant introduced evidence tending to show that there was no negligence in either the equipment or operation of the locomotive. After stating that it might be doubted whether there was sufficient proof that the fire was communicated by the locomotive, the court says: "The negligence must be proved. Its relation as the efficient cause of the fire must also be proved. . . . In this case we find no evidence of such negligence, nor of its causal relation. It is urged in the argument for the plaintiff that the dampers were probably open or warped, or that ignited coals may have been blown out of the ash pan, or that the smoke-stack might not have had proper appliances to arrest sparks. We do not find the evidence of them, however. Indeed, what evidence there was upon these points seems to negative the plaintiff's suggestions." If there was no sufficient proof that the fire was communicated by the defendant's locomotive, the question of negligence could not arise. If there was such proof, then the evidence negated the claim of the defendant's negligence. The question whether, when the fire is in fact communicated by the locomotive, and there is no evidence as to its manner of construction, equipment, and operation, negligence in one of those particulars may fairly be inferred from the escape of the sparks in such quantity and manner as to cause the fire, was not before the court in that case.

The value of the property destroyed was $2,800, and the defendant has paid to the plaintiff $1,120.

Judgment for plaintiff for $1,680, and interest from the date of writ.

Emery, J., dissenting:

While a steam locomotive of the defendant railroad company was in lawful operation, drawing a train of cars, sparks escaped from it, setting fire to the plaintiff's property. Despite the able reasoning of the majority opinion and the citations in support of it, I am unable to assent to the proposition that this escape of sparks, nothing further appearing, is sufficient evidence to establish negligence in the equipment or operation of the locomotive. I think there is danger in the proposition, justifying me in attempting to show reasons against it.

1. Apart from authority, the proposition seems to be based on the assumption that locomotives are ordinarily so equipped and managed as not to set fire to property along the route. The argument seems to be that the setting of fires by sparks from a passing locomotive is exceptional, and therefore indicates some fault in equipment or operation. I deem the argument faulty, in that it deals with the setting of fires instead of the escape of sparks; confounds the consequences, which may or may not ensue, with the act which is the subject under consideration. While the setting of fires by them may be very exceptional, the escape of sparks may nevertheless be of daily and hourly occurrence. Sparks may or may not set fires after their escape, according to events and conditions entirely outside of the railroad company's sphere of action or duty, as high winds, severe droughts, etc. Whether a given act or omission is negligent is not determined by its consequences. So whether a primary result is evidence of negligence is not determined by a secondary result. The negligence of the defendant, if any, was in the act or omission through which the sparks escaped, not in the escape itself. Hence, while the setting of fires may be evidence of the escape of sparks, it is not evidence of the cause of the escape, whether from accident or negligence.

It would seem to follow that the assumption, however indisputable, that locomotives are ordinarily so equipped and operated as not to set fires, does not sustain the proposition that the escape of sparks from a passing locomotive indicates fault in equipment or operation.

I think, to sustain the proposition, the assumption must be as broad as this, viz., that locomotives can be so equipped with known appliances and so operated in known modes that sparks will not ordinarily, or often, escape from them while in operation. There being no evidence whatever in the case upon this point, the assumption must be, from common, conceded knowledge, so common and undisputed that the court can act upon it without evidence. If the assumption has not this foundation, it must fall, and the argument with it.

Is it common knowledge, and undisputed, that such appliances exist, and that such modes of operation are known? I must confess my own ignorance of them. I do not understand it is claimed to be knowledge so common and undisputed: and whoever will observe the mass of cinders strewing the sides of railroad tracks, and will observe the smokestacks of locomotives running at night, will find, I think, much evidence to the contrary.

2. As to authorities, it is frankly admitted in the opinion that no case in this state has gone so far. It is also frankly admitted that eminent courts hold adversely to 67 L. R. A.

its views, while claiming support in the decisions of many other courts. Cases are cited in such support from Illinois, Wisconsin, Texas, Missouri, Tennessee, Alabama, and California. I will not stop to inquire how far these decisions may have been influenced by the statutes of those states or by other circumstances, nor will I burden the reader with citations of cases the other way, for I think the proposition is in conflict with the declarations and even decisions of our own court. In Sturgis v. Robbins, 62 Me. 289, a case of fire escaping and causing injury, the court said, on page 290: "It is not to be presumed that an act lawful in itself was not done at a suitable time and in a careful and prudent manner." In Nason v. West, 78 Me. 253, 3 Atl. 911, the court said, on page 256, 78 Me., page 912, 3 Atl.: "Presumption of negligence from the fact alone that an accident has happened will not do, for, if there is any presumption in such a case, it is that the defendants have complied with those obligations which rest upon them equally with other men." In Pellerin v. International Paper Co. 96 Me. 388, 52 Atl. 842, the court, on page 391, 96 Me., page 843, 52 Atl., quoted the above expression from Nason v. West, and added: "No presumption of such negligence arises from the mere fact that an accident happened." In Leach v. French, 69 Me. 389, 31 Am. Rep. 296, the court said, on page 393, 69 Me., page 298, 31 Am. Rep.: "Negligence and misdoing are not to be presumed; there must be positive evidence of them." In Lounney v. New Brunswick R. Co. 78 Me. 479, 7 Atl. 381, a case of fire communicated by a locomotive, the court said, on page 480, 78 Me., page 382, 7 Atl.: "The burden upon the plaintiff, therefore, was to prove, not only that the fire was communicated by the engine, but also that the defendants were guilty of negligence, and their negligence was the cause of the communication of the fire. The communication of the fire alone does not import negligence." This seems quite an explicit declaration, and intentionally made. It is sought to distinguish the two cases, but I think the reader of both opinions will be convinced that the court in the Lounney Case was pressed with the same proposition, and considered it and intentionally pronounced against it. It will hardly be suggested that the concurring justices would have permitted such an explicit declaration to pass them unchallenged if they did not fully agree with it.

But, further, I think the court has also expressly and necessarily adjudicated upon the principle involved. Bachelder v. Heagan, 18 Me. 32, was, like this, a case of escaping fire, where fire lawfully upon the land of the defendant, but which he was by law bound to carefully guard and manage to prevent its escape to the lands of others, did escape to land of the plaintiff and set fire there. It was stoutly contended in that case, as in this, that the escape of the fire alone, if unexplained, was evidence of the defendant's negligence in the premises. The court squarely held that it was not. Sturgis v. Robbins, 62 Me. 289, was a similar case. The fire set by the defendant on his own land had escaped therefrom and set fire to property of the plaintiff. The plaintiff's counsel in effect advanced the same proposition, to wit, that the mere escape of the fire indicated that the defendant was in fault either in the time or manner of building his fire, which he must disprove or be held liable. The court held directly the contrary.

I do not find that either of these cases has since been questioned, though the escape of fire from lands and locomotives has been of frequent occurrence. They seem to me not distinguishable in principle from the case at bar. The defendant company had the right (as good as that of the farmer) to build and maintain fires in its locomotives as they lawfully passed by and near the plaintiff's buildings. In this particular case it was not bound as an insurer, but only bound to use due care to prevent the escape of the fire. If the escape of fire from the land of the farmer does not indicate fault in him which he must disprove, I do not see how the escape of sparks from the running locomotive of a railroad company indicates fault on its part which it must disprove.

3. But the majority opinion seems to be also based on the difficulty of the plaintiff in such cases as this in finding any other sufficient evidence of the defendant's negligence. It seems to be urged that, as it is so much easier for the defendant to prove that it was careful than for the plaintiff to prove that it was careless, it should be required to do so. Is not this in effect equivalent to saying that, whenever the plaintiff cannot prove the defendant's fault in a matter, that fault should be assumed, and the burden be put upon the defendant to prove his innocence? How can this doctrine be limited, without obnoxious discrimination, to actions against railroad companies? Why is it not equally applicable to every case where the court thinks it easier for the defendant to prove his innocence than for the plaintiff to prove the fault or wrong? Is it not destructive of the presumption of innocence which has hitherto protected persons accused of negligence or any other tort or crime?

I think this court has never before intimated any approval of such a doctrine as applicable to a case where fault is necessary to be shown. In the case of Dunning v. Maine C. R. Co. 91 Me. 87, 64 Am. St. Rep. 208, 39 Atl. 352, cited in the opinion, no fault was to be proved. The company was an insurer. It was not only necessary to prove the communication of fire from the locomotive. Here it was necessary to prove that, and also the defendant's fault in the matter. On the other hand, the court seems to have been pressed at times with the argument that, when circumstances render affirmative proof of some essential element in the plaintiff's case difficult or impossible, the court should assume it to exist unless disproved; yet the court, while sometimes recognizing the hardship, has never dispensed with the proof. McLane v. Perkins, 92 Me. 39, 43 L. R. A. 487, 42 Atl. 255, and the cases already cited.

The legislature, upon whom such arguments should be urged rather than upon the court, can meet the difficulty by imposing liability as insurer instead of mere liability as wrongdoer. It has done so in the case of fires communicated by locomotives, and has thus relieved persons injured by such fires from the burden of proving the fault of the owner or operator. It is competent, and I think expedient, for the legislature to do so; but it seems to have left this plaintiff, under the circumstances of this case, to prove the fault of the company as prerequisite to recovery of damages from it. I think, therefore, the court should continue to hold in this case, as it held in Bachelor v. Heagan, 18 Me. 32, and Sturgis v. Robbins, 62 Me. 289, and as it at least declared in Lowney v. New Brunswick R. Co. 78 Me. 479, 7 Atl. 381, that the mere escape of fire, lawfully upon the defendant's property, serving him in a lawful business, is not evidence of his fault; that the difficulty of proving his fault does not cast upon him the burden of disproving it.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

John OBERTONI, by Next Friend,
v.
BOSTON & MAINE RAILROAD.

(180 Mass. 481.)

1. A railroad company is not liable for injuries to a boy from a torpedo which he picks up near the track merely upon evidence that a brakeman tossed it to a flagman, who threw it back, and, upon the brakeman's failure to catch it and letting it fall to the ground, no attempt was made to recover and remove it to a safe place; since there is nothing to show that the employees were acting within the scope of their employment.
2. The presence of a signal torpedo upon the planking where a highway crosses a railroad track is not of itself evidence of negligence on the part of the railroad company in failing properly to care for the torpedo.

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Berkshire County made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from the negligence of defendant's employees, for which it was liable, which resulted in a verdict in plaintiff's favor. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Dana Malone, for defendant:

The torpedo was thrown to carry out some whim of the brakeman in accordance with some impulse of his own, and not for the purpose of carrying out or accomplishing the purposes for which he was then and there employed.

Howe v. Newmarch, 12 Allen, 49; Hankinson v. Lynn Gas & Electric Co. 175 Mass. 271, 56 N. E. 604; Brown v. Boston Ice Co. 178 Mass. 108, 86 Am. St. Rep. 469, 59 N. E. 644; McCarthy v. Timmins, 178 Mass. 378, 86 Am. St. Rep. 490, 59 N. E. 1038.

At the time of the injury the plaintiff was at his own home, and not at the crossing, and, therefore, was entitled to no protection against such possibilities of harm to himself.

Gay v. Essex Electric Street R. Co. 159 Mass. 238, 21 L. R. A. 448, 38 Am. St. Rep. 415, 34 N. E. 186; Holbrook v. Aldrich, 168 Mass. 15, 36 L. R. A. 493, 60 Am. St. Rep. 364, 46 N. E. 115; Hughes v. Boston & M. R. Co. 71 N. H. 279, 93 Am. St. Rep. 518, NOTE.—As to liability of railroad company for injury to small boy by explosion of torpedo picked up by him from railroad track, see also, in this series, Cleveland Terminal & Valley R. Co. v. Marsh, 52 L. R. A. 142, 67 L. R. A.

51 Atl. 1070; Mangan v. Atterton, L. R. 1 Exch. 239; Hughes v. Maofie, 2 Hurlst. & C. 744; Carter v. Columbia & G. R. Co. 19 S. C. 20, 45 Am. Rep. 754.

The true inquiry is whether the injury sustained was such as, according to common experience and in the usual course of events, might reasonably be anticipated.

McDonald v. Snelling, 14 Allen, 290, 92 Am. Dec. 768.

The act was directly caused by the boy himself in taking the torpedo home and pounding it until it exploded.

McGuinness v. Butler, 159 Mass. 233, 38 Am. St. Rep. 412, 34 N. E. 259; Mangan v. Atterton, L. R. 1 Exch. 239.

The action of the boy in striking the torpedo with a stone would indicate that he had some knowledge of its properties, and the injury should be ascribed to misfortune attributable to his childish ignorance and inexperience, and not to any actionable fault of the defendant.

Gay v. Essex Electric Street R. Co. 159 Mass. 238, 21 L. R. A. 448, 38 Am. St. Rep. 415, 34 N. E. 186; Hughes v. Boston & M. R. Co. 71 N. H. 279, 93 Am. St. Rep. 518, 51 Atl. 1070.

The torpedo must have been picked up from the location by the plaintiff, and, if so, he was a trespasser and was not entitled to recover.

Daniels v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 154 Mass. 349, 13 L. R. A. 248, 26 Am. St. Rep. 253, 28 N. E. 283; Carter v. Tourne, 98 Mass. 569, 96 Am. Dec. 682.

Mr. John H. Mack, for plaintiff:

The defendant is liable for having placed a dangerous obstruction in the highway.

Lane v. Atlantic Works, 111 Mass. 136; Harriman v. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. 45 Ohio St. 11, 4 Am. St. Rep. 507, 12 N. E. 451.

The question of the plaintiff's due care in handling the torpedo as he did was one of fact for the jury.

Lynch v. Smith, 104 Mass. 52, 6 Am. Rep. 188; Lovett v. Salem & S. D. R. Co. 9 Allen, 557.

Loring, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The evidence in this case warranted a finding that the plaintiff, a boy eight years of age, found a signal torpedo on the planking of the railroad at a grade crossing of a highway; that he took it home, and, not knowing the danger, cracked it with a rock, and was hurt. In addition, there was the testimony of one Paris that "a brakeman threw the torpedo to the flagman at the crossing, and it dropped at his feet, as he did not catch it: that the flagman threw it back to the brakeman, and he did not catch it, and the torpedo dropped to the ground;" that, "after the train went by, the flagman went back to his covered station without picking it up." The defendant contends that there was no evidence of negligence on its part, and we are of opinion that in this contention it is right. The plaintiff's position is that, if the story told by Paris was believed, the defendant was liable; and he relies on Harriman v. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. 45 Ohio St. 11, 4 Am. St. Rep. 507, 12 N. E. 451, in support of that contention, to which may be added the subsequent case of Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Shields, 47 Ohio St. 387, 8 L. R. A. 464, 21 Am. St. Rep. 840, 24 N. E. 658, as cases of the highest court of another state. But we are of opinion that, if the torpedo came to and was left on the planking in the way testified to by Paris, the defendant is not liable, and for the reason that the jury were not warranted in finding that the brakeman and flagman, in throwing the torpedo back and forth, and leaving it on the crossing, were acting in the course of their employment. There is nothing in the evidence in this case, or in the common knowledge of mankind as to railroad signal torpedoes, which would make it the duty of a brakeman to throw a torpedo to a flagman. All that was declared as to the use of railroad torpedoes in evidence in this case was that "signal torpedoes were used by railroads in signaling, being fastened upon the rails and containing an explosive." There was nothing in the evidence showing that it belonged to a flagman at a railroad crossing to signal trains by torpedoes or otherwise. Much less is that within the common knowledge of mankind. If the use of railroad torpedoes is a fact within such common knowledge at all, the flagman has nothing whatever to do with signaling trains or with torpedoes. The case comes within the rule laid down in Howe v. Newmarch, 12 Allen, 49, which was applied in Hankinson v. Lynn Gas & Electric Co. 175 Mass. 271, 56 N. E. 604, and Brown v. Boston Ice Co. 178 Mass. 108, 86 Am. St. Rep. 469, 59 N. E. 644. See also McCarthy v. Timmins, 178 Mass. 378, 86 Am. St. Rep. 490, 59 N. E. 1038. The two cases from Ohio relied on by the plaintiff in the case at bar are entitled to great consideration as cases of the highest court of another state, but, after a careful consideration of them, we are of opinion that they are not in accordance with the settled law of this commonwealth, and should not have been followed by the judge presiding at the trial.

The remaining question is whether the plaintiff was entitled to go to the jury on the fact that the torpedo was found on the planking. A witness put upon the stand by the defendant contradicted the entire story told by Paris. That entitled the plaintiff to raise the question whether the presence of the torpedo on the planking was sufficient evidence that it was there through negligence on the part of the defendant or its servants, and that the defendant was liable on that ground if Paris's story was not believed. The case comes within Casady v. Old Colony Street R. Co. 184 Mass. 156, 63 L. R. A. 285, 68 N. E. 10, which goes on the same principle as Winship v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 170 Mass. 464, 49 N. E. 647, where the opposite conclusion was reached, and not within Buckland v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 181 Mass. 3, 62 N. E. 955, and Galligan v. Old Colony Street R. Co. 182 Mass. 211, 65 N. E. 48. But we are of opinion that the presence of the torpedo on the planking is not evidence which, by the common experience of mankind, justifies the inference that it would not have been there but for the negligence of the railroad or its servants in the course of their employment. The fact that it was a railroad signal torpedo warranted the inference that it was left on the crossing by someone who took it from the defendant railroad, but did not warrant the further inference that it came there through some negligent act of the defendant, or of its employees in the course of the business of the defendant. It is equally probable that it was taken from the railroad by a stranger or by an employee for some purpose of his own, outside his duty as an employee. The burden is on the plaintiff to prove that it came there by act of the defendant or of its employees in the course of its business. We are of opinion that, from its presence on the planking, the jury were not warranted in inferring that it was there through the act of an employee, done in the course of the defendant's business. The nearest case where it has been held that such an inference could be drawn is the case where a pail of sand fell from a railroad bridge, coupled with evidence that no one was to be seen on the bridge immediately after the accident. Louner v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 175 Mass. 166, 55 N. E. 805. The last case in which it was held that res ipsa loquitur did not apply was Wadsworth v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 182 Mass. 572, 66 N. E. 421. Some of the earlier cases are collected in that opinion.

Under these circumstances, it is not necessary to consider the other questions argued. Exceptions sustained.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

PEOPLE of the State of Michigan
v.

Calvin BIRD, Appt.

(.....Mich.....)

Furnishing liquor to a minor as an act of hospitality in one's home is not a violation of a provision, making it unlawful for any person to give such liquor to a minor, which is embraced within a statute the title to which states that it is to provide for the taxation and regulation of the business of selling, furnishing, and giving liquors.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Ionia County convicting him of giving liquor to a minor. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. A. Ellis, for appellant:

The courts cannot enlarge the scope of the title. They are vested with no dispensing power. The Constitution has made the title the conclusive index to the legislative intent as to what shall have operation.

Cooley, Const. Lim. § 149; Callaghan v. Chipman, 59 Mich. 614, 26 N. W. 806; Re Hauck, 70 Mich. 403, 38 N. W. 269; State v. Mott, 61 Md. 297, 48 Am. Rep. 105; *People v. The title of this act is necessarily restrictive, because it applies to nothing more than "the business."

Moore, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Respondent was convicted of violating the provisions of the so-called liquor law, contained in § 5391, Comp. Laws. He has brought the case here by appeal.

The record on the part of the people discloses that respondent is not a saloon keeper or druggist, but is a laboring man. At the solicitation of his wife he obtained three bottles of beer, and brought them home. The money to buy the beer was furnished by the respondent's father, William Bird. After the beer was brought to the dwelling house of respondent, the respondent, his wife, his father, and one Mattie White, who was about sixteen years old, sat about a table. Mrs. Bird poured the beer out into glasses. After she had done so, respondent handed a glass of it to Miss White, who drank it. Afterwards another glass of the beer was handed to her by respondent, part of which she drank. It is also claimed Mrs. Bird, in the presence of her husband, mixed some alcohol with water, and gave it to Miss White. The question involved is whether this was a violation of the law. It is the claim of the people that it is not lawful for any person except a druggist to give to any minor beer, wine, or spirituous liquor. It is the claim of the respondent that the law relates to a business, and does not preclude one in exercising the hospitality of his home from giving to one of his guests beer, wine, or spirituous liquors, even though the guest is under the age of twenty-one years. It is stated by the prosecuting attorney that the question involved has never been passed upon by this court. The title to the act relating to the question involved reads: "An Act to Provide for the Taxation and Regulation of the Business of Manufacturing, Selling, Keeping for Sale, Furnishing, Giving, or Delivering, Spirituous and Intoxicating Liquors, and Malt, Brewed, or Fermented Liquors and Vinous Liquors in This State, and to Repeal All Acts or Parts of Acts Inconsistent with the Provisions of This Act." Section 5391, Comp. Laws, so far as it is material to this action, reads: "It shall not be lawful for any person, except a druggist, who shall be governed by § 2 of this act, to sell, furnish, or give any spirituous, malt, brewed, fermented, or vinous liquors, or any beverage, liquor, or liquids containing any spirituous, malt, brewed, fermented, or vinous liquors, to any minor, to any intoxicated person. . . . The fact of selling, giving, or furnishing any liquid in any place where intoxicating liquors are sold or kept for sale, to any minor, or to any intoxicated person, . . . shall be prima facie evidence of an intent on the part of the person so selling, giving, or furnishing such liquid, to violate the law." Many of the cases cited on the part of the people, like State v. Best, 108 N. C. 747, 12 S. E. 907, are cases where the liquor was furnished to the minors by a saloon keeper. Others are where the minor furnished the money to pay for the liquor, and do not afford much light upon the question involved here. In one of the cases cited—Johnson v. People, 83 Ill. 431—it is said: "It is not necessary to now determine whether a person would incur the penalty of this section by giving it as an act of hospitality at his house, as that question is not before the court." In Altenburg v. Com. 126 Pa. 602, 4 L. R. A. 543, 17 Atl. 799, it is said: "The general provisions of the act of 1887 [Laws 1887, p. 108, No. 53] relate to and are designed to regulate the sale of liquors by the various classes of vendors known to the law. They are not directed against the use of such liquors by the individual citizen, and they do not interfere with his right to supply his table with them, or furnish them to his family or his guests." In the case of Com. v. Davis, 12 Bush, 240, cited by counsel, the respondent and one Rison, a minor, contributed money to purchase whisky. The respondent procured the whisky, and gave part of it to Rison, who drank it. It was held this was a violation of the statute; the court saying of the statute: "The object was to make it unlawful for any person other than the father or guardian of a minor to place such liquor in his hands," etc. It will be seen this case does not meet the one under consideration. In Black on Intoxicating Liquors, § 407, it is said: "The provisions of the liquor laws being aimed at the suppression of an illicit or injurious traffic in intoxicants, it is considered that a person is not liable to indictment for furnishing liquor to a friend or guest at his private residence as an act of kindness or hospitality," citing several cases. If the contention of the people is true, while a father might furnish at his own table for his wife and all his children who had attained the age of twenty-one years wine to drink, if he gave it to a son or daughter under twenty-one years of age he would be liable to the penalties of the law. And if one of his guests was under twenty-one years of age he would also be liable. The title of the act and all its provisions should be read together. When this is done we cannot persuade ourselves that such a case as was made against the respondent brings him within its provisions.

The conviction is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

I. Scope.

This note is confined to cases in which several injuries are inflicted, and death results, when the persons inflicting the injuries acted independently in every sense of the word, including neither conspirators, principals, and accessories, nor aiders and abettors, though acting without previous concert. The only cases considered are those in which each acted entirely in his own behalf, and upon his own motives, without regard to the acts or motives of the other.

II. Responsibility when joint.

If two or more persons conceive the intention at the same time of striking another, without previous concert, and defendant strikes him without knowing the intention of the others, and death results, each is responsible for his own acts, but not for those of the others. Wilson v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 24 S. W. 409.

Two persons, both of whom inflicted a wound upon another at different times, cannot both be guilty of murdering him, if they had no connection with each other, and both wounds were not a statement as he may deem appropriate is by law given to a prisoner on trial, and, unless he consents thereto, he cannot be compelled to answer questions on cross-examination.

2. The manner of conducting a trial of one charged with a criminal offense is largely within the discretion of the judge presiding, and when, after the evidence of both sides has been closed, the trial judge suspends the progress of the trial for a limited time, for the purpose of procuring the attendance of an important witness, such discretion is not abused.
3. No evidence appears in the record which authorized a charge in relation to threats.
4. The evidence was sufficient to authorize the judge to instruct the jury as to the law of conspiracy.
5. When it appeared on a trial for actually operating to produce death when it occurred. People v. Lewis, 124 Cal. 551, 45 L. R. A. 783, 57 Pac. 470.

And one who struck another upon the head with a rock at the same time that a third person stabbed the person struck, after which death occurred, cannot be held responsible therefor, where he shows that the wound inflicted by him did not materially contribute to the death. Wilson v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 24 S. W. 409.

Death must have ensued as the result of the act of the person sought to be charged. WALKER v. STATE.

But, although a man cannot be killed twice, two persons, acting independently, may contribute to his death, so that each will be guilty of a homicide. People v. Lewis, 124 Cal. 551, 45 L. R. A. 783, 57 Pac. 470.

And a person may be criminally responsible for homicide when death resulted from the joint negligence of himself and another. Queen v. Ledger, 2 Fost. & F. 857, dictum.

It is no defense in a case of manslaughter that the death of the deceased was caused by the negligence of others as well as that of the accused. If caused partly by the negligence of the accused, and partly by the negligence of others, both the accused and the others are guilty of manslaughter. Queen v. Ledger, 2 Fost. & F. 857; Reg. v. Haines, 2 Car. & K. 368.

So in Fisher v. State, 10 Lea, 151, it was held that an instruction, in a prosecution against two persons for homicide, that, if the death of the deceased was caused by the joint effect of the blows inflicted by each of them, both would be guilty regardless of whether they were acting in concert, or in pursuance of a previous conspiracy, is not error as against the one who struck the last blow.

And in Jordan v. State, 82 Ala. 1, 2 So. 460, murder that the deceased was shot and wounded by the defendant, using a shotgun, and another person, using a pistol; that one of the wounds inflicted by the pistol was certainly mortal, and probably one or more of the wounds inflicted by the shotgun were so,—a charge to the effect that, if the jury should believe that no conspiracy existed between the parties doing the shooting, yet, if they should believe that the defendant inflicted on the deceased a wound that would have produced death, they were authorized to convict the defendant, provided the other elements of murder existed when he shot, was error. To sustain a conviction of murder in such a case, the evidence must be such as to authorize the jury to find that death ensued as the result of the act of the defendant on trial.

It was held that, where one of two persons stabs a third person as the third is advancing to attack the other, and immediately after the other shoots and kills the third person, each is equally guilty of the homicide, without reference to whether or not a common purpose was previously formed. But the ruling seems to have been made upon the ground that they were aiding and abetting each other.

III. Individual responsibility.

a. The general rule.

The general rule is that, where two different persons inflicted wounds upon another at different times, and death afterwards resulted, if the second wound aggravated the first, and the first wound, thus aggravated, produced death, the one who inflicted it is the murderer; but, if the last wound produced death, and the first, though it supplied the occasion for the second, did not contribute to the death, the person who inflicted the second is guilty. People v. Lewis, 124 Cal. 551, 45 L. R. A. 783, 57 Pac. 470.

b. For act nearest to time of death.

Though an assault or an injury inflicted, followed by death, was subsequent and nearer in point of time to death than other injuries received from other sources, the assailant or person inflicting such injury is not guilty of homicide, unless such assault or injury actually contributed to death.

Thus, one who fires a shot necessarily fatal, in self-defense, is not guilty of homicide because he afterwards fires another shot, which also would be fatal, after the other party has abandoned the conflict, where the last shot does not contribute to or hasten death, though he might be found guilty of an assault. Rogers v. State, 60 Ark. 76, 31 L. R. A. 465, 46 Am. St. Rep. 154, 29 S. W. 894.

And if a woman was given poison in one state for the purpose either of killing her or producing an abortion, and was then taken into another state, where another person cut off her head for the purpose of destroying the chances of identification, a verdict of conviction against the person cutting off the head is not authorized in a prosecution for the homicide, unless she was at that time in fact alive. Jackson v. Com. 100 Ky. 239, 66 Am. St. Rep. 336, 38 S. W. 422, 1091.

ERROR to the Superior Court for Sumter County to review a judgment convicting defendant of murder. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Blalock & Cobb for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. J. A. Ansley, Jr., F. A. Hooper, and Boykin Wright, Attorney General, for the State.

Little, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Walker and Jones were jointly indicted for the murder of Holton. Walker was separately placed on trial, and convicted. He submitted a motion for a new trial, which being overruled, he excepted. We reverse the guilt of the murder, however, by the fact that the person killed had previously been mortally wounded by another. People v. Ah Fat, 48 Cal. 61; Tidwell v. State, 70 Ala. 35; State v. Matthews, 38 La. Ann. 795; State v. Scates, 50 N. C. (5 Jones, L.) 420.

Though a person is already mortally wounded by the act of one, if another inflicts an injury upon him which hastens the termination of his life, it is a sufficient killing by the latter to warrant a conviction for homicide. State v. Matthews, 38 La. Ann. 795; Fisher v. State, 10 Lea. 151.

And this is the rule though he would not have died from the subsequent injury had not the previous one operated with it. State v. Matthews, 38 La. Ann. 795.

And this is so though the fact that death was accelerated grew out of the condition the deceased was in when he received the second injury. Fisher v. State, 10 Lea, 151.

And the rule that where a person is mortally wounded by one, and afterwards another injures him, which latter injury hastens the termination of his life, it is homicide on the part of the latter, is not limited to cases of conspiracy and concurrent injuries inflicted by several persons, but applies to other contributing causes of death of whatever nature. State v. Matthews, 38 La. Ann. 795.

Thus, where one person knocks another down, and a third person kicks the latter, from which kick death results, the one who does the kicking is responsible for the homicide. People v. Elder, 100 Mich. 515, 59 N. W. 237.

And where one person stabs another, and a third person strikes him upon the head with a rock, the latter is responsible for his death if the blow with the rock contributes materially thereto. Wilson v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 24 S. W. 409.

And where one person shot another, and a second person afterwards struck the injured person blows with a gun, though the second may not have participated in the shooting, and though the wound inflicted by the shooting would not cause death, yet, if the death was hastened by the blows with the gun, the person giving them is guilty of murder, or other criminal homicide according to the circumstances of the case, since his act accelerated the termination of life, and in such case it is not permitted to the offender to apportion his wrong. Tidwell v. State, 70 Ala. 33.

the judgment of the court below overruling the motion for a new trial on the ground that the evidence, as it appears in the record, does not show beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused was guilty of the offense as charged, and because of certain rulings made by the trial judge, which will be hereafter considered. It is not, we think, necessary to set out the evidence upon which the state relies to support the conviction. It may not be amiss, however, to remark that the brief sets out the evidence in such a confused and disconnected manner as to make it a work of great difficulty to determine what has or has not been proved. If any attempt was made to put the evidence in narrative form, we must say that it was not very successful. It will be sufficient,

So, if poison was given to a woman in one state for the purpose either of killing her or of producing an abortion, and she was taken into another state, and her head was there cut off by another person, the latter is criminally responsible if she was then alive, whether he intended to kill her, or merely did it for the purpose of destroying the chances of identification, supposing her to be already dead. Jackson v. Com. 100 Ky. 239, 66 Am. St. Rep. 336, 38 S. W. 422, 1091.

And in such case if the drugs were given to the woman merely for the purpose of producing abortion, and her head was cut off under the supposition that she was dead, for the purpose of destroying the chances of identification, the person cutting it off is guilty of murder if she was alive at the time of the cutting, where the drugs given her were dangerous to her life; and he is guilty of voluntary manslaughter if the drugs administered were not dangerous. Ibid.

So, in Yorke v. Com. 17 Ky. L. Rep. 1243, 34 S. W. 228, one who stabbed another, who had previously been knocked down with an oar by another person, after which the person stabbed died, was convicted of manslaughter; but the question in the case is not as to which injury caused death, or as to which person was the murderer, but whether the accused acted in self-defense.

In Stockdale's Case, 2 Lewin, C. C. 220, however, which was a prosecution for homicide, it appeared that the deceased, a child, was found in a field, alive, with a contusion on its head, and that it died a few hours after; and the court was of the opinion, that, if death was accelerated only by the exposure, charging it as the cause of death was not supported; but the case seems to have been disposed of on the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to warrant a conviction.

c. For first or prior act.

1. Generally.

If a wound is feloniously inflicted with a deadly weapon in such a manner as to put life in jeopardy, and death ensues as a consequence of that act, the fact that another injury was afterwards inflicted by another person does not palliate or excuse the first felonious act. Com. v. Costley, 118 Mass. 1; State v. Hambright, 111 N. C. 707, 16 S. E. 411. 67 L. R. A.

however, in reference to the evidence, to say that enough may be gathered from the brief to show that the jury were authorized to find that the plaintiff in error shot the deceased, without excuse, with a gun. It does not at all show that he shot him with a pistol, nor does it satisfactorily appear that the deceased died from the effects of the wounds inflicted by the accused.

1. The first and second grounds of the amended motion will be considered together. It appears that during the trial, and while the accused was making his statement to the jury, his counsel, addressing the court, said that he would like to direct the mind of the accused to a particular fact, and let him explain it. In response to this request, the court informed counsel that the

But a man cannot be convicted of murder where his act does not cause the death; and, though he inflicts a mortal wound, if the act of another intervenes, and death follows from that act, the person inflicting the first injury is not, in law, a murderer. State v. Wood, 53 Vt. 560; Tidwell v. State, 70 Ala. 33; State v. Scates, 50 N. C. (5 Jones, L.) 420; WALKER v. STATE.

And to constitute manslaughter the accused must have killed someone; and if, though the person killed was mortally wounded by the accused, he actually died from a wound inflicted by another, or by himself, the accused can at most only be guilty of a felonious attempt to kill. People v. Lewis, 124 Cal. 551, 45 L. R. A. 783, 57 Pac. 470.

Where one man inflicted a mortal wound, and afterwards a second killed the wounded person by an independent act, to say that the first killed him would involve the absurdity of saying that the deceased was killed twice. State v. Scates, 50 N. C. (5 Jones, L.) 420.

And a statute providing that a person put on trial for murder may be acquitted of that and found guilty of manslaughter does not apply to a case in which one person inflicted a mortal wound, and, before death ensued, another killed the same person by an independent act, without concert with, or procurement of, the first. State v. Wood, 53 Vt. 560.

Thus, a person giving another a pistol wound, though sufficient to cause death, cannot be held for homicide upon the death of the person shot, where, while alive, another injury was inflicted, which, independent of the pistol wound, caused death, so that death resulted from that, and not from the pistol wound. Com. v. Costley, 118 Mass. 1.

And one who cut another with a knife, after which the latter was killed by a third person, is not guilty of murder, where there was no preconcert and no malicious intent on his part, and the cutting with the knife did not produce death, or materially contribute thereto. Jordan v. State, 79 Ala. 9.

So, the fact that one person knocked another down while the latter was retreating from an assault by a third person, there being no agreement or preconcert between them, does not render the former guilty of homicide, where the knocking down did not produce death, but the person struck was afterwards killed by another. Frank v. State, 27 Ala. 37.

And where a man struck his wife upon the latter could ask questions of the accused under the rule, if he desired. Counsel then replied that he did not desire to do so, but wished to direct the attention of the accused to a certain matter, and let him explain that. The trial judge then directed the prisoner not to answer that question (suggested by counsel), and stated that if he did he would subject himself to cross-examination. Counsel then, addressing the prisoner, remarked, if there was anything else that he desired to state, to do so; if not, to come down. The prisoner then referred to the subject previously suggested by counsel to the court, and explained the matter to which his attention had been thus directed. The solicitor general then insisted that reference to that subject subjected the prisoner to cross-examination, and the court so ruled. His counsel objected to a cross-examination, which objection was overruled, because the prisoner had answered the question suggested by his counsel. The court then permitted the prisoner to be cross-examined by the solicitor general. The bill of exceptions assigns as error the refusal of the court to allow defendant's counsel to direct the mind of the prisoner to the subject about which he had neglected to make a statement, and also to the ruling of the court which allowed the prisoner to be cross-examined. It was said by Judge Bleckley, in delivering the opinion in Brown v. State, 58 Ga. 212: "In making his own statement to the court and jury, the prisoner is not under examination, and his counhead with a club, and fractured her skull, and she afterwards took arsenic and died, if her death resulted from arsenical poisoning, and not from the effects of the blow inflicted by her husband, he is not guilty of her murder. Lewis v. Com. 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1139, 42 S. W. 1127.

And where several wounds were inflicted upon a person by different persons, and those which were alone mortal were inflicted in necessary and proper self-defense, the person inflicting them should not be convicted of murder. Miller v. State, 37 Ind. 432.

So, to render a person guilty of manslaughter where a death was the result of the joint negligence of himself and another, the death must have been the direct result, wholly or in part, of his negligence, and his neglect must have been wholly or in part the proximate and efficient cause of the death; and it is not so when the negligence of some other person intervened between his act, or omission, and the fatal result. Queen v. Ledger, 2 Fost. & F. 857.

Thus, a person having charge of a steam engine, who, negligently, and in violation of duty, stopped it and went away, after which another person came and wrongfully set it in motion, whereby a person was killed, is not guilty of manslaughter, since it was not he whose negligent act was the one directly causing the death. Hilton's Case, 2 Lewin, C. C. 214.

So, a station master, who negligently and in violation of rules, sent one train after another into a tunnel at a shorter interval of time than that prescribed, whose act led to a confusion of signals upon the part of a person at work at the tunnel, from which a collision resulted and persons were killed, cannot be held guilty of manslaughter, since the confusion of signals, and not his act, was the direct cause of the collision. Queen v. Ledger, 2 Fost. & F. 857.

2. When act contributes to death.

Where two wounds were inflicted by different persons at different times, and death afterward resulted, the test as to the guilt of the person inflicting the first wound is whether, when death occurred, the first wound contributed to the event: if it did, although other independent causes also contributed, the causal relation between the unlawful acts of the accused and the death is made out. If the life current went out from both wounds, so that at the very instant of death the first wound was contributing 67 L. R. A.

to the event, the one who inflicted it is criminally responsible. People v. Lewis, 124 Cal. 551, 45 L. R. A. 783, 57 Pac. 470; State v. Ham-bright, 111 N. C. 707, 16 S. E. 411.

And where a pistol wound was given by one person to another, and afterwards another injury was inflicted by another person, and death occurred, if the effect of the subsequent injury was merely to prevent any recovery that might otherwise have taken place, or to aggravate or hasten the effect of the pistol wound, that wound might still be considered the cause of death, and indictable and punishable as such. Com. v. Costley, 118 Mass. 1.

So, where a person shoots another, causing a painful wound, and the person shot stabs himself with a knife and afterwards dies, if he dies from the effect of the knife wound alone, the person who shoots him is responsible if it is made to appear that the knife wound is caused by the wound inflicted by the shot in the natural course of events. People v. Lewis, 124 Cal. 551, 45 L. R. A. 783, 57 Pac. 470.

But where one person inflicts a wound upon another, which does not cause death, the person inflicting the wound is not guilty of homicide, though the wound is mortal, where the wounded condition merely affords an opportunity for another unconnected person to kill the person wounded. Ibid.

And the mere fact that one person assaulted another and felled him to the floor, putting his body in such a position that he was helpless to protect himself from a third person, who then assaulted him, and rendered it a possibility for his assailant to kick him, does not render the first assailant responsible for the homicide, where death resulted from the kick. People v. Elder, 100 Mich. 515, 59 N. W. 237.

So, in Kelley v. State, 53 Ind. 311, it was held that it is not indispensable to a conviction for homicide that the wounds inflicted were necessarily fatal and were the direct cause of death, but that, if they caused the death indirectly through a chain of natural effects and causes unchanged by human action, it is suffi-sel has no right to ask him questions. Doubtless the court might, at the prisoner's request, permit questions to be put to him, as matter of discretion." See also, to the same effect, Echols v. State, 109 Ga. 508, 34 S. E. 1038. The ruling in the Brown Case, 58 Ga. 212, was made because of the fact that while Brown was making his statement his counsel proposed to examine him; and the judge not only refused to allow this to be done, but also declined to hear from counsel as to the question which it was desired to ask the prisoner; and we entirely agree in the view expressed by Judge Bleckley, that counsel had no right to ask the accused questions in relation either to matters stated or to any not stated. The privilege which the law gives a prisoner to make a statement is a much-abused one. This right was granted in the interest of truth and justice, but it extends no further than to permit the prisoner himself to make to the court and jury just such a statement as he deems proper in his defense. The statement which the law recognizes is not evidence, and should consist only of just such things in relation to his case as the prisoner himself wishes to say. The statement to be made, and as made, must be that of the prisoner. In the case of Robinson v. State, 82 Ga. 535, 9 S. E. 528, it appeared that on the trial, after the conclusion of the statement made by the accused, the trial judge asked of the prisoner whether he meant to deny the testimony of the witnesses. This court ruled that such interrogation was improper, and, referring to the matter in the opinion which he delivered in that case, Chief Justice Bleckley said: "It certainly was irregular to interrogate Henry Goldsmith, after he had concluded his statement, by asking him whether he meant to deny the testimony of the witnesses; but the court explains that this was done for the purpose of calling attention to an omission in the statement, and with a purpose altogether friendly. The motive was a kind one. Nevertheless the act was not well advised, and we cannot approve it." We have, then, two propositions expressly ruled by this court: First, that his counsel has no right to ask questions of the prisoner while he is making his statement, in relation to the same; second, that the trial judge himself cannot do so. While counsel, as thus shown, has no right to ask the accused questions, nor to make suggestions to him, in relation to the matter; but the question was as to the sufficiency of the evidence to prove that death resulted from wounds inflicted by the accused, and not from intemperance.

And in Wooten v. State, 99 Tenn. 189, 41 S. W. 813, it was held that the accused, who knocked a man down so that his head struck the pavement, the man afterwards dying from a clot of blood on the brain, would be guilty of some of the degrees of felonious homicide, though the deceased might have died from other causes, or would not have died from this one had no other cause operated with it, either mediately or immediately, or hastened his death: the theory of the defense being that, after the blow, deceased, while drunk, was thrown from the patrol wagon so recklessly that his head struck the wheel and the station-house floor, producing the clot of blood.

IV. Proof.

One who wounds or injures a person, who subsequently dies, has the burden of proving, on a prosecution for the killing, a claim that death resulted from other injuries, and not from those inflicted by him.

Thus, where a wound which might have been fatal was inflicted by one person upon another with a murderous intent, and it is claimed that the surgeon attending him was guilty of malpractice and culpable negligence, the burden of proof rests with the person who inflicted the wound to show, in order to relieve himself from responsibility for the killing, that death resulted from such malpractice or culpable neglect. State v. Briscoe, 30 La. Ann. 433.

So, in Edwards v. State, 39 Fla. 753, 23 So. 537, it was held that when a wound from which death might ensue was inflicted with murderous intent, and was followed by death, the burden of proof is upon the party inflicting it to make it appear to the satisfaction of the jury that death did not result from such wound, but from some other cause; but the question was not as to wounds inflicted by different persons, but as to the sufficiency of proof of cause of death.

But the usual rule of acquittal in case of reasonable doubt of guilt applies.

Thus, where several wounds were inflicted upon a person by different persons, and it is uncertain which was the mortal wound, or whether all were mortal, a person who inflicted one of them should not be convicted of murder for inflicting it. Miller v. State, 37 Ind. 432.

And where two persons strike another, there being nothing to indicate a conspiracy between them, and death results, if the jury have a reasonable doubt as to which struck the blow causing death, it should acquit them both. State v. Goode, 139 N. C. 982, 43 S. E. 502; State v. Finley, 118 N. C. 1161, 24 S. E. 495.

So, where a man struck his wife with a club, fracturing her skull, and she afterwards took arsenic and died, if the jury, in a prosecution for the homicide, have a reasonable doubt, growing out of the evidence, as to whether she came to her death by the blow or from arsenical poisoning, they should acquit him. Lewis v. Com. 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1139, 42 S. W. 1127.

In Smith v. State, 50 Ark. 545, 8 S. W. 941, however, it was held that, where a person charged with murder is shown to have inflicted a malicious wound, and the proof tends to show that death ensued from it, and he seeks to evade the consequences by showing that his act was not the cause of death, the evidence should be very plain to warrant the jury in agreeing with him, but, if there is any evidence to sustain his theory, it must be submitted to the jury under proper instructions; but the claim was not ter of his statement, this court, in the later case (Echols v. State, 109 Ga. 508, 34 S. E. 1038), ruled that it was in the discretion of the judge to allow either to be done. In the present case the judge, in the exercise of his discretion, refused to allow the desired suggestion to be made. In doing so he did not abuse his discretion. In overruling the motion for a new trial, his honor who presided in the court below placed his ruling by which he allowed cross-examination on the idea that the prisoner had been instructed by the court that, if he answered the question or suggestion made by counsel, it would subject him to cross-examination, and that, as the prisoner did answer the question or suggestion, he was thus lawfully subjected to a cross-examination. We cannot agree in this view. We know of no rule of law or practice which sanctions it. The statute expressly declares that the prisoner shall not be compelled to answer questions on cross-examination, should he think proper to decline to answer them. Furthermore, so long as the prisoner confines his statement to matters connected with his defense, he has the right to refer to any particular phase of it, and this he may do without let or hindrance. While counsel has no right to make suggestions to him, or to put any question to him, if he do so, even while out of order, the prisoner may lawfully incorporate in his statement any matter which involves the subject of the suggestion or question, without placing himself at any disadvantage, because his right to make such a statement as he may deem proper is unqualified. It does not appear in this case that the prisoner consented to be cross-examined. His counsel objected to it, and when the court ruled that by answering the suggestion or question of his counsel the prisoner had subjected himself to cross-examination, under which ruling the prisoner was cross-examined, he committed an error which required the grant of a new trial.

2. It is insisted that the trial judge erred, after both the state and the defendant had closed, in allowing the case to be suspended, on the application of the solicitor general, for the purpose of sending for a witness; the defendant at the time objecting to such suspension. To this ground of the motion the presiding judge attaches an explanatory note to, the effect that on satisfactory proof submitted to the court of the existence of the witness, the importance of his testimony, and that the solicitor general had just heard of the same, he suspended the trial from 11:45 A. M. to 3:10 that the person was killed by someone else, but that he died from pneumonia, or congestion of the lungs.

So, in accordance with other similar matters, the questions whether death resulted from the act of the accused, and whether the act of the accused contributed to death, or shortened life, are ones of fact for the jury under proper instructions.

This is the rule of WALKER v. STATE.

And where there were two wounds upon the head of a deceased person, one apparently inflicted in one way, and the other in another, an instruction to the jury, in a prosecution for the killing of such person, that either of the wounds was produced in a particular way, is erroneous as an instruction by the court upon the evidence. Weeks v. State, 79 Ga. 36, 3 S. E. 323.

And where the evidence in a prosecution for homicide establishes with certainty a wound on the front of the head of the deceased, inflicted by striking with a bottle, and there was also a wound upon the back of the head, claimed by the defense to have resulted from another cause, the accused is not entitled to an instruction for acquittal if death resulted from the wound on the back of the head, and did not result from that on the front of the head, since it is not the province of the court to locate the position of either wound; it is sufficient to charge that, if death did not result from the wound inflicted by the accused, but from other causes, the accused cannot be convicted. Ibid.

V. Summary.

Several people, acting independently, are responsible for their own acts only, and, where each does an act calculated to cause the death of a person, neither can be held criminally responsible for the resulting death, unless his act actually contributes to the event; nor can all be held jointly responsible, unless the act of each contributes thereto. All may be held, however, where at the very point of death the act of each is a contributing cause, so that the death is the joint result of each.

The rule is that a person cannot be twice killed, and that, therefore, the result can only be charged to the person whose act actually causes it. This rule applies to the act nearest in point of time to the death where death resulted therefrom, though the person injured had been previously mortally injured, and though the later act merely served to accelerate death, and though death would not have occurred but for the previous act or acts. The rule is different, however, if such act did not cause or contribute to death; and the person inflicting the first or prior injury is not guilty of murder, but of assault with intent to kill only, where his act did not result in the complete termination of life, however little may have been left to be acted upon by subsequent acts or events.

The subsequent infliction of an injury by another, however, furnishes no excuse to the prior wrongdoer when death actually ensued as a consequence of his act. If it did he is responsible though other independent causes also contributed; though this rule does not apply where his acts merely afforded an opportunity for the subsequent act.

The burden rests with a person charged with an act which might cause death to show that it resulted from some other cause. But the usual rules as to reasonable doubt of guilt apply, the question as to what act or acts caused or contributed to death being one of fact for the jury.
F. H. B.

P. M. in order to secure the presence of the witness. We find no error in this. The manner of conducting a trial is largely in the discretion of the judge presiding, and that discretion was not abused by a suspension of the trial for the limited time named for the purpose of procuring the evidence of an important witness. On the contrary, such a suspension seems to have been in the furtherance of justice.

3. An examination of the evidence fails to disclose that any witness testified as to threats made on the part of the accused against the deceased, and for that reason it was error on the part of the trial judge to charge the jury in relation to threats.

4. Complaint is made that the court erred in charging the jury in relation to the law of conspiracy. The accused, with one Jones, was jointly indicted, and the charge objected to appears to be a full and accurate presentation of the law in relation to the liability of one of two conspirators for the acts of the other. There can be no objection to the matter of the charge; and, on a review of the evidence, we find there was evidence which tended to some extent, at least, to show that the accused and Jones had entered into a conspiracy to kill deceased.

5. It is claimed that the court erred in instructing the jury as follows: "After going through the evidence, if you should have a reasonable doubt on your mind that any conspiracy existed between these parties, Pomp Walker and Eli Jones, to take the life of this deceased, Tom Holton, yet if you should believe from the evidence that wounds were inflicted upon the deceased by Eli Jones, and that the defendant in this case inflicted a mortal wound on Tom Holton,—a wound that would have produced death,—then you would be authorized to return a verdict finding the defendant guilty of murder, provided you believe that all the other elements of murder existed about which I have charged you." When fairly construed, we think this portion of the charge might be understood to have this meaning: That, if both Jones and the accused inflicted wounds on the person of the deceased, and the wounds inflicted by the accused would have resulted in death, then the accused could be lawfully convicted, although, as a matter of fact, the wound inflicted by Jones may have been the immediate cause of the death. So construed, this charge was error. The state charged that Walker was guilty of murder in killing Holton. It was therefore incumbent upon the state, before a conviction for any grade of homicide could have been had, to prove, not only that the deceased was killed, but that he died from the effects of a wound inflicted by the accused. Mr. Kerr, in his treatise on the Law of Homicide (§ 31), on authority, lays down the following propositions: "Where the defendant inflicts a fatal blow, he cannot escape liability for his wrongful act from the fact that other blows were subsequently inflicted by other persons which hastened the death. But if one inflicts a mortal wound, and, before death ensues, another kills the same person by an independent act, without concert or procurement of the one who caused his first wound, the first person cannot be convicted of murder." etc. Mr. Wharton, in vol. 1 of his Criminal Law, § 153, says: "When, after a wound, a new and independent causation intervenes, producing death, this relieves parties to whom such new causation is not imputable." And again, in the same volume (§ 309a): "The death must be traced to the blow charged to the defendant." It has been ruled that "if a person receives a wound wilfully inflicted by another, which might cause death, and death actually follows, the burden is on him who inflicted it to show that it did not cause the death." Hughes, Crim. Law & Proc. § 87. The converse of this proposition must be true; that is, if the person inflicting such wound in fact shows that it did not cause the death,—as, for instance, by showing that death actually occurred in consequence of a wound inflicted by another,—he meets this burden, and cannot be convicted. It is, however, unnecessary to cite authorities to support this proposition. Of course, in the case of a proved conspiracy, one may be found guilty, while another inflicted the wound which caused death. But in an individual case, one cannot be lawfully convicted of murder when it is shown that the deceased really died from another and a distinct wound, inflicted by a different person. We, of course, are not to be understood as saying that the evidence in this case shows that the deceased did not die from the wound inflicted by the accused. That is a question for legitimate determination by a jury. We are intending only to meet the proposition involved in the instruction to the jury under consideration. That instruction contains the proposition that, if the accused inflicted on the person of the deceased a wound that would have produced death, the jury would be authorized to return a verdict of guilty, if the other elements of murder existed. The charge was error. The jury could not have lawfully convicted the accused of murder, if he was acting independently when he inflicted the wound, unless they could find from the evidence that the wound inflicted was the cause of death.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

May C. RUSSELL et al.

v.

ERIE RAILROAD COMPANY, Plff. in Err.

(70 N. J. L. 808.)

- *1. It is lawful for a carrier to limit, by special contract, his common-law liability, and he may thereby exempt himself from liability for any loss resulting otherwise than by the negligence or misfeasance of himself or his servants.
2. Where the owner of goods held in storage directed the storage company to send them to him by railroad, and an officer of the storage company sent the box containing the goods by a cartman to the railroad station, accompanied by a complete shipping order, the agent of the railroad company had no right to assume that the cartman had the authority to alter or modify the terms of the shipping order.
3. The presentation of the shipping order, signed by the storage company, was notice to the railroad company that the authority of the cartman was in no sense discretionary. It consisted only in delivering the goods and paying the freight, and there was no authority on his part to enter into a contract to exempt the railroad company from liability.
4. In order to constitute a ratification, there must be acceptance of the results of the act with an intent to ratify, and with full knowledge of all the material circumstances.

ERROR to the Supreme Court at Circuit in Bergen County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover the value of property lost while in defendant's possession for transportation. Affirmed.

Statement by Vroom, J.:

This action was brought by the plaintiffs to recover the value of a box containing goods owned by Mrs. Russell, which had been consigned from Buffalo, New York, to Rutherford, New Jersey, over the Erie Railroad, and lost in transit. In June, 1902, Mrs.

Russell caused the box in question, containing the goods belonging to her, to be stored with the Goldhagen Storage Company in Buffalo. Mrs. Russell and her husband had packed the articles in the box. It was nailed up, and marked "Last Box Packed." On the 19th of September, 1902, Mrs. Russell wrote to Mr. O. E. Goldhagen, of the Goldhagen Storage Company, saying: "Send a box marked 'Last Box Packed' to M. C. Russell, Rutherford, over Erie Railroad. I would like them sent as soon as possible, and if you will kindly prepay charges I will refund check for same, together with storage rent." No other direction appears to have been given by Mrs. Russell. Mr. Goldhagen testified that on receipt of the letter he "made out the freight bill, marked the tag and nailed it on the box, sent for his cartman, instructed him to pay the freight, and bring him a copy of the freight bill back." He made out a freight bill or shipping order upon one of the printed forms of the Erie Railroad Company, and in the proper place left thereon he wrote, "Buffalo, N. Y. September 23, 1902, Mrs. M. C. Russell, Rutherford, New Jersey, 1 Box;" and he signed the shipping receipt "Goldhagen Storage Company." It appeared that Goldhagen wrote nothing else upon the printed form, and delivered the same to one Weisser, together with the box, and gave him the directions above set forth. He gave the cartman no instructions as to the rate of freight he should pay. Weisser, after receiving the box, with the above instructions, from Goldhagen, turned it over to another cartman in the same employ by the name of Hoffmeister. He said that he was told to pay the freight, and that no instructions of any kind were given to him. Hoffmeister took the box to the Erie Railroad, and there delivered it to the tallyman, who asked what the box contained, and on being told by Hoffmeister that it contained household goods marked the letters "H. H." on the shipping order. Hoffmeister then presented the shipping order to one Fleming, the chief biller of the company, for the purpose of paying the freight. Fleming asked him what the box contained. On the carrier's replying "household goods," he added "gds." after the "H. H." on the shipping order, and then said there were two rates of freight—one a rate of 30 cents valuation, released to $5 a hundred in case of loss or damage; then there was a rate of 58½ cents a hundred valuation, not released. Fleming testified that Hoffmeister said he wanted the cheaper rate, and that he figured it out at 47 cents, marked it on the shipping order and the original bill of lading. Hoffmeister's version was, "I told him to give me the cheaper rate, because, if they wanted to pay the higher rate, they would send it by express." Fleming wrote on the shipping order the words, "Value relsd. to 5.00 per 100," and also wrote it on the bill of lading. He then made out a prepaid order for 47 cents, and sent Hoffmeister to the cashier to pay that amount. On the day following the bill of lading was brought back to Goldhagen. He folded it up, and sent it by mail to Mrs. Russell, without noticing the words, "Value relsd. to 5.00 per 100," written on it with lead pencil. On October 3d, on receipt of the waybill, the agent at Rutherford sent Mrs. Russell notice that her box had arrived. The next morning her husband directed a drayman to call for the box. When he called for it at the freight yard, it was missing. On October 15th Mrs. Russell notified the company of the loss of the box. At the trial counsel agreed that the value of the contents of the box was $300. The case was tried at the Bergen circuit before Mr. Justice Pitney and a jury, and a verdict was rendered for the plaintiff for $363.55.

ceives the paper without expressing any dissent.

Vroom, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It was conceded at the trial that in the course of transit from Buffalo, New York, to Rutherford, in this state, the property of the plaintiffs below was lost, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to a verdict for some amount by reason of that loss. The claim of the railroad company was that the trial judge should have charged the jury to find a verdict for the plaintiffs for $6.47, being the amount of the value of the shipment at the rate of $5 per 100 pounds, plus the amount of freight 47 cents. This request of defendant was declined, and the case was left to the jury on the questions whether Mrs. Russell was charged with the terms of the returned bill of lading and the writing thereon, and whether the carter, Hoffmeister, had apparent authority to agree to a limitation of liability, and whether there was an agreement made to limit liability.

The first count in the declaration attributed negligence to the defendant's employees in the carriage and transportation of these goods, but the trial judge properly held that this was not sustained by the evidence, and charged the jury that they could not find a verdict against the defendant on that ground. That it is lawful for a carrier, by special contract, to limit his common-law liability, is admittedly the general rule in this country, and he may thereby exempt himself from liability for any loss resulting otherwise than by the negligence or misfeasance of himself or his servants. That a common carrier cannot, by contract, secure exemptions from liability for losses occasioned by its negligence was held in Paul v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (Supreme Court, Feb. Term, 1904) 57 Atl. 139. Where there is no express contract limiting the liability of the carrier, he is bound, when goods are delivered to him for transportation, to deliver them, unless prevented by the act of God or other cause which would excuse the carrier from the undertaking of insurance. The question, then, arises whether there was any contract made in this case limiting the liability of the defendant, which is binding on the plaintiff, Mrs. Russell. The burden of proof of showing such a limitation of liability is on the defendant company, and, being in derogation of common right, is to be construed most strongly against the carrier. 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 336; Ashmore v. Pennsylvania Steam Towing & Transp. Co. 28 N. J. L. 180; Hooper v. Wells, F. & Co. 27 Cal. 11, 85 Am. Dec. 211. No presumptions will be indulged in favor of exemptions from common-law liability. While it is competent for a common carrier to provide by contract for such exemptions, it must be done in clear and unambiguous terms. Edsall v. Camden & A. R. & Transp. Co. 50 N. Y. 661; Babcock v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 49 N. Y. 491; Etna Ins. Co. v. Wheeler, 49 N. Y. 616; 6 Enc. Law & Proc. p. 408. It will be conceded that the only contract limiting the liability of the company was made with one Hoffmeister, a cartman employed by the Goldhagen Storage Company, to carry the box containing the goods to the railroad. The instruction to have the goods shipped was from Mrs. Russell, and the directions in her letter to O. E. Goldhagen were simply to send a box marked "Last Box Packed" to M. C. Russell, Rutherford, New Jersey, over the Erie Railroad. Mr. Goldhagen did not go personally with these goods, but delivered them, with the two shipping orders, which he had filled out in his own hand, to a cartman—first to one Weisser, who turned the box and two papers over to another cartman named Hoffmeister. The evidence is explicit that no instructions were given to the carter save "Take the goods," "Pay the freight." He was given the money to pay the freight, and to bring back the bill. It will not be disputed that the doctrine cited by the plaintiff in error is correct, that "a consignor who sends goods to the depot of a carrier for shipment, by an agent, impliedly authorizes such agent to make a special contract with the carrier as to the carriage of the goods, and the acceptance by such agent of a receipt or bill of lading containing limitations upon the liability of the carrier will bind his principal." 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 305. The law was clearly stated by the trial judge in his charge: "The ordinary rule is that a person intrusted with goods to take to a freight office, in order that they may be shipped by the railroad, is presumed to have general authority to agree with the railroad company as to the terms of shipment; and that would include authority to make a reasonable agreement limiting the liability of the railroad company as an insurer, limiting it with respect to the valuation of the goods, as far as the contract goes. So that, if Goldhagen, or the Goldhagen Storage Company, had gone with the goods, or if any person lawfully authorized by the Goldhagen Company had gone with the goods, without any limitation of his authority appearing, in that event it would be presumed that he had a right to make the contract limiting the railroad company's liability." Notwithstanding the fact that there were no other instructions given to the carter, Hoffmeister, then above mentioned, the railroad company contends that the cartman had authority to make, in behalf of the plaintiff, a contract limiting the common-law liability of the defendant company. 6 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 408, as follows, was cited in support of this contention: "One who has authority to ship goods for another has thereby implied authority to make a contract for their shipment, involving a limitation of the carrier's liability. Even though the delivery . . . [of the goods] is by a cartman or teamster, if by the usual course of business between the shipper and the carrier it is customary for the cartman or teamster to accept the shipping contract, valid stipulations therein limiting the carrier's liability will be binding on the shipper." This is a broad statement, and not borne out by the examination of the cases I have made. It will be noted, however, that nothing appeared in the testimony in this case showing the usual course of business between the shipper and the carrier, or that it was customary for the cartman or teamster to accept the shipping contract; but it does appear from the evidence that the cartman here had no express authority to agree to a limitation of liability. An instructive case (Nelson v. Hudson River R. Co. 48 N. Y. 498) from the court of appeals of New York was cited by both the plaintiff and defendant in error; by the former because it seemed to support the authority of the cartman to make a contract limiting liability, by the latter because the enforcement of the liability was not put upon the ground that the cartman had authority to make the contract, but of what the court termed "a most complete and unequivocal ratification of the contract by the consignor." In the opinion in that case Earl, J., said (p. 510): "The cartman was not authorized to make this contract. He was merely the servant of the consignors to deliver this box to the railroad, and was clothed with no discretion to act for them. No authority could be implied from his character and business, and his principals were near at hand, where they could be consulted and they could act for themselves. But he assumed to act for them, and to do what they were authorized to do. They were notified of all the facts, and the contract made by him for them was delivered to them. They were informed, if they had any objection to the contract made by their assumed agent, they should notify the defendant the next day. They made no objection and expressed no dissatisfaction with the contract, leaving the defendant's agent to suppose that it was satisfactory to them. It seems to me that these facts constitute a most emphatic and unequivocal ratification of the contract. A subsequent ratification, with knowledge of the facts, of the acts of the assumed agent, is equivalent to an original authority, and, as this was a contract which the consignors could have deputed the cartman to make for them, it must be treated as if made by them in person, and binding upon the plaintiff." And in Seller v. The Pacific, 1 Or. 409, Fed. Cas. No. 12,644, it was held that where a drayman of the shipper, on the delivery to the carrier of a package, takes a receipt from the freight clerk of the ship containing the words "not accountable for contents," this of itself does not constitute such an agreement. It is a mere ex parte proposition on the part of the carrier after the receipt of the package, and to exonerate the carrier there must be direct or unequivocal evidence of the assent of the shipper. I am clearly of opinion that no authority was disclosed which would warrant the making of any contract by the cartman which would limit the liability of the railroad company as common carriers. When the Goldhagen Storage Company sent this box by the cartman to the railroad station, it was accompanied by a complete shipping order, and upon what principle can it be contended that the agent of the railroad company had the right to assume that the cartman had authority to alter or modify the terms of the shipping order? It seems to me that the duty of the agent plainly was to accept the goods on the terms stated in the order or refuse them, or he could, as actually was done here, take the risk of subsequently showing the authority of the cartman to change the terms of the contract. The railroad company was notified by the presentation of this shipping order, signed by the storage company, that the authority of the cartman was in no sense discretionary; that it was of the simplest kind, and consisted merely of delivering the goods and inquiring and paying the amount of freight; and there was no authority on his part to enter into any contract so important as the exemption of the railroad company from liability. The charge of the trial judge on this point was not erroneous, although too favorable to the defendant.

If, however, the act of Hoffmeister was subsequently ratified by the Goldhagen Storage Company, or Mrs. Russell, it is binding upon Mrs. Russell, although Hoffmeister was not authorized to make this limitation, and although he was not clothed with apparent authority. As was laid down in Nelson v. Hudson River R. Co. 48 N. Y. 498: "A subsequent ratification, with knowledge of the facts, of the acts of the assumed agent, is equivalent to an original authority." The contention of the plaintiff in error was that there was acceptance and ratification by Goldhagen, plaintiff's agent, of the offer of the carrier to reduce the freight rate in consideration of the limitation of liability authorized by Mrs. Russell. 67 L. R. A.

But there was no duty in the Goldhagen Storage Company on the return of the carrier with the bill of lading to see whether the railroad company had accepted the goods on the terms stated in the shipping order. This, I think, was to be assumed in the absence of notice to the contrary. In the case of Nelson v. Hudson River R. Co. 48 N. Y. 498, notice was given to the consignors of the contract made for them by the cartman, and they were given until the next day to object to it. The intention of a carrier to limit his liability as insurer must be brought home to the shipper by a clear and unambiguous notice, and, as stated by the Supreme Court of the United States, "the right of the carrier thus to limit his liability in the shipment of goods, has, we think, never been doubted. But admitting the right thus to restrict his obligation, it by no means follows that he can do so by any act of his own. He is in the exercise of a sort of public office, and has public duties to perform from which he should not be permitted to exonerate himself without the assent of the parties concerned. And this is not to be implied or inferred from a general notice to the public, limiting his obligation which may or may not be assented to." New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. 382, 12 L. ed. 465. A ratification is defined to be the confirmation of a previous act done either by the party himself or by another. It is the confirmation of a voidable act. 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 889. And a confirmation necessarily supposes a knowledge of the thing ratified. Blen v. Bear River & A. Water & Min. Co. 20 Cal. 613, 81 Am. Dec. 132; San Diego, A. T. & P. B. R. Co. v. Pacific Beach Co. 112 Cal. 53, 33 L. R. A. 788, 44 Pac. 333. It follows, then, that, in order to constitute a ratification, there must be an acceptance of the results of the act with an intent to ratify and with full knowledge of all the material circumstances. Ansonia v. Cooper, 64 Conn. 544, 30 Atl. 760.

The insistent of the railroad company is that, even if the cartman had no lawful authority to make the agreement limiting the company's liability, yet the receipt of the bill of lading as changed by Goldhagen, without objection, was an acceptance of the company's proposition, and likewise the receipt of the bill of lading by Mrs. Russell, without objection, was an acceptance by her of the contract therein expressed. In other words, both ratified the illegal contract made by the cartman. But, if ratification necessarily supposes a knowledge of the thing ratified, and Mr. Goldhagen testified that he noticed no alteration in the bill of lading when he sent it to Mrs. Russell on its return to him by the cartman, and as no notice was given to him of the alteration there could have been no ratification on his part. And Mrs. Russell certainly could not have been held to ratify it, in the absence of any notice, and when she received the bill of lading not earlier than three days after the goods were shipped, and too late to recall the box.

This question of ratification the trial judge left to the jury, and the following parts of the charge relate thereto: "Now, did Mr. Goldhagen see that [referring to the alterations by the company's agent in the bill of lading] and notice it? He testifies not. I don't know anything on which you have a right to believe that he did see it, and notice it as an alteration of the contract, and therefore the question is, Was he negligent in not noticing it? Would a reasonably careful man, in his situation, have noticed it; noticed it, I mean, not as a mere scratch or word written upon the paper, but as an intended alteration of the contract that he had proposed to the company? That is the point. If Mr. Goldhagen did not notice it, then comes the question of what Mrs. Russell noticed. It was mailed—the paper was mailed, this bill of lading—by Goldhagen to Mrs. Russell, and reached her presumably a day or two after the 24th day of September, two or three days after the shipment, as I understand the evidence. Well, the question of what he, as a reasonably prudent person, ought to do, is quite different, because, you see, she was not where she could easily communicate with the railroad, and not as well charged with the circumstances of the shipment as Mr. Goldhagen; but at any rate it is for you to say whether, if she had been reasonably prudent, she would or would not have been charged with this notice." Clearly, so far as the plaintiff in error is concerned, there was no error in this part of the charge. The only criticism to be made, if any, is that it is too favorable to the plaintiff in error.

The questions of the authority of the cartman to modify the terms of the contract, and of the notice to the consignor of such alteration, and of ratification, having been found by the jury in favor of the plaintiffs below, the added terms to the bill of lading, describing the contents of the box as "H. H. gds.," and limiting the liability to $5 per 100 pounds, become immaterial, and need not be further considered.

I find no error, and the judgment below should be affirmed.

Parker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

James L. Van Arsdell and Philip J. Barber began September 6, 1901, in the district court for Santa Fé county, an action at law against James B. Orman for the recovery of the amount of a judgment alleged to have been given against him in that court in 1885 at the suit of Adam J. Hager, and afterwards affirmed by judgment of this court, January 20, 1886 (3 N. M. 568, 9 Pac. 363), and assigned, August 6, 1888, to the said Van Arsdell and Barber. The plaintiff afterwards filed an amended complaint. An answer to the amended complaint was interposed November 4, 1901, setting up the statute of limitations. March 14, 1903, the legislature passed the following act (Laws 1903, chap. 62, p. 121):

"That § 2921 of the Compiled Laws of 1897 be and the same is hereby amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 2921. If, at any time after the incurring of an indebtedness or liability, or the accrual of a cause of action against him, or the entry of judgment against him in this territory, a debtor shall have been, or shall be, absent from or out of the territory, or concealed within the territory, the time during which he may have been, or may be, out of, or absent from, the territory, or may have concealed, or may conceal, himself within the territory, shall not be included in computing any of the periods of limitation above provided.'

"Sec. 2. All acts and parts of acts in conflict herewith are hereby repealed, and this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage."

Thereafter, July 25, 1903, a demurrer was interposed to the answer to the amended complaint, and was sustained by the court. Plaintiff in error declining to plead further, judgment was upon proofs entered against him, of which he complains here.

Section 2921 of the Compiled Laws of 1897 is a part of the Laws of 1880 (Laws 1880, chap. 5, § 9, p. 45), and is as follows: "If after a cause of action accrues, a defendant removes from the territory, the time during which he shall be a nonresident of the territory shall not be included in computing any of the periods of limitation above provided." It appears from the pleadings that plaintiff in error has never been a resident of New Mexico, and that consequently, under the rule in Lindauer Mercantile Co. v. Boyd (N. M.) 70 Pac. 568, he never could have removed from the territory, and that § 2921, supra, had no application to him.

1. The first proposition presented is whether a repeal or amendment of the statute of limitations is within the constitutional power of a territorial legislature in so far as it deprives a debtor of a defense fully matured under the pre-existing law. However interesting an argument on this subject might be, it could serve no useful purpose, in view of the controlling authority of Campbell v. Holt, 115 U. S. 624, 29 L. ed. 485, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 209, where it is held that a right to defeat an action for debt by a plea of the statute of limitations is not a property right nor a vested right, and may be taken away at will by the legislature. We therefore declare, following the above authority, the affirmative of the proposition. It may be well to notice in this connection, however, the distinction between the right to defeat an action for a debt and a vested right to real or personal property fully matured under a statute of limitations. In the latter case the right, of course, is within the constitutional prohibition, and cannot be disturbed. Campbell v. Holt, 115 U. S. 624, 29 L. ed. 485, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 209. It is argued that Campbell v. Holt is not authority in this jurisdiction, because inapplicable. In that case the court was passing upon a constitutional provision of the state of Texas, and construed the same only in so far as it might encroach upon the guaranties of the Federal Constitution; while in this case it is argued we have additional limitation upon legislative power contained in what is termed our "Bill of Rights," wherein it is provided: "No bill of attainder, ex post facto law, retroactive law, or any law impairing the obligation of contracts shall be made;" and "to guard against transgressions of the high power herein delegated, we declare that everything in this Bill of Rights is excepted out of the general power of government, and shall forever remain inviolate; and all laws contrary thereto, or the provisions thereof, shall be void." Sections 3771, 3779, Comp. Laws 1897. This was an act of the legislature of July 12, 1851 (Laws 1851, 1852, §§ 14, 20, p. 154), and ever since has remained unchanged upon the statute books of the territory. It is not seriously contended, however,—as, of course, it could not be,—that this act is of more dignity or binding force than any other act of the legislature, except in so far as its scope and declaration of important and far-reaching principles of government entitled it to such distinction, or that the legislature enacting this law could thereby limit the powers of any of its successors. It is suggested, however, that this Bill of Rights, having been submitted to Congress, and, either affirmatively or negatively, approved, it perhaps ought to be given the status of organic importance. The unsoundness of the proposition must be apparent. This Bill of Rights is an ordinary act of the legislature, of no more sanctity than any other, enacted with no more formality than any other, and submitted to Congress in the same way as every other act of the legislature. If the submission to and approval of this act by Congress makes it a part of our organic law, then a like approval of every other act of the legislature makes it organic law. If so, when the legislature has once acted on a given subject, the law so enacted becomes organic and fixed, and is no longer open to change by the legislature. This, of course, is not true.

2. The next question is whether the act was intended to be, and is in fact, retrospective in its operation. This must be determined from the act itself. It may be assumed that statutes of limitation will be construed prospectively, unless existing causes are clearly within its terms. It is fair to assume in this territory, especially in view of our Bill of Rights, that courts will not construe an act retroactively unless compelled so to do by the language used. The court will not unnecessarily assume an abandonment of a legislative policy declared in 1851, and ever since recognized. It is likewise a rule of statutory construction that no sentence, clause, or word shall be deemed to be void, superfluous, or insignificant if such a construction be possible. It is with these considerations in mind that we shall examine the terms of this act of 1903. Assuming, for the moment, that the legislature intended this act to be prospective only in its operation, we may find without difficulty the terms in the act to effectuate that purpose as follows: "If at any time after . . . the entry of judgment against him in this territory, a debtor . . . shall be absent from or out of the territory, the time during which he . . . may be out of or absent from the territory shall not be included. . . ." Here we have a complete provision covering all cases where the entry of judgment and the absence from the territory occur subsequently to the passage of the act. The terms used are specific, and plainly indicate what was intended by the legislature. But in the act we find two additional clauses, namely, "shall have been" and "may have been," and the question is, What effect is to be given to them? If the act is to be prospective only in its operation, these words are entirely superfluous. We cannot assume that they were so used, and their full effect and meaning must be given them, if the same can be ascertained. They clearly refer to some other absence from the territory than such as might occur in the future. Of course, the only other absence from the territory to which the words could refer is such as had occurred in the past. Let us assume then, that the legislature intended to include past causes of action and past absences within the operation of the act, and see if that intent will be within the meaning of the terms used. Thus: "If at any time after . . . entry of judgment [heretofore entered] against him in this territory, a debtor shall have been absent from or out of the territory, . . . the time during which he may have been out of or absent from the territory shall not be included. . . ." These words seem to be well adapted to express the intention assumed, and, indeed, seem susceptible of no other application. The words "may have been" are in the present perfect tense and potential mode of the verb. The tense denotes a condition completed in present time, the mode denotes possibility, contingency. The use of "may" in connection with "have been" precludes the application of the terms to anything future. They are the equivalent of "has been," the only difference being that in one case the expression is in the certain or indicative form, and in the other in the contingent or potential form. They both refer to a condition completed in present time. It is claimed that the words "shall have been" can be properly applied only to absences to be completed at or before a future time. This, of course, is ordinarily true, the tense of the verb being the future perfect; but in the connection used, it being assumed that we have agreed that past absences are included in the words of the act, they express merely a past future—past or complete at or before the time the legislature speaks, future in relation to the time of the entry of judgment. In this way we give to each word in the section its proper and full meaning, and only in thus giving the act this construction can we do so. We must conclude, therefore, that the act is retrospective in its operation.

It is further suggested that § 2921 is a part of the act of 1880, in which act no mention is made of domestic judgments, of which this is one; and it is urged that the words "limitation above provided" in the act of 1903 limit the scope of the latter act to such limitations as were provided in the act of 1880, which had no application to judgments such as this. But in 1891 the legislature substituted for § 2 of the act of 1880 a section which included domestic judgments, and which is compiled as § 2914, Comp. Laws 1897. So, if § 2921 is to be construed as § 9 of the act of 1880, likewise is § 2914 to be construed as § 2 of the same act. This makes the words "limitation above provided" apply to domestic judgments.

We see no error in the record, and the judgment of the lower court will be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

2. The word "representatives," in a devise of a remainder to be equally divided, at the expiration of the life estate, among testator's children, "the representatives of such as may die to stand in the place of their ancestors," is not broad enough to include a devise of the interest of a child.

A PPEAL by petitioner from a judgment of the Superior Court for Wilson County in favor of defendants in an action brought to secure partition of certain real estate. Affirmed.

Statement by Walker, J.:

This is a special proceeding for the partition of land, which was brought before the clerk, and by him transferred, under the statute, to the superior court, for the trial of issues joined between the parties, a jury trial having been waived. The court held that the plaintiff is not a tenant in common with the defendants, and a judgment was entered accordingly, to which the plaintiff excepted and appealed.

Messrs. John F. Bruton, F. A. Woodard, S. A. Woodard, and Connor & Connor, for appellees:

The intention is that only such of the children who may survive Mrs. Hackney, and the children of those who die prior to her death, are to take any portion of the property given to Mrs. Hackney for life.

There are many circumstances which will be deemed to overcome the leaning of the courts to regard a devise as vested.

Whitesides v. Cooper, 115 N. C. 570, 20 S. E. 295; Williams v. Hassell, 74 N. C. 434; Watson v. Smith, 110 N. C. 6, 28 Am. St. Rep. 665, 14 S. E. 640; Re Miller, 90 N. C. 625.

Walker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It appears from the case that Willis N. Hackney, who died in 1887, left a will, in which he devised a lot containing about $\frac{1}{2}$ acre in the town of Wilson, and certain personal property, to his wife for life. He then devised and bequeathed to his children land and personal property. These devises and bequests were made in the first six items of the will, and the seventh item is as follows: "I now declare that, with the advancements already made and specially given in this will, in my judgment, equality is made to all my children, so that at the expiration of the life estate of my wife, that which is given to her for life shall be equally divided between all my children, share and share alike, the representatives of such as may have died to stand in the place of their ancestors." Plaintiff married Orpah, a daughter of the testator, who died in July, 1899, without issue, leaving a will in which she devised and bequeathed all her property to the plaintiff. The widow of Willis N. Hackney died in December, 1901. Plaintiff claims an interest in the $\frac{1}{2}$ acre lot as tenant in common with the defendants by virtue of the seventh item of the will of Willis N. Hackney and the will of his wife. The judge ruled that he was not so entitled, and this ruling we are called upon to review.

The decision of the case turns upon the proper construction of the seventh item of the will. If the remainder after the life estate of Mrs. Hackney was vested absolutely by the seventh clause in Orpah (plaintiff's wife) at the death of the testator, and the direction as to the division of the property at her death, or, to use the words of the will, "at the expiration of her life estate," referred, not to the time of the vesting of the estate in interest, or of the vesting of a right to a future estate of freehold, but merely to the time of enjoyment or the vesting of the estate in possession, it will follow that the plaintiff's contention is right, and that he acquired that vested interest of his wife under her will: but, if the provision of the seventh item does refer to the time of the vesting of the estate in interest, or, in other words, to the accrual of the right of property as distinguished from the right of enjoyment, his wife acquired an estate contingent upon her surviving the life tenant; and, as she died before the latter, her interest never vested, plaintiff took nothing under her will, and his suit must fail. We are of the opinion that the latter view is the correct one.

erty may be received and enjoyed by those who were the objects of his bounty, and his intent will always be carried out when to do so will not contravene some well-settled rule of law,—for example, a rule by which a certain, fixed, and definite meaning is given to the language employed by him. The case before us does not present any serious difficulty in the way of ascertaining what the testator meant, when we read the will as a whole, and interpret it accordingly, or even when we isolate the seventh item and construe it by itself. The testator had in former parts of his will devised the lot in question and certain personal property to his wife for life, and devised and bequeathed other property to his children in a manner which, in his opinion, gave each of them an equal share of his estate. Having thus produced equality in this distribution among them, as he declared, he then directs, in the seventh item of his will, that, at the expiration of the life estate of his wife, that which was given to her for life should be equally divided among all his children, share and share alike: the representatives of such as may have died to stand in the place of their ancestors. There are no words of devise in this item, except by inference or implication from the direction that the property, at the death of his wife, should be equally divided; and, as to the period of division, and consequently of devise, the will uses terms of strict condition, namely, “at the expiration of the life estate.” The general rule undoubtedly is that, if there is, in terms, a devise, and the time of enjoyment, merely, is postponed, the interest is a vested one, but if the time be annexed to the substance of the gift or devise, as a condition precedent, it is contingent and transmissible. 3 Wooddeson, 512. This rule was applied in the case of Anderson v. Felton, 36 N. C. (1 Ired. Eq.) 55, to a gift which was to take effect at the time the testator’s daughter “arrived to the age of fifteen years,” but there was no preceding life estate, as there is in this case; and in Rives v. Frizzle, 43 N. C. (8 Ired. Eq.) 237, this was said to take the case out of the rule as stated in Anderson v. Felton. But there are words in the seventh item of the will which distinguish this case from either of those last mentioned, and bring our case within either one or the other of the principles stated in Starnes v. Hill, 112 N. C. at page 10, 22 L. R. A. 598, 16 S. E. 1011, and Whitesides v. Cooper, 115 N. C. at page 574, 20 S. E. 295, in the passage quoted from Gray, Rule against Perpetuities, 108, which is as follows: “The true test in limitations of this character is that, if the conditional element is incorporated into the description of the gift to the remainderman (as it is 67 L. R. A.

in the case under consideration) then the remainder is contingent, but if, after the words giving a vested interest, a clause is added divesting it, the remainder is vested. Thus, on a devise to A for life, remainder to his children, but, if any child die in the lifetime of A, his share to go to those who survive, the share of each child is said to be vested, subject to be divested by its death. But on a devise (as in the present case) to A, for life, remainder to such of his children as survive him, the remainder is contingent.” Clark v. Cox, 115 N. C. 93, 20 S. E. 176; 2 Underhill, Wills, § 867, and also pages 1309 and 1310. It can make no difference in this case whether the remainder to each child was contingent or vested, but subject to be divested by its death before that of the life tenant. In either view, the plaintiff must fail, and it is immaterial, therefore, which alternative of the proposition we adopt as applicable to this case. If the remainder to the children of the testator at the death of their mother is not contingent, it can only be vested, subject to be divested as to any child who predeceased the mother, for it surely was intended that the representatives of any deceased child should take, not by descent, but by purchase; that is, nothing from the parent, but all directly from the deviser. This appears plainly, we think, from the language of the item. 2 Underhill, Wills, § 867. In the first place, the division is not to be made until the death of the life tenant, and that is the time fixed by the terms of the will when it shall be definitely and finally determined who shall take. Fleetwood v. Fleetwood, 17 N. C. (2 Dev. Eq.) 223; Simms v. Garrot, 21 N. C. (1 Dev. & B. Eq.) 397; Irvin v. Clark, 98 N. C. 437, 4 S. E. 30. The testator evidently had in mind the possibility that one or more of his children might die during the life of his wife, and provided for that contingency by giving the share which a deceased child would have taken if it had outlived the mother to his or her representatives. It is manifest that the testator intended that the gift in the seventh item should take effect finally and absolutely according to the state of his family as it existed at the death of his wife, and the item should be construed as if it read: “So that at the expiration of the life estate of my wife, that which is given to her for life shall be equally divided between all my children then living, and the representatives of such as may have died, the latter to stand in the place of their ancestors.” By this construction of the will, a condition precedent would be annexed to the gift which would prevent its vesting in any child unless he or she should survive the life tenant. The case, in this aspect, would fall within the principle stated in Watson v. Watson, 56 N. C. (3 Jones, Eq.) 400; Williams v. Hassell, 74 N. C. 434; Young v. Young, 97 N. C. 132, 2 S. E. 78; Re Miller, 90 N. C. 625; Starnes v. Hill, 112 N. C. 1, 22 L. R. A. 598, 16 S. E. 1011; Clark v. Cox, 115 N. C. 93, 20 S. E. 176; and Whitesides v. Cooper, 115 N. C. 570, 20 S. E. 295.

The children took contingent remainders, the contingency being that they should survive their mother; and, failing in this, as to any one or more of them, the remainder vested in his or their representatives by purchase, as said by Shepherd, Ch. J., in Whitesides v. Cooper, 115 N. C. 570, 20 S. E. 295. This would be the limitation of concurrent fees to take effect alternatively, or as substitutes one for the other, which Fearne, Contingent Remainders, 3d Am. ed. 373, explains as follows: "However, we are to remember that although a fee cannot, in conveyances at common law, be mounted on a fee, yet two or more several contingent fees may be limited merely as substitutes or alternatives one for the other, and not to interfere, but so that one only take effect, and every subsequent limitation be a disposition substituted in the room of the former, if the former should fail of effect." Luddington v. Kime, 1 Ld. Raym. 203. Cruise (vol. 1, title 16, chap. 1, § 50) describes the ulterior devise to the "representatives" as a contingent fee, not contrary to, but concurrent with, the former limitations to the parent, according to the notion in Plunket v. Holmes, T. Raym. 28, and the limitation as one upon a contingency, with a double aspect; the language of Fearne, Contingent Remainders, p. 373, being: "This sort of alternative limitation was termed a 'contingency with a double aspect.'" Shepherd, Ch. J., explains this principle with his usual clearness in Watson v. Smith, 110 N. C. 6, 28 Am. St. Rep. 665, 14 S. E. 640, and Whitesides v. Cooper, 115 N. C. 570, 20 S. E. 295. If a child survived the mother, the remainder was to vest; but, if a child died before the mother, the remainder then vested in the representatives of that child. "But at this day," says Fearne (p. 373), "such limitations may be good in a will or by way of use, upon a contingency that may happen within a reasonable period, though this not by way of direct remainder, but by way of executory devise, or springing or shifting executory use." The nature of the limitation is immaterial in this case.

That there is a condition precedent annexed to the gift to the children we find decided in Hunt v. Hall, 37 Me. 363, a case substantially like ours. The limitation there was "after the decease of my dear wife, my will is that my executor hereafter named cause an equal division to be made among all my children and the heirs of such as may then be deceased." With reference to this devise the court said: "The persons who are to take are not those who are living at the death of the testator. The division is not then to take place. This is to be done at a subsequent and uncertain period. If the estate were to be construed as vesting at the death of the testator, an heir might convey by deed his share of the estate; and if he should decease before the termination of the life estate, leaving heirs, his conveyance would defeat the estate of such heirs. This would be against the express provisions of the will, which provide that the estate should be divided 'among his children and the heirs of such as may then be deceased.' By the terms of the will, the estate is not to vest till after the death of the widow, and then the division is to ensue. Till then there is a contingency as to the persons who may take the estate." The only distinction between the two cases, though they are not any wise different, is the substitution of the words "legal representatives" for the word "heirs," and it must be conceded that, with reference to the lot in controversy, the words "legal representatives" clearly refer to the heirs or the persons who would have represented their ancestor had she outlived the life tenant and the remainder had vested in interest and then by her death the descent had been cast. The words were used to designate the persons who would thus have taken in the other event, but, in the event as it actually occurred, shall take, not by descent, but by purchase; the intention being to create a new stock of inheritance. If we assume though, that the remainder vested in each child upon a condition subsequent, namely, that he or she should survive their mother, which would divest the interest as to any child if it died before its mother, then Mrs. Bowen's will passed nothing to her husband (the plaintiff), as, the very instant it took effect under the statute, she lost her interest in the property, her mother being alive at that time. Wilson v. Bryan, 90 Ky. 482, 14 S. W. 533.

The fact that Orpah Hackney Bowen died without issue cannot change the construction of the will, which must be determined from its language as of the time when it took effect, and not from subsequent events, for the evident meaning of the testator was that his property should go to his "children equally, share and share alike," the representatives of anyone who had died before the mother to stand in the place of such dead ancestor, and, if there were no such representatives, then the leading and paramount intention of the testator should prevail, and the division should still be made equally among his children; that is, the survivors, who would also be the heirs or representatives of the deceased daughter.

It was argued that the word "representatives" includes, not only heirs, but a devisee, or one who takes from another by purchase. We do not think that such a comprehensive meaning can be given to the word "representatives," under the terms of this will. It means the persons who are appointed, not by the deviser in her will, but by the law, to represent her, and upon whom the law would have cast the inheritance; it having been used in this sense as designatio personarum. Besides, they must be the representatives of their "ancestor," which is defined as follows: "One who has preceded another in a direct line of descent; a lineal ascendant. A former possessor; the person last seised. . . . A deceased person from whom another has inherited land." Black, Law Dict. p. 69; 2 Bl. Com. 201. 4 Kent, Com. 404, says: "Ancestral estates are such as are transmitted by descent, and not by purchase." The plaintiff, as devisee of his wife, does not come within any of these definitions.

We have examined the cases cited by the appellant's counsel in their brief and argument, and find that the language of the several wills which was construed in them as giving vested remainders was entirely different from that of the will in this case. We must observe well-settled rules of construction in interpreting a will, but such rules must be applied with strict reference to the peculiar wording of the will, so as not to defeat the expressed intention of the testator. We are speaking of rules of construction, and not rules of property.

The court correctly adjudged that the plaintiff is not a tenant in common with defendants, and there was no error, therefore, in dismissing the action.

J. J. FLEETWOOD, Appt.

lifetime of the life tenant is void, as against public policy.

2. A direction that testator's real estate remain in the name of his estate for a period of five years after the death of his wife, who is given a life estate in the property, and that at the expiration of that period his children appoint commissioners who shall partition the property between them, does not prevent the immediate vesting of the remainder in them, so that with the co-operation of the life tenant they can convey a good title to the property immediately after the death of the testator.
3. The meaning of the words "lawful heirs" cannot be restricted as including only children.
4. A provision in a will that, five years after the death of a life tenant, testator's children shall procure the property to be divided between them, and that they shall own and occupy during their natural lives, and directing that at their death the property shall go to their lawful heirs, vests in them a fee simple, under the rule in Shelley's Case, so that an attempt to make a further limitation of the estate in case of their death without lawful heirs is void.
5. A limitation over to the heirs of testator in case of failure of lawful heirs of the persons to whom and their lawful heirs an estate is given, is defeated, and does not make the first estate a conditional or defeasible fee if the heirs of testator and of such persons must of necessity be the same persons.
6. Specific performance of a contract to sell property devised by will will not be decreed against the protest of the parties, where the result would be to defeat the intention of the testator as manifested in the will.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Perquimans County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to enforce specific performance of a contract to purchase real estate. Affirmed.

Statement by Walker, J.:

This is a controversy, submitted without action, in which the plaintiffs seek specific performance of the contract with the defendant by which they undertook and agreed to sell, and the defendant to buy, 125 acres of land, known as the "Saunders tract." The land originally belonged to Jacob Wool, who devised it to the plaintiffs in the manner set forth in his will, the material items of which are as follows:

"(3) I give, devise, and bequeath my estate and property, real and personal, unto my wife, Elizabeth Arnold Wool, the same to be held by her during her natural life and the income from said property shall go to her for her support.

"(4) I do hereby constitute and appoint my said wife, Elizabeth Arnold Wool, my sole executrix of this my last will and testament without bond to settle my estate.

"(5) I order and direct that none of my real estate be sold by my wife or by my heirs, or disposed of in any way during her natural life.

"(6) I order and direct that my estate remain in the name of Jacob Wool's estate five years after the death of my wife, Elizabeth A. Wool, and at her death the surviving heirs shall select an administrator who shall qualify according to law and shall manage the estate and make a settlement with the heirs, once a year, of all money he has on hand to their credit; upon a failure to do so the heirs may select another administrator if they deem it necessary.

"(7) I order and direct that at the expiration of five years after the death of my wife, Elizabeth A. Wool, my son, Leonard Jackson Wool, and Elizabeth shall select three commissioners and make an equal division of my estate between themselves, Leonard Jackson and Elizabeth Wool, who shall own and occupy said property during their natural lives and, at the death of Leonard Jackson and Elizabeth Wool, the property shall go to their lawful heirs, and, should they have no surviving heirs, the property shall go to my lawful heirs.

"(8) I order and direct that the administrator shall receive as compensation for his services one and one-fourth per cent for receiving and one and one-fourth per cent for disbursing whatever money may come in hand belonging to my estate."

The devisees all survived the testator, are plaintiffs in this controversy, and are of full age, unmarried, and without any children. The executrix, Elizabeth A. Wool, qualified as such, and has fully settled the estate of her testator. Prior to the 15th day of June the defendant duly contracted with the plaintiffs to purchase of them the tract of land herein first described, in fee simple, at the sum of $1,200, and the plaintiffs contracted to convey to him a good and indefeasible title in fee to the same; and before the commencement of this action the plaintiffs, Elizabeth A. Wool, Leonard J. Wool, and Elizabeth Wool, executed and duly tendered to the defendant, J. J. Fleetwood, a deed in fee simple, with full warranties, conveying to him, in terms, the tract of land aforesaid, and demanded of him the purchase money which he had agreed to pay for the same. The defendant, Fleetwood, refused to accept the deed or to pay the purchase money, upon the ground only that, by the terms of the will of Jacob Wool, the plaintiffs could not convey a good and indefeasible title to the land. It was agreed between the parties that if, under and by virtue of the will, the plaintiffs had the legal right to convey the land to the defendant, and did, by the deed tendered, convey a good and indefeasible estate in fee to him, then judgment should be entered requiring him to comply with his said contract, by accepting the said deed, and by paying over the money which he had contracted to pay, but, if the court should be of the opinion that the plaintiffs are unable to convey, by virtue of the will and deed, a good and indefeasible fee-simple title to the land in controversy, then the defendant should go without day. Upon consideration of the facts agreed, the court held that the plaintiffs had the legal right to convey and make a good and indefeasible title to the land described in the contract, and thereupon adjudged that, upon the plaintiffs tendering to the defendant a deed in due form, with a covenant of warranty, for the land, and with proper probate, they recover of the defendant the amount of the purchase price ($1,200) and the costs. The defendant excepted to this judgment, and appealed.

Mr. Charles Whedbee, for appellant.

The word "lawful" in this section, before the word "heirs," changes the technical meaning of "heirs" to "children," and describes the persons who are to take after Leonard J. and Elizabeth's death.

The rule in Shelley's Case does not apply.

Walker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We do not see why the plaintiffs are not able, by the deed which they have tendered, to convey a good and indefeasible title to the defendant. The latter contends, as we understand, that the deed will not pass to him such a title, for three reasons: (1) Because by the fifth item of the will the widow and the heirs are forbidden to sell or dispose of any of the real estate during the life of the former; (2) because by the terms of the sixth item no estate vested in the plaintiffs Leonard and Elizabeth Wool, 67 L. R. A.

either by descent or purchase, until the expiration of five years after the devisors' death; and (3) because by the seventh item the said Leonard and Elizabeth did not acquire the fee, but only a life estate, the word "lawful," which qualifies the word "heirs," having the effect, in law, of preventing the latter word from operating as one of limitation, and of restricting the meaning of the words "lawful heirs" to that of "children," who will take, not by descent from their parents, but by purchase directly from the devisors, and therefore that the rule in Shelley's Case and the act of 1784 (Code, § 1325) converting fees tail into fees simple do not apply. It is true that the testator places a positive restraint upon the alienation of the real property in the fifth item of his will, and the plaintiffs, by reason of that restriction, cannot convey a good title to the defendant if that provision of the will is valid. We entertain no doubt upon the question thus presented, as it is well settled that such a restraint upon the donee's right to dispose of the property is void, as being contrary to a wise principle of the law, which is based upon a sound public policy. As a general rule, it may be conceded that every person may do with his own as he pleases, but this rule is not of universal application, but is subject to some exceptions made necessary by the interest of the public that the titles to land should be as little fettered, and the power of alienation as little subject to restraint, as possible and consistent with a reasonable enjoyment of the right of property and all of its incidents: it being, generally speaking, against public policy to allow restraints to be put upon transfers which that public policy does not forbid. Gray, Restraints on Alienation, 2d ed. § 3. Hence it has ever been the inclination of the courts, in their decisions, to remove old restraints, and not only to discountenance but to disallow new ones, and to put all obstacles out of the way of a fair and reasonable exercise of this power of alienation, which is one of the most important and valuable incidents of the right of property. While limited restraints of a certain kind have been recognized as valid, when the fee is conveyed, it must be conceded at this time to be well settled that a restraint upon the right of alienation, even for a limited period of time, is, as to such an estate, invalid; it being inconsistent with the nature of the grant, or of the estate which is created by the latter. Gray, Restraints on Alienation, 2d ed. 41. The elementary law writers (2 Bl. Com. 157) lay down the rule generally that a condition of nonalienation annexed to a conveyance inter vivos or to a devise of a fee is void, because it is inconsistent with the full and free enjoyment which the ownership of such an estate implies. Twitty v. Camp, 62 N. C. (Phill. Eq.) 61. "The doctrine," says Ruffin, Ch. J., speaking for the court, "rests upon these considerations: That a gift of the legal property in a thing includes the jus disponendi, and that a restriction on that right, as a condition, is repugnant to the grant, and therefore void." Mebane v. Mebane, 39 N. C. (4 Ired. Eq.) 131, 44 Am. Dec. 102.

The statute quia emptores (18 Edw. I. chap. 1 [1290]) abolished subinfeudation, and, by virtue of its provisions, all persons except the King's tenants in capite were left at liberty to alien all or any part of their lands at their own pleasure and discretion (2 Bl. Com. 289), and finally restrictions in cases of freehold tenure were entirely removed by 12 Car. II. chap. 34; and ever since those statutes were passed the right of free and unlimited alienation has been regarded as an inseparable incident to an estate in fee. 1 Washb. Real Prop. 5th ed. p. 83; Hardy v. Galloway, 111 N. C. 519, 32 Am. St. Rep. 828, 15 S. E. 890. It cannot be questioned that a condition of non-alienation annexed to the grant of an estate in fee is void, though confined in its operation to a limited period of time. Gray, Restraints on Alienation, § 54. "The capricious regulations which individuals would fain impose on the enjoyment and disposal of property must yield to the fixed rules which have been prescribed by the supreme power as essential to the useful existence of property." Dick v. Pitchford, 21 N. C. (1 Dev. & B. Eq.) 484; Pritchard v. Bailey, 113 N. C. 521, 18 S. E. 668; Latimer v. Waddell, 119 N. C. 370, 26 S. E. 122; School Committee v. Kesler, 67 N. C. at page 447; Coke, § 362. We think it is equally well settled—at least in this state—that such a condition annexed to the grant or devise of an estate for life is also void, both as to legal and equitable estates. In Dick v. Pitchford, 21 N. C. (1 Dev. & B. Eq.) 484, Gaston, J., for the court, says: "The deed does not provide that in the event of the . . . [life tenant] attempting to sell or dispose of the same, or otherwise to anticipate the receipt thereof, that they shall then go over and be paid to some other person. It secures to him, at all events, the enjoyment of the property for life, but prohibits him from transferring it or anticipating its profits. Now, the general right of the giver of property to prescribe the modifications of his gift is subject to the condition that these modifications be not contrary to law, nor repugnant to the nature of the conveyance, nor incompatible with the legal incidents belonging to the disposition he has made. The power of alienation is a legal incident of ownership. It is familiar doctrine that if a feoffment, grant, release, confirmation, or devise be made upon condition not to alien the estate, or if a term for years or chattel personal be granted upon condition not to assign, such conditions are altogether nugatory. The doctrine obtains not less in courts of equity, acting upon these interests which are the proper subject-matter of their jurisdiction, than in courts of law, adjudicating upon legal interests. A departure from it would introduce endless confusion and innumerable mischiefs." Gray, Restraints on Alienation, § 134; 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 870. A distinction is sometimes to be found in the cases between a condition against alienation or anticipation coupled with a provision that the life tenant and his assigns shall lose the estate if the condition is broken, and that it shall go over (which makes it a limitation), and one by which he is compelled to keep the property, so that neither his grantees nor any third person can get hold of or enjoy it; the latter condition being declared as void, and the former as valid. We need not pass upon this distinction, as there is no limitation over in this case.

The next objection to the title is equally untenable. It will be observed on reading the sixth item of the will that, while the testator provides that his surviving heirs shall appoint an administrator, he does not devise any estate to the appointee, but directs that the "estate" shall remain "in the name of Jacob Wool's estate." There can be no doubt that there is nothing in this item to interrupt the immediate descent of the land to the heirs, and they consequently became seised by descent of an estate in remainder, which was vested in interest, though not in possession,—a vested remainder after the life estate of their mother. Den ex dem. Ferebee v. Procter, 19 N. C. (2 Dev. & B. L.) 439; Beam v. Jennings, 89 N. C. 451; Munds v. Cassidey, 98 N. C. 558, 4 S. E. 353, 355; Gay v. Grant, 101 N. C. 219, 8 S. E. 99, 106. As the case shows that the executrix had fully administered, and there was no necessity for the appointment of an administrator with the will annexed, and as an administrator has nothing to do with the land, except for the purpose of selling it and paying debts under a power given by the will or by the statute, we do not see how this provision can be executed; and if we construe the item to mean that they shall select an administrator, or a trustee who is called an administrator, and that he shall take either the freehold or a chattel interest (Trodd v. Downs, 2 Atk. 304; Goodtitle ex dem. Hayward v. Whitby, 1 Burr. 228) for the purpose of performing the trust (Sanders, Uses & Trusts, 2d Am. ed. pp. 253-257), which trust is special, and therefore not executed by the statute of uses (Sanders, pp. 2-4), we yet do not see why, if the defendant accept the deed of the plaintiffs, the latter will not be estopped by their deed, or rebutted by their warranty, to ever hereafter assert any right or title under that item of the will, or to avail themselves thereof in any way; and this will equally follow as a result if the provision is regarded as one for the appointment of an administrator, and as such is valid. Especially will this be the case if the deed contains covenants of seisin, for quiet enjoyment, and against encumbrances (Halleyburton v. Slagle, 132 N. C. 947, 44 S. E. 655; Doe ex dem. Taylor v. Roe, 11 N. C. 14 Hawks) 116, 15 Am. Dec. 512; Bigelow, Estoppel, 5th ed. pp. 440-446), and if in the premises and habendum the land, as well as its rents, issues, and profits, is conveyed. A copy of the deed should have been inserted in the transcript, as we are asked to decide whether it will convey a good and indefeasible title, and we should see it before finally determining what its effect will be; but, as there is no copy, we must assume from what is said in the case that it is in proper form to transfer the land and everything connected therewith in which the plaintiffs have any interest under the will; the question submitted to us involving merely the ability of the plaintiffs to pass a good title by their deed to what they acquired by the will.

The third objection to the title of the plaintiffs cannot be sustained. By the sixth item of the will a life estate was given to the widow, and the remainder in fee descended to the heirs, Leonard and Elizabeth, who by the terms of the seventh item are to make partition of the land at the expiration of five years from the death of the life tenant. The provision in the seventh item that Leonard and Elizabeth shall own and occupy the property during their natural lives, and at their death it shall go to their lawful heirs, and, should they have no lawful surviving heirs, it shall go to the testator's lawful heirs, does not change the quantity of their interests, or convert their fee into an estate for their lives, with remainder to their children. There can be no such thing as an unlawful heir. The term "lawful heirs" means the heirs designated by the law to take from their ancestor, and it cannot be construed as meaning the children of the first taker. It follows that by that item of the will an estate of freehold was given to the ancestors, Leonard and Elizabeth, and afterwards by the same instrument there is a limitation by way of remainder to their heirs generally, as a class, to take in succession as heirs to them. The case therefore falls directly within the rule in 67 L. R. A.

Shelley's Case, the word "heirs" being one of limitation, and the estate is vested absolutely in the ancestors. Ham v. Ham, 21 N. C. (1 Dev. & B. Eq.) 598; Donnell v. Mateer, 40 N. C. (5 Ired. Eq.) 7; Worrell v. Vinson, 50 N. C. (5 Jones, L.) 91; Sanderlin v. DeFord, 47 N. C. (2 Jones, L.) 74. This rule is of very ancient origin, and has always been considered as a rule of law or of property, and not merely as a rule of construction adopted for the purpose of ascertaining the actual intention of the testator. When the words employed bring the case within the rule, the intention of the testator is not to be considered, even though he should declare that the ancestor shall only have a life estate. The rule is imperative, and must be enforced inflexibly in all cases to which by the terms of the particular instrument it is applicable. 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 640. If there is anything in the instrument to indicate clearly an intention not to use the words in their technical sense, but as descriptio personarum,—as, for instance, that by the words "heirs of the body" the testator meant children,—such an interpretation will be given to his language as will effectuate his intention. "As the law will not entrap men by words incautiously used, if in the limitation of a remainder by any instrument of conveyance the phrase 'heirs' or 'heirs of the body' be expressed, but it is unequivocally seen that the limitation is not made to them in that character, but simply as a number or class of individuals thus attempted to be described, then the whole force of the phrase is restricted to this designation or description,—it shall have the same operation as the words would have of which it is the representative; there is not, in fact, a limitation to 'heirs,' and, of course, there is no room for the application of the rule." Allen v. Pass, 20 N. C. 207 (4 Dev. & B. L. 77).

This court has said that the rule in Shelley's Case applies only when the same persons will take the same estate, whether they take by descent or purchase, in which case they are made to take by descent, as it is more favorable to the donee, to the feudal incidents of seignories, to the rights of creditors, and for other reasons, that the first taker should have an estate of inheritance; but, when the persons taking by purchase would be different or have other estates than they would take by descent from the first taker, the rule does not apply, and the first taker is confined to an estate for life, and the heirs, heirs of the body, or issue in wills, will take as purchasers. Ward v. Jones, 40 N. C. (5 Ired. Eq.) 400; Mills v. Thorne, 95 N. C. 362; Howell v. Knight, 100 N. C. 254, 6 S. E. 721. In Allen v. Pass, 20 N. C. (4 Dev. & B. L.) at page 211, the same idea is thus expressed: "Before the application of the rule in Shelley's Case, it is always proper first to ascertain whether, on the true interpretation of the words of the gift, there is a limitation of the inheritance in remainder to the heirs or to the heirs of the body of one to whom a precedent freehold is given,—such a limitation does exist when the gift is to them in the quality of heirs,—embracing the same number and succession of objects, and conferring the same extent of interest as would be embraced and conferred where the inheritance has been limited to the ancestor."

The word "lawful" is not sufficient per se to show an intention not to use the word "heirs" in its ordinary legal sense, as a word of inheritance or of limitation; and we must therefore hold that Leonard and Elizabeth, under the seventh, if not under the sixth, item of the will, took an estate in fee. Ex parte Cooper, 136 N. C. 130, 48 S. E. 581, and Britt v. Rowland Lumber Co. 136 N. C. 171, 48 S. E. 586, both at this term.

The defendant's counsel, in his brief, contends that the rule in Shelley's Case does not apply, and relies upon Rollins v. Keel, 115 N. C. 68, 20 S. E. 209; Howell v. Knight, 100 N. C. 254, 6 S. E. 721; Mills v. Thorne, 95 N. C. 362; and Bird v. Gilliam, 121 N. C. 320, 28 S. E. 489. But in each of those cases the language of the will was different from that used in this will, and there were special circumstances which prevented the application of the rule. The case of Patrick v. Morehead, 85 N. C. 62, 39 Am. Rep. 684, which is cited with approval by the court in Rollins v. Keel, is a direct authority for the construction we have placed upon this item of the will with respect to the operation of the rule in Shelley's Case. The subject is discussed by Ashe, J., at page 67, 85 N. C., 39 Am. Rep. 684.

It is not suggested in the briefs of counsel that the limitation over to the "lawful heirs" of the testator, upon the death of Leonard and Elizabeth without leaving heirs, renders their estate a fee contingent or defeasible. We have, however, considered the question, and have reached the conclusion that it does not. The heirs of Leonard and Elizabeth will not necessarily be the heirs of the testator, as they may have heirs on the maternal side; but the converse is not true, as the heirs of the testator must of necessity be the heirs of his children. It therefore follows that if, at the death of Leonard and Elizabeth, there be any persons living who are the heirs of the testator, they will also be their heirs; and this will, of course, destroy the ulterior limitation, for it is not to take effect, by the terms of the devise, if Leonard and Elizabeth die leaving heirs.

If the parties were reversed, and we were called upon to decide whether the defendants in this case are entitled to specific performance, the relief would be denied, as the granting it is a matter of sound judicial discretion, controlled, it is true, by established principles of equity, but exercised only upon a consideration of all the circumstances of each particular case (Pom. Contr. Spec. Perf. § 35); and as a conveyance by the present plaintiffs, Leonard and Elizabeth, would tend to defeat the intention of the testator as manifested in item 6 of the will, this consideration alone would be sufficient to induce the court to withhold its aid. And a like result would follow if the plaintiffs in this case were seeking to compel the defendants, against their will, to comply with the contract, for the same consideration would arise. The question, though, is not presented in either of these ways. The defendant is willing to take the title upon our declaration that it will at least be good in them by reason of the estoppel or rebutter arising out of the plaintiffs' deed or warranty, and we so decide. This affirms the judgment below.

W. H. TRIPP, Exr., etc., of Mary Nobles, Deceased,

v.

S. J. NOBLES, Impleaded, etc., Appt.

(136 N. C. 99.)

1. A widow who offers for probate, and undertakes to carry out as administratrix with the will annexed, the will of her husband, which devises to her her own land for life, with remainder to their children, and an additional sum of money, is estopped to assert her absolute title to the real estate; and it is immaterial that the money is only a small portion of the value of the estate, and no more than she would be entitled to claim under the law for support.
2. Creditors of a widow, who become such after the death of her husband, cannot complain of her election to claim under the will of her husband, which devises to her her own real estate with remainder to her children, and an additional sum of money.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Pitt County in plaintiff's favor in a petition for leave to sell real estate for the payment of the debts of Mary Nobles, deceased. Reversed.

Statement by Connor, J.:

This is a petition filed by the plaintiff, executor of Mary Nobles, deceased, for license to sell her real estate to make assets for the payment of her debts. The defendants are her heirs at law. The petition contains the usual averments prescribed by the statute in such cases. The defendant S. J. Nobles filed an answer to the petition, denying the material averments therein. The clerk, upon the coming in of the answer, transferred the cause to the civil issue docket for trial upon the issues raised by the pleadings. The only issues and finding thereupon pertinent to the exceptions are: "Did Mary Nobles die in possession of, and holding title in fee to, the lands described in the petition?" This issue was, by consent, answered "Yes." "Is the plaintiff estopped to allege title in Mary Nobles at the time of her death of the lands described in the complaint?" The jury, under instruction of the court, answered the second "No." From a judgment for the plaintiff the defendant S. J. Nobles appealed.

Messrs. Skinner & Whedbee for appellant.

Messrs. Jarvis & Blow for appellee.

Connor, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The land described in the petition was the property of Simon J. Nobles, the husband of plaintiff's testatrix, and father of the defendants. He conveyed it to Macon G. Moye, who immediately conveyed to said Mary J. Nobles. Ten years thereafter the husband, Simon J. Nobles, executed his will, bequeathing to his wife, the said Mary, all of his personal property of the value of $100, and devising to her the land conveyed as aforesaid for her life, remainder to his son, the defendant S. J. Nobles, subject to a charge of $126 in favor of his daughter Florence L. Moye, and $172 in favor of another daughter, C. F. Crawford, both of whom are defendants herein. Said Simon J. died March, 1891, and his widow, the said Mary, offered the will for probate, and qualified as administratrix cum testamento annexo. In her application for probate of said will and letters of administration she set forth the value of the estate as $600, of which "$500 is real estate and $100 is personal property." She further set forth that "Simon J. Nobles, Florence L. Moye, and Mary Nobles, the widow, are entitled as heirs and distributees." The said Simon J. and wife, Mary, resided on said land during the life of the former, and after his death she remained in possession until her death, November 19, 1902. She retained the personal property bequeathed to her in the will of her said husband. The said Mary Nobles left a last will and testament, appointing the plaintiff executor, which was duly admitted to probate. She made no disposition of said land in her will. The defendant S. J. Nobles insists that by proving the will of her husband and qualifying as his administratrix cum testamento annexo, and taking and retaining the personal property, the said Mary elected to take thereunder, and that she and her representatives are thereby estopped from making any claim to the land inconsistent with the provision of the will.

Gaston, J., in Melchor v. Burger, 21 N. C. (1 Dev. & B. Eq.) 634, says: "Ever since the case of Noyes v. Mordaunt, which was decided in 1706 (2 Vern. 581), it has been holden for an established principle of equity that where a testator, by his will, confers a bounty on one person, and makes a disposition in favor of another prejudicial to the former, the person thus prejudiced shall not insist upon his old right, and at the same time enjoy the bounty conferred by the will. The intention of the testator is apparent that both dispositions shall take effect, and the conscience of the donee is affected by the condition thus implied that he shall not defraud the design of the donor by accepting the benefit and disclaiming the burden, giving effect to the disposition in his favor and defeating that to his prejudice." The doctrine is so strongly fixed in our jurisprudence, and so uniformly adhered to and enforced by the court, that it is unnecessary to cite authority for its support. The facts set out in this record bring the case clearly within the operation of the principle, unless, as contended by the plaintiff, there be some distinguishing feature to take it out of the general rule. The land devised to the wife for life, remainder to his son, subject to the charge in favor of the daughters, was the property of the wife. This was well known to the husband. The personal property bequeathed to her in the will was the property of the husband. Upon the death of the husband the wife well knew the status and value of the property and the provisions of the will. She was sui juris, and fully competent to elect by dissenting from the will, if she so desired, thereby holding her land and taking the personal property as her year's support by appropriate proceedings for that purpose. She deliberately, and by a most solemn and unmistakable act, chose to take and hold under the will. The principle of law which fixed her status in respect to the property is thus stated: "The doctrine of election, as applied to the law of wills, simply means that he who takes under a will must conform to all of its provisions. He cannot accept a benefit given by the testamentary instrument and evade its burdens. He must either conform to the will or wholly reject and repudiate it. No person is under any legal obligation to accept the bounty of the testator; but, if he accepts what the testator confers upon him by his will, he must adhere to that will throughout all its dispositions." 2 Underhill, Wills, § 726. This court, in Weeks v. Weeks, 77 N. C. 421, says: "It is a familiar principle of equity that a devisee or legatee cannot claim both under a will and against it. If the will gives his property to another, he may keep his property, but he cannot at the same time take anything given to him by the will; for it was given to him on the implied condition that he would submit to the disposition of his property made by the testator." But it is suggested that, as the personal property given the wife was worth only $100, and the land $500, she took no benefit under the will; that she was entitled to have the personality allotted to her as and for her year's support, and therefore received no more than by the law she was entitled to have from her husband's estate. We at first thought this fact relieved her of the duty to elect, but upon a careful examination of the works on equity jurisprudence and many cases we find no suggestion of any such exception to the general rule. The value of the personality and her right to claim in some other way presented a strong reason to her for exercising her right to dissent from the will, and thereby elect to take against it; but with a full knowledge of the facts she elected to prove the will, and take out letters of administration, assuming thereby the duty of executing its provisions. If she had been misled or acted under misconception of the condition of the estate and her rights, she might have had relief, and been permitted to exercise her right of election to dissent from the will; but there is no suggestion of that kind here. It has been held in New York that when one elected to take a benefit under the will with burdens attached, he was bound, although it turned out that the burden was greater than the benefit. Brown v. Knapp, 79 N. Y. 136. "One who accepts of a devise or bequest does so on condition of conforming to the will. No one is allowed to disappoint a will under which he takes a benefit, and everyone claiming under a will is bound to give full effect to the legal dispositions thereof so far as he can, . . . and where one is thus put to his election under a will it matters not that what he takes turns out to be greater or less in value than that which he surrenders." Caulfield v. Sullivan, 85 N. Y. 153. Certainly this must be so where the person knows at the time she elects to take under the will the value of the property. In Syme v. Badger, 92 N. C. 706, Judge Badger, for the purpose of providing for the payment of a debt due his wife, devised and bequeathed to her real and personal property in payment of the debt. He left other property and other creditors. Mrs. Badger qualified as executrix, and took possession of the property. It turned out that the property given her was of insufficient value to pay her debts. This court held that by proving the will and qualifying as executrix she elected to take under the will, and was thereby precluded from resorting to other assets of her testator to pay her debts. Smith, Ch. J., quoting with approval the language of this court in Mendenhall v. Mendenhall, 53 N. C. (8 Jones, L.) 287, said: "The act of qualifying as executrix and undertaking upon oath to carry into effect the provisions of the will is irrevocable." The authorities are cited in the opinion in that case. The principle has been approved by this court in Allen v. Allen, 121 N. C. 328, 28 S. E. 513, and Treadway v. Payne, 127 N. C. 436, 37 S. E. 460. We can see no distinction between the qualification of the wife as executrix and administratrix with the will annexed. In either case the will is offered for probate, and the party claims under it, and assumes the duty of executing its provisions.

It is argued that the election by Mrs. Nobles cannot affect the rights of her creditors; that to permit her thereby to divest herself of her lands would be a fraud upon them. If the debts were in existence at the time of the death of her husband, we should concur with the plaintiff in this view. The record does not disclose when the debts were contracted. For the purpose of disposing of this appeal we cannot assume that the outstanding debts were contracted during coverture. If they were so contracted, they could not, as simple contract debts or bonds, be a charge upon her land. Of course, if the debts were chargeable upon her land, she could not, by her election to take other property of less value under her husband's will, permit the land to pass to other parties discharged of such debts. This question may be inquired into upon another trial. Her heirs at law and her personal representative, except in so far as the rights of existing creditors may be affected, are bound by her election. "An election once made by a party bound to elect, and under no misapprehension as to his rights, and with knowledge of the value of the properties to be affected by such election, is irrevocable, and binds the party making it and all persons claiming under him, and also all donees under the instrument whose rights are directly affected by the election." Eaton, Eq. p. 199; Cory v. Cory, 37 N. J. Eq. 198.

A careful examination of the record we think explains the conduct of the parties. The land belonged to Simon J. Nobles. He conveyed it to his son-in-law, who immediately conveyed to the wife. It was the purpose by these conveyances to put the title in the wife, doubtless to meet some undisclosed conditions or family arrangement. The husband thereupon makes his will, giving this land to the wife for life, remainder to the son, subject to a charge of about one half its value in favor of his two daughters. The wife leaves a will, in which she makes no mention of this land. The reasonable inference is that she understood and acquiesced in her husband's disposition of the property. The issue in regard to her ownership is found by consent in the affirmative. It was evidently the purpose of counsel to present the contested question upon the third issue. His honor instructed the jury to answer the issue "No." Strictly speaking his honor was correct. The right of the remainder-man, S. J. Nobles, does not accrue by way of estoppel. A court of equity would, if applied to at the death of the husband and the election of the wife to take under the will, have decreed a conveyance of the legal title in the land to the remainder-man, subject to the life estate of the wife; or accomplished the same end by impressing a trust upon the legal title in accordance with the disposition made in the will. Mr. Eaton says: If the donee "elect to take under the instrument, he must carry out all its provisions, and transfer his own property disposed of thereunder to the person named as the recipient thereof." Eaton, Eq. § 66. The will of Simon J. Nobles did not transfer the legal title, hence it remained in the wife, burdened with the rights of the son and his sisters. We notice this phase of the record because of the apparent inconsistency in the verdict. The legal title to the land is in the heirs of Mrs. Nobles, but, as she would have been precluded from asserting it against the devise in the will save for her life estate, so her executor may not sell the naked legal title as against the beneficial owner, the defendant Simon J. Nobles. The cause must be remanded for a new trial in accordance with this opinion. it is so ordered.

Walker, J., dissenting:

The facts of this case are well stated in the opinion of the majority of the court as written by Mr. Justice Connor, and it is not necessary, therefore, to repeat them here. I do not differ with my brethren of the majority in their understanding of the facts, but their views and mine are not at all in accord as to the law applicable to those facts. They think, and have so decided, that a case of election is presented, which deprives the widow of her land, while I do not; my opinion being that the law did not compel her to part with her valuable property in exchange for the paltry sum of $100 which was given her in the form of a legacy, but which really belonged to her at the time of the pretended gift. The doctrine of election came to us from the civil law, and is equitable in its nature. It is based upon no principle, as I conceive, which, in its application, will work so great an injustice as to take that which in law belongs to a widow and give it to another upon an inadequate consideration, to say the least of it. "An election, in equity, is a choice which a party is compelled to make between the acceptance of a benefit under a written instrument and the retention of some property already his own, which is attempted to be disposed of in favor of a third party by virtue of the same paper. The doctrine rests upon the principle that a person claiming under any document shall not interfere by title paramount to prevent another part of the same document from having effect according to its construction. He cannot accept and reject the same writing." Bispham, Eq. 6th ed. p. 413, § 295. The doctrine, it is said, requires that there should be alternative benefits between which the donee is to make his choice once for all, and it has been settled by the more recent authorities that it is based upon the principle of compensation, and not at all upon the idea of forfeiture, as was formerly, but erroneously, held, by not distinguishing between express and implied elections and cases in which the beneficiary elects to take under and those in which he elects to take against the will. The text writers and the courts are now practically agreed that the underlying principle of this equity is one of compensation to the disappointed donee, instead of an entire forfeiture by the other donee who gets the benefit under the will. Fetter, Eq. pp. 51, 54. The latter must only make compensation out of his share under the will to the person who is disappointed by his election. Indeed, Adams in his work on Equity, 2d Am. ed. by L. & C. p. 237 (97), says: "This [testator's] intention is at once effected if compensation be the result, but will be manifestly defeated by forfeiture unless the court can imply a gift to the disappointed donee, for which the testator has given no authority." Eaton, Eq. 182; Snell, Eq. pp. 204, 205; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 462; Bigelow, Estoppel, 5th ed. pp. 674, 675; Bispham, Eq. 6th ed. §§ 296, 395; Herman, Estoppel, § 1031. The doctrine is not applicable if there is no fund from which compensation can be made. This follows as a matter of course. Snell, Eq. 1st Am. ed. 205, 206; Bigelow, Estoppel, p. 676; Fetter, Eq. p. 54. But it is also necessary, in order to put anyone to an election, that the testator should give by his will property actually and absolutely owned by himself to the person required to elect, or, as it is put, some free disposable property, which can become compensation for what the donor seeks to take away. Bigelow, Estoppel, 676; Fetter, Eq. 52, 54; Eaton, Eq. 185. This doctrine of equity has grown out of the fundamental maxim that he who seeks equity must do equity, and it does not arise when the conscience of the alleged refractory donee is not so affected as to require him to surrender something of his own for that which his donor has conferred upon him. 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 461; Snell, Eq. p. 202. Applying the principle as thus understood to the facts of our case, let us see if there was any obligation imposed upon Mrs. Nobles to elect between inconsistent benefits, and whether, by what she did, her title to the land devised in the will has been lost or in the least impaired. In the very beginning it must be conceded that such is not the case, as, in any event, she is required to give up only the pecuniary legacy of $100 for the purpose of making compensation, and to that extent merely does she lose anything. The authorities are all at one in stating that she may keep that which is her own, provided she makes compensation to the losing donee, if the alternative gift to her is sufficient for that purpose, and, if not sufficient, then pro tanto, and, if it is more than enough for the purpose, she retains the surplus. This is the well-settled rule, as the above citations will substantiate, and it holds good in her favor until by some decree of the court she has, or, if she is dead, her heirs have, been compelled to convey to the other donee. The devisee S. J. Nobles could recover at the utmost only the sum of $100 and interest, if the land is worth more than that sum.

It is not necessary, though, to rely upon the principle of compensation in order to defeat the claim of the defendant S. J. Nobles. Every widow of an intestate, or of a testator from whose will she has dissented, is entitled, besides her distributive share in her deceased husband's personal estate, to an allowance for the support of herself and 67 L. R. A. family for one year after his death; the value of that "year's allowance" being not less than $300. Code, §§ 2116, 2118. Where the value of any gift of personal property to her in her husband's will does not exceed the amount allowed her by law, she need not dissent in order to claim her year's support, because it is presumed to be given by the testator as and for her allowance. Flippin v. Flippin, 117 N. C. 376, 23 S. E. 321. There could be no reason for requiring her to dissent if she will get no more by doing so, and in such a case she takes the amount given in the will as her year's allowance by virtue of the law, and not of the will. She is considered as in the possession and enjoyment of it under her paramount title. Statutes in all material respects like ours have been thus construed in other states by courts whose decisions are entitled to the highest respect. Baker v. Baker, 57 Wis. 382, 15 N. W. 425; Godman v. Converse, 38 Neb. 657, 57 N. W. 394; Moore v. Moore, 48 Mich. 271, 12 N. W. 180; Williams v. Williams, 5 Gray, 24. Why should the widow be compelled to dissent in such a case as this one? Why be required to do so vain and unprofitable a thing? If she had formally dissented, she would have received no more than if she had taken what was given by the will, as the $100 was all of her husband's personal estate, and therefore with or without a dissent she would get the same thing, and much less than the minimum sum to which she was entitled under the law. The benefit which she received, in order to bind her by an election to abide by the devise of her own property, must have been a substantial one, and surely must have been something of which her husband had the absolute right of disposal, without any right of veto in her. This is not like the case of a distributee, who can take nothing unless the ancestor dies intestate, but must be content, when there is a will, to take what is given by it, and who cannot repudiate it in order to take under the law, being dependent altogether on the bounty of the decedent. Pearson, Ch. J., notes the distinction in Harrington v. McLean, 62 N. C. (Phill. Eq.) at page 260, in citing and commenting on Mendenhall v. Mendenhall, 53 N. C. (8 Jones, L.) 287. I have been able to find but two cases in which the point presented in this case has been considered. In Stone v. Vandermark, 146 Ill. 312, 34 N. E. 150, a widow had taken possession of certain land and personal property devised to her by her husband, and it was contended that she thereby elected to take under the will; but the court, finding that the personal property was less in value than she was entitled to receive under the statute as her year's allowance, and that the land was the homestead, to the possession of which, during her life, she was also entitled under the law, held that there had been no election. The case of Compher v. Compher, 25 Pa. 31, is much like ours in its facts. There the husband bequeathed to his wife personal property to the value of $300, being the amount of the year's support allowed by the statute, as in this case. She accepted the provision made for her, and the court held that this did not bind her to an election to take under the will, as she claimed under the law; but the court further said that, if she had claimed as distributee, it would have been otherwise, making the same distinction that was made by Pearson, Ch. J., in Harrington v. McLean, 62 N. C. (Phill. Eq.) 260. In Smith v. Butler, 85 Tex., at page 130, 19 S. W. 1085, the court, in discussing this question, said: "The wife would receive, if she took under the will, something she would not otherwise be entitled to, so far as the record shows, either by reason of her community right or as the surviving head of the family; and by the will the children of the testator would be deprived of some property to which they would have been entitled but for the will. The principle of election is that he who accepts a benefit under a will must adopt the whole contents of the instrument, so far as it concerns him, conforming to its provisions, and renouncing every right inconsistent with it . . . Some free disposable property must be given to the electing donee which can become compensation for what the testator sought to take away." The rule requires, therefore, that there must be a benefit which the party claimed to have elected would not have enjoyed if the will had not been executed. What did this widow get under the will that she would not have received under the law by dissenting (if a dissent was necessary), or if her husband had died intestate? The taking of her property under such circumstances, when she gets nothing that can justly be called compensation, would amount to confiscation, and would violate the cardinal principle of the doctrine of election.

The cases cited in the opinion do not sustain the conclusion of the court, because in all of them there was a substantial benefit received by the electing donee. There was something like compensation given for that which was taken and devised or bequeathed to another. In Syme v. Badger the donee was given, not only a specific fund for the payment of the debt due her, but also a large pecuniary or "bond" legacy, and also the residue of the testator's estate. Every one of those cases proceed upon the assumption that the donee, who was held to have made an election, had received something from the testator which would not have been his or hers but for the bounty thus conferred.

The idea that the mere qualification of a person as executor or administrator with the will annexed estops him to claim against the instrument—that is, to accept and reject it at the same time—was founded upon the ancient provision of the common law by which the personal representative, after paying debts and legacies, was entitled to the surplus of the estate, and also had the right of retainer against other creditors whose debts were of equal dignity, and had other rights and privileges not necessary to be enumerated. All of these have been taken away, and the rule founded upon this reason of the common law has ceased to exist. This is in accordance with the maxim of the law. "Reason is the soul of the law, and, when the reason of any particular law ceases, so does the law itself." Broom, Legal Maxims, 8th ed. p. 159. The proposition that an executor is thus estopped by his proving the will and qualifying under it is distinctly repudiated by this court in Allen v. Allen, 121 N. C. 328, 28 S. E. 513, as the following language of the court in the opinion of Montgomery, J., will clearly show. Discussing the question as to whether proving the will and qualifying as executor estop or amount to an election, the court says: "This is an important question, and is raised in its naked simplicity for the first time in this state. Under the common law the answer to the question was ready enough, if not entirely satisfactory. By the act of qualification the executor became vested with the whole personal estate, and after the payment of debts and legacies was entitled to the surplus, unless it appeared on the face of the will that the testator did not intend for the executor to have it. Therefore, and under that system, it is manifest that the act of qualifying as executor and taking the oath of office to execute the provisions of the will was irrevocable on his part, and the executor had to proceed to execute the will in all its parts and in its entirety. But the reason of the common law is of no force now, for executors, after the debts and legacies are paid, are trustees of the residuum for the next of kin." This repudiates the ancient doctrine. What is said by Chief Justice Smith in Yorkly v. Stinson, 97 N. C., at page 240, 1 S. E. 454, in referring to Mendenhall v. Mendenhall and Syme v. Badger, must be taken and considered in connection with the peculiar facts of those cases, in which it appeared that the donees received a clear benefit. The point we are discussing was not involved in Yorkly v. Stinson.

and the language used in that case by the chief justice at page 239, 97 S. E., page 453, 1 S. E., shows plainly that he thought it necessary some benefit should be received in order to put the donee to an election. The very essence of the doctrine is that there should be inconsistent benefit. This is implied by the very word "election," and the party to choose may keep his own, which is given away by a will, unless an alternative benefit is presented, which one, if accepted by him, renders it inequitable and unconscionable that he should retain the other. As the doctrine is a creature of equity, it should not be allowed to work an injustice, and should not be applied to any case upon purely technical principles, and where the person whom it is proposed to bind by the election has received no real or substantial advantage by gift which would affect his conscience and preclude his right to disappoint the will of the donor. That is the case to be found in this record.

It all comes to this: That the widow did not forfeit her land so as to divest her title and take away the right of her executor to sell it, but, if she was put to an election at all,—which I think has been shown not to be the case,—she can still claim her own (and her executor succeeds to her right) by making compensation to the extent of the legacy received by her. The subject, in this aspect of it, is so exhaustively discussed, and the principle for which I contend is so conclusively vindicated, in 2 Underhill on Wills, § 729, as the only true and equitable one, and the one, too, which has been generally, if not universally, accepted, that I must add what is said by that text writer to the other authorities cited. If it is suggested that this view of the case was not presented in the court below nor in this court, I can only answer that the lower court held the plaintiff was not estopped, and, as the charge to the jury to that effect was correct, it can make no difference what reason for the ruling was in the mind of counsel or the court. We must presume, in the absence of a reason being assigned, that the decision was based upon the right one.

I conclude that neither the widow nor her executor was estopped to deny the title, nor was she put to an election; and, if she was, the case should have been decided upon the principle of compensation, and not upon that of forfeiture or estoppel. In no view of the case can the court, upon the ground of estoppel or election, deprive the widow or her executor, who represents her, of that which was rightfully hers, and give it to another, who will lose nothing to which he is justly entitled if the money and the land are both adjudged to have been hers at her 67 L. R. A.

death. In my judgment, it would be not only against sound law so to do, but against established principles of equity. The defendant would be merely receiving something for nothing. Believing as I do, and for the reasons stated, that the court committed no error in the trial of the case, and that it should be so declared, I must dissent from the opinion of the court.

Douglas, J.: I concur in the dissenting opinion.

(136 N. C. 517.)

The appointment of one as cashier at a railway station, with power to collect money, give receipts, sell tickets, take care of the money received, and forward it to the treasurer of the company, does not empower him to arrest persons whom he suspects of having stolen money which has come into his possession, so as to render the railroad company liable in case he causes the arrest of an innocent person.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Pitt County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for alleged wrongful arrest and imprisonment. Affirmed.

Statement by Walker, J.:

This is an action for malicious prosecution and false arrest and imprisonment. The plaintiff was accused and prosecuted by the agent of the defendant at Greenville of stealing money from its office at that place, of which the agent had charge. The testimony necessary to be stated was, in substance, as follows: The plaintiff is a young man, thirty years of age, a native of Pitt county, and now a resident of Goldsboro. On the day of his arrest, but prior thereto, he went to the depot of the defendant company in Greenville to take the train for Goldsboro via Kinston, and, finding the passenger depot closed, he went to the freight depot, inquired about his train, and was invited into the office by Atkinson, the agent of defendant. Plaintiff went behind the rail and sat by the stove. Three or four people came in, and then went out. Atkinson was counting money and putting it in a package. He got another man to count it, and he put it in an envelope, and then put it in a drawer, locked the drawer, and went to supper. Plaintiff went out behind him in about three minutes, leaving several white people and one colored man in the office. Defendant's train was late, and when it came the plaintiff boarded it and went to Kinston, where he missed connection with the Atlantic & North Carolina train, and was forced to spend the night at Kinston. During the night a call came from the depot at Greenville for the depot at Kinston by phone—agent at Greenville calling agent at Kinston—connection was made, and immediately after this the agent of defendant at Kinston went to the hotel, called for a policeman, and told him he had orders to arrest Daniel; and then, with the policeman, the agent went to his room at the hotel, and demanded admission; and on being admitted to the room the agent of defendant company directed his search, and also his arrest until the agent at Greenville could be communicated with; the agent at Kinston stating that the arrest was for larceny of money from the company in Greenville. No warrant was sworn out for the arrest, and all was done by agents of defendant company, and the policeman at their instance. The agent at Greenville came down town, saw the chief of police at Greenville, and asked him to go to the phone office with him. They went to the phone office, and the agent—Atkinson—called for the policeman in Kinston, and at his request the Greenville policeman did the talking. Atkinson was notified that, no warrant being at that time sworn out for plaintiff's arrest, the policeman declined to order his arrest; but afterwards the chief of police of Greenville, at Atkinson's request, called up the policeman at Kinston over the phone, and requested him to arrest plaintiff, which he did; being assisted by the defendant's agent at Kinston, as above stated. The arrest was made in plaintiff's room in the hotel late at night, after he had retired, and he was subjected to the most thorough search and also his room; Meacham, the defendant's agent at Kinston, and several policemen being present and taking part in the search. Plaintiff was taken through the hotel office, and down the public street to the guardhouse, where he was detained a half or three-quarters of an hour. No evidence of plaintiff's guilt being discovered, he was released, after a policeman had communicated with the agent at Greenville, and had been told to let him go. On Sunday morning, following the arrest and search, the agent at Greenville applied to the mayor of Greenville, who was local counsel for defendant company, for a warrant for the plaintiff, charging him with the larceny of defendant company's money from the possession of the agent. The warrant was issued, and plaintiff arrested under it on his return to Greenville next day. This was done after he had once been arrested and searched by direction of agent at Greenville, and, at his direction released. On application the case was removed for trial to another justice. At the trial, delay was caused by the failure of the agent to appear. He was afterwards seen coming out of the office of the local attorney of defendant company, and soon appeared at the trial. After hearing all the evidence, the justice dismissed the warrant, finding no probable cause. Atkinson, at whose instance and request plaintiff was arrested at Kinston, and afterwards in Greenville, was cashier in the defendant's office in the latter place. His duties were to collect money for freight, give receipts therefor, sell tickets to passengers, take care of the money received by him, and forward the same to the treasurer of the defendant company at Wilmington. Plaintiff testified that he did not take the money or voucher. Money to the amount of $132.45 and a railroad voucher for $37.50 were stolen from a cash drawer in the railroad office the night the plaintiff was there. At the close of the testimony for the plaintiff, the defendant moved to dismiss the action under the statute. The motion was granted, and judgment rendered accordingly. Plaintiff excepted and appealed.

In anything he did, if the agent did not act for any purpose of his own, but to discharge what he believed to be his duty to his principal, it matters not that he exceeded the powers conferred upon him by his principal, and that he did an act the principal was not authorized to do, so long as he acted in the line of his duty, or attempted to perform a duty pertaining to his employment, or which he believed pertained to that service,—the company is liable.

Walker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The foregoing statement of the testimony is sufficient to present the point upon which the case turns, namely, the authority of the agent of the defendant to cause the arrest to be made. We are not concerned so much with the manner in which the arrest of the plaintiff was made, as we are with the question whether the defendant, who was the principal of Atkinson and Meacham, is to be charged with liability, for their tortious acts. That their conduct towards the plaintiff was inexcusable, if not criminal, and justly provokes the resentment of every good and law-abiding citizen against them, may be freely admitted. The circumstances under which they pursued this man, without the warrant of the law, even to his bedchamber, and at the silent hour of midnight, arousing him from his peaceful slumbers, invading the sanctity and privacy of his room, which the law surrounded with its protection as much so as if it had been his home or his castle; subjecting him to such indignities as no self-respecting man could submit to, even under compulsion, without feeling that he had been humiliated, if not degraded by them; marching him through the office of the hotel, and down a public street, where any and all might see the infamy and disgrace which they had fastened upon him,—all these things, and more, they did, which made their offense against him, if the evidence be true, a very serious one; and to him they, and all who participated in causing his arrest, are responsible before the law, and they must reckon with him if he sees fit to call them to account. But we must not allow any feeling of indignation at the grievous wrongs inflicted upon the plaintiff (which cannot be too severely condemned, if, as we must assume, he is an innocent man) to withdraw our attention from those principles of that same law by which the defendant's rights are guarded. The excesses of Atkinson and Meacham do not establish the defendant's liability. That can be shown only by proof that the defendant authorized the acts to be done, or that after they were done it ratified them. An agent's authority to bind his principal cannot be shown by the agent's acts or declarations. Francis v. Edwards, 77 N. C. 271; Gilbert v. James, 86 N. C. 244; Taylor v. Hunt, 118 N. C. 168, 24 S. E. 359; Willis v. Atlantic & D. R. Co. 120 N. C. 512, 26 S. E. 784. The authority must first be shown, before the acts done or declarations made in pursuance of the authority can bind the principal, or impose any liability whatever upon him. It is not pretended in this case that there was any express authority, or that there was any ratification of the acts of the alleged agents. The plaintiff's sole contention is that what Atkinson did at Greenville, and Meacham at Kinston, was within the line of their duty and the scope of their employment, and therefore they had implied authority from the defendant to do what they did, upon the theory, we suppose, that every authority carries with it, or includes in it, as an incident, all the powers which are necessary, proper, or usual as means to effectuate the purposes for which it was conferred, and that consequently when an agency is created for a specified purpose, or in order to transact particular business, the agent's authority, by implication, embraces the appropriate means and power to accomplish the desired end. He has not only the authority which is expressly given, but such as is necessarily implied from the nature of the employment. Story, Agency, 9th ed. § 97. This is the general rule, and the doctrine of respondet superior is a familiar one. But in our opinion, it has no application to the facts of this case. If we should hold that it is so broad in its scope as to include a case like this one, it would lead to most dangerous consequences. For us to say that an agent can by his acts subject his principal to liability in damages to anyone injured by his said acts, done when he was not about his master's business, and had no express or implied authority to do them, but was merely seeking to avenge a supposed wrong already committed or to vindicate public justice, would be carrying the doctrine of respondet superior far beyond its acknowledged limits. A servant intrusted with his master's goods may do what is necessary to preserve and protect them, because his authority to do so is clearly implied by the nature of the service; but when the property has been taken from his custody or stolen, and the crime has already been committed, it cannot be said that a criminal prosecution is necessary for its preservation or protection. This may lead to the punishment of the thief or the trespasser, but it certainly will not restore the property, or tend in any degree to preserve or protect it. It is an act clearly without the scope of the agency, and cannot possibly be brought within the limits of the implied authority of the agent. It would seem that so plain a proposition should need neither argument nor authority to support it, but we are abundantly supplied with both in the cases upon the subject. It is not intended to assert that a principal cannot be held responsible for the wilful or malicious acts of the agent, when done within the scope of his authority, but that he is not liable for such acts, unless previously expressly authorized or subsequently ratified, when they are done outside of the course of the agent's employment and beyond the scope of his authority, as when the agent steps aside from the duties assigned to him by the principal to gratify some personal animosity, or to give vent to some private feeling of his own (M'Manus v. Crickett, 1 East, 106), or, as is forcibly stated by Lord Kenyon in the case cited, quoting in part from Lord Holt: "'No master is chargeable with the acts of his servant but when he acts in the execution of the authority given him.' Now, when a servant quits sight of the object for which he is employed, and, without having in view his master's orders, pursues that which his own malice suggests, he no longer acts in pursuance of the authority given him, and . . . his master will not be answerable for such act."

A very able and learned discussion of the question in this case will be found in Allen v. London & S. W. R. Co. L. R. 6 Q. B. 65, by Blackburn, J., one of the most eminent of the English judges of his time. The case was apparently well argued on both sides. The judges delivered separate opinions. We quote so much of the leading opinion by Justice Blackburn as will show the full result of the decision: "There is a marked distinction between an act done for the purpose of protecting the property by preventing a felony or of recovering it back, and an act done for the purpose of punishing the offender for that which has already been done. There is no implied authority in a person having the custody of property to take such steps as he thinks fit to punish a person who he supposes has done something with reference to the property which he has not done. The act of punishing the offender is not anything done with reference to the property. It is done merely for the purpose of vindicating justice. And in this respect there is no difference between a railway company, which is a corporation, and a private individual. If the law were that the defendants are responsible for the act of their booking clerk in giving the plaintiff into custody on an unfounded charge, every shopkeeper in London would be answerable for any act done by a shopman left in his shop who chose to accuse a person of having attempted to plunder the shop, every merchant would be responsible for a similar act of his clerk, and every gentleman for the act of his butler or coachman." The case of Allen v. London & S. W. R. Co. was cited with approval and reviewed at some length in Carter v. Howe Mach. Co. 51 Md. 290, 34 Am. Rep. 311 (opinion by Alvey, Ch. J.), and the doctrine thus summed up: "From these authorities it is quite clear that in a case like the present, where the corporation is sought to be held liable for the wrongful and malicious act of its agent or servant in putting the criminal law in operation against a party upon a charge of having fraudulently embezzled the money and goods of the company, in order to sustain the right to recover it should be made to appear that the agent was expressly authorized to act as he did by the corporation. The doing of such an act could not, in the nature of things, be in the exercise of the ordinary duties of the agent or servant intrusted with the custody of the company's money or goods; and, before the corporation can be made liable for such an act, it must be shown, either that there was express precedent authority for doing the act, or that the act has been ratified and adopted by the corporation." That case was cited and followed in several other decisions in the same court to the like effect. Tolchester Beach Improv. Co. v. Steinmeier, 72 Md. 316, 8 L. R. A. 846, 20 Atl. 188; Central R. Co. v. Brewer, 78 Md. 406, 27 L. R. A. 63, 28 Atl. 615; Kirk v. Garrett, 84 Md. 385, 35 Atl. 1089; Baltimore & Y. Turnp. Road v. Green, 86 Md. 161, 37 Atl. 642. The following cases presented the same question precisely as we now have under consideration, and were decided in the same way as those already cited: Stevens v. Midland Counties R. Co. 10 Exch. 351; Pressley v. Mobile & G. R. Co. 4 Woods, 569, 15 Fed. 199; Mali v. Lord, 39 N. Y. 381, 100 Am. Dec. 448; Springfield Engine & Threshing Co. v. Green, 25 Ill. App. 106; Croasdale v. Von Boyneburgyk, 206 Pa. 15, 55 Atl. 770; Hershey v. O'Neill, 36 Fed. 188. In Dally v. Young, 3 Ill. App. 39, the plaintiffs in error were sued for malicious prosecution by Young, in that Dally, a subagent of Lathrop, who was agent for the Remington Machine Company, had, at the instigation of Lathrop and the company, prosecuted him criminally for the embezzlement of the funds of the company, of which charge he was acquitted. There was no evidence that the prosecution had, previous to its institution, been expressly authorized or afterwards adopted or ratified by Lathrop or the company. The court thus referred to the principle governing the case: "It is true, Lathrop was the general agent of the company at Chicago, and that Dally was a subagent at Bloomington, and subject to his jurisdiction in all matters pertaining to the business of the company, but this circumstance of itself would not make him liable 67 L. R. A.

for a criminal prosecution commenced by Dally without his knowledge or consent. Where an agent institutes a malicious prosecution of his own head, and without the instigation or direction of his principal, the latter will not be liable for the same, unless he adopts and continues the same with knowledge of all the circumstances." And in Edwards v. London & N. W. R. Co. L. R. 5 C. P. 446, the court took the same view of the law upon facts substantially similar: "A servant of a railway company has no implied authority, as such, to give a person into custody on a charge of felony. It is the duty of anyone who sees a person committing a felony to give him into custody, and it cannot be assumed that Holmes was acting in this matter as the company's servant, and not in accordance with that general duty. If the defendants are held liable here, it will follow that every servant has authority to act in this way for his master, and to render him liable, should he arrest a man wrongfully. It is said that Holmes was in charge of the property which he believed was being stolen, and that from that fact it may be inferred that he had authority to act as he did; but the same would apply to a shopman in charge of a shop, or a servant in charge of a house, and yet it has never been suggested that, if such a servant gave a person in charge for felony, the master would be liable." See also Pollock, Torts, 6th ed. pp. 89, 90.

The principle we have stated as applicable to the facts in this record, and, as established by the authorities cited, has met with the approval of this court in cases closely resembling the one in hand, and in other cases where it was adopted by analogy. Quoting from Wood on Master & Servant, 546, the court, in Willis v. Atlantic & D. R. Co. 120 N. C. 512, 26 S. E. 785, says: "In the absence of express orders to do an act, in order to render the master liable the act must not only be one that pertains to the business, but must also be fairly within the scope of the authority conferred by the employment. . . . For illustration, a clerk to sell goods suspects that goods have been stolen, and causes an arrest to be made. The master is not liable for the imprisonment or for the assault, because the arrest was an act which the clerk had no authority to do for the master, either express or implied." In a case where the agent of the defendant company had slandered the plaintiff, the court stated the principle as follows: "In a vast majority of the cases the principle is recognized that in some way the company must authorize or approve the tortious act of its agent, and it would be unreasonable to hold the company liable on a bare presumption, in the absence of allegation or any proof of authority or ratification." Redditt v. Singer Mfg. Co. 124 N. C. 100, 32 S. E. 392. Where the defendants had placed a claim against the plaintiff in the hands of their attorney for collection, and the attorney caused the plaintiff to be arrested, the court held that the defendants were not liable to the plaintiff in an action for malicious prosecution and false arrest, as the act of their attorney was not within the general course and scope of his employment, and therefore he had no implied authority to do the act, and as the defendants had not expressly authorized the act to be done, or in any way ratified it. Moore v. Cohen, 128 N. C. 345, 38 S. E. 919. That case would seem to be decisive of this one, and it is fully sustained by the decision in Burnap v. Albert, Taney, 244, Fed. Cas. No. 2,170, in which Chief Justice Taney delivered the opinion. The cases cited in the brief of plaintiff's counsel may, we think, be distinguished from our case. The court was influenced in the decision of them by their peculiar facts, which do not exist in the case at bar. It is not necessary for us to review or comment upon them, except to say that the court thought there was in each of them some evidence tending to show authority from the company for the commission of the wrongful act.

It may then be gathered from the books as a general rule, which is clearly applicable to the facts of this case, that if the servant, instead of doing that which he is employed to do, does something else, which he is not employed to do at all, the master cannot be said to do it by his servant, and therefore is not responsible for what he does. It is not sufficient that the act showed that he did it with the intent to benefit or to serve the master. It must be something done in attempting to do what the master has employed the servant to do. Mitchell v. Crasweller, 13 C. B. 246; Limpus v. London General Omnibus Co. 32 L. J. Exch. N. S. 34. Nor does the question of liability depend on the quality of the act, but rather upon the other question,—whether it has been performed in the line of duty, and within the scope of the authority conferred by the master. The facts of this case do not bring it within the principle. There is no ground for saying that what was done by the agent was in the ordinary course of the business of the company, nor that it was for its benefit, except in so far as it is for the benefit of all the citizens of the state that a criminal should be prosecuted, convicted, and punished. If the agent acted from a sense of the duty which rests on every one to give in charge a person who he thinks has committed a felony, his conduct, while commendable, would in no way be connected with the defendant so as to fasten liability upon it. Edwards v. London & N. W. R. Co. L. R. 5 C. P. 448. In Croasdale v. Von Boyneburgk, 206 Pa. 15, 55 Atl. 770, the court says: "The purpose of a criminal prosecution is to punish the offender for violating the laws of the commonwealth, and not to enforce the payment of money, nor, as in civil proceedings, to restore to the owner the property of which he has been defrauded. The criminal process of the court should not be invoked for any such purpose. While the appellant, like any other person, could have instituted the prosecution against Stotsenberg, it was clearly not his duty as managing owner to do so." The court, in Pressley v. Mobile & G. R. Co. 4 Woods, 569, 15 Fed. 199, states the principle with equal emphasis: "The question is, Can such action on his part be held to be within the scope of his agency, and in the course of his employment? There may be, and the books recognize, some difficulty in determining what acts of an agent or employee are properly within the range and course of his employment; but to say that to put the criminal law in operation against a party on a charge of larceny of the property of the corporation is within the scope of his agency and in the course of his employment is a proposition which, in the light of the decided cases, cannot be maintained."

There can be no doubt that the plaintiff has been very ill-used and grievously wronged, as he was most improperly arrested, but unfortunately he has sued an innocent party, instead of suing those who were the real authors and perpetrators of the wrong done to him. We have assumed, of course, that they did the wrong to him, as we are required by an imperative rule, upon a motion to nonsuit or a demurrer: to evidence, to take as true, not only every fact which there is evidence tending to establish, but also to consider all such fair and reasonable inferences of fact as the jury, if trying the case, might properly have drawn from the evidence. It may be that those parties, if they had been sued, would have been able to show quite a different state of facts from the one with which we have now to deal, and therefore what we have said must be taken as based entirely upon the hypothesis that the facts are correctly given in the testimony introduced by the plaintiff.

Since this opinion was written, we have examined a case recently decided by the supreme court of Pennsylvania, in which we find that court reached the same conclusion we have in this case upon facts substantially similar, and supported its decision by cogent reasoning and by the citation of many and weighty authorities. Markley v. Snow, 207 Pa. 447, 64 L. R. A. 685, 56 Atl. 999.

Finding no error in the ruling of the court upon these facts, the judgment of nonsuit must stand.

T. E. VANN, Admr., etc., of Darius Edwards, Deceased,
v.

D. K. EDWARDS, Appt.

(135 N. C. 661.)

1. A parol gift of a note is not within the meaning of a constitutional provision requiring a man's written consent to make valid his wife's "conveyance" of her property, since the word "conveyance" has reference to the transfer of such property as must be transferred by written instruments.
2. The right to free alienation by a married woman of her property, except as expressly restricted, is conferred by a constitutional provision vesting in her a sole and separate estate in her property with power to devise and bequeath it, and, "with the written consent of her husband," convey it as if she were unmarried; so that the restriction must be limited to technical conveyances such as are required to be in writing.

3. A decision on appeal that the possession of a note by the maker raises a presumption of payment does not preclude the raising upon a subsequent appeal of the question as to the legal effect of the indorsement and transfer of the note by the payee.

4. The rights of the maker of a note, to whom it had been indorsed and delivered by the payee as a gift, are not affected by the fact that it is found among the effects of another person after the latter's death, and his administrator takes possession of and attempts to enforce it as part of the estate.

NOTE.—Is a parol gift a conveyance?

The general rule is that a parol gift is not a "conveyance." This term has a technical meaning, and from its origin has been construed and understood to apply to transfers in writing of real property. Only two cases have been found which seem to be exceptions to the general rule, and in one of them the effect of this construction does not seem to have been discussed.

So, in VANN v. EDWARDS the word "convey" was held to be restricted in its operation to such property as was by law required to be transferred by a written instrument or conveyance. This was under N. C. Const. art. 10, § 8, providing that the real and personal property of any female in this state, acquired before marriage, and all property, real and personal, to which she may after marriage become in any manner entitled, shall be and remain the sole and separate estate and property of such female, and shall not be liable for any debts, liabilities, and engagements of her husband, and may be devised and bequeathed, and, with the written consent of her husband, conveyed, by her as if she were unmarried. In this case the wife, without the assent of her husband, made a gift of a note payable to her.

So, "fraudulent conveyance" was held not to apply to a transfer of personalty by a son to his father in contemplation of bankruptcy, under the bankrupt act of Congress, April 4, 1800, providing that from, etc., if any merchant shall, with intent unlawfully to delay or defraud his creditors, secretly convey his goods out of his house, or conceal them, to prevent their being taken on execution, or make, or cause to be made, any fraudulent conveyance of his lands or chattels, every such person shall be deemed and adjudged a bankrupt. Livermore v. Bagley, 3 Mass. 487. This was an action of trover by an assignee in bankruptcy against an execution creditor, who had taken the property from the father. In this case the son made a bill of parcels, without seal, of rigging and boats, and the articles were transferred to his father. No money was paid or credit given. The father had previously told the son that, if he would make a bill of them, "he would take care of them." It was held that the transfer was not a conveyance of chattels in the technical sense, or according to the legal construction of the clause cited from the statute. The court said: "Whatever may be the loose and popular sense, or possible applications, of the term 'conveyance,' the legislature are not understood to speak in an indeterminate manner,—especially if that construction would violate any general principle of jurisprudence. For, in making a statute, the legislature are understood to refer themselves to existing customs and rules: or, in other words, when using technical terms, to employ them in a precise and technical sense. The same term 'conveyance' is used in speaking of the transfer of lands and of chattels; and different meanings must be given to the same word to apply it to the transaction in question.

... It may be said rather to be taken as a settled maxim, in the construction of the English bankrupt laws, than to have been directly decided, that colorable sales and transfers of the notes, goods, and personal property of a bankrupt, although void as against the creditors of the bankrupt, do not amount to an act of bankruptcy, unless executed by a fraudulent deed or conveyance."

Applying the same rule, it was held that the statute of frauds in regard to a conveyance did not extend to conveyances of personalty, but of real property only. Sewall v. Glidden, 1 Ala. 52. In this case a deed of slaves was made, which was void because not acknowledged or proved as required by the Alabama statutes. It was held, however, that the chattels passed by a parol gift, and that such gift was not void, under 27 Eliz. chap. 4, providing that all conveyances, etc., of lands, made with intent to defraud or deceive such persons, etc., as shall purchase such lands for money or other good consideration, shall be utterly void.

On the other hand, in Lippman v. State, 104 Ala. 61, 16 So. 130, a shipment of mortgaged chattels to the consignee, "to do as he pleased with it," was held to be a violation of Ala. Crim. Code, § 3836, providing that any person who sells or conveys personal property upon which

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. L. L. Smith for appellant.

Messrs. Winborne & Lawrence, for appellee:

The indorsement by the wife without the knowledge and written consent of her husband passed no title to defendant.

Walton v. Bristol, 125 N. C. 419, 34 S. E. 544.

The bond, at the death of the wife, became the property of the husband, plaintiff's intestate, and he was the proper party to sue for it.

Wooten v. Wooten, 123 N. C. 219, 31 S. E. 491.

Courts only overrule adjudicated cases, where errors clearly appear.

Hudson v. Jordan, 110 N. C. 250, 14 S. E. 741; Mullen v. Norfolk & N. C. Canal Co. 115 N. C. 15, 20 S. E. 167; Bradsher v. Cheek, 112 N. C. 838, 17 S. E. 533; Thomas v. Fulford, 117 N. C. 693, 23 S. E. 635.

he has given a written mortgage, lien, or deed of trust, and which is then unsatisfied, is guilty of a misdemeanor.

In the above case the court, referring to the case of Johnson v. State, 69 Ala. 593, said: "Adhering to this exposition of the statute, there was a conveyance or transfer of the type-writers, offending its letter and spirit. A consignment of goods, intrusting them to a common carrier for delivery to a person named in the bill of lading or receipt given by the carrier, the bill of lading or receipt not expressing otherwise, prima facie vests the title to the goods in him to whom they are deliverable."

The case in which this construction was previously made was Johnson v. State, 69 Ala. 593, which was a prosecution for selling personal property covered by a mortgage, where the defendant had swapped a mule colt for a horse. The court, in defining the word "convey" as set out in Ala. Code, § 4354, said: "The word 'convey,' when applied to a disposition of property, has the signification of transfer; and means the passing of title and dominion from one person to another. It is in this, its largest sense, it is employed in this statute, intended to prohibit the mortgagor, or maker of a lien, or grantor in a deed of trust, from disposing of the property, so that the security of the mortgage or lien, or deed of trust, would be endangered or embarrassed. The danger or embarrassment would result, not only from a sale, but from an exchange, a gift, or any other transfer, by which a title, not in subordination to the mortgage, lien, or deed of trust, was created, or by which the possession was changed."

Some reason may be found for construing "convey" as applicable to personal property, for the reason that otherwise this act would be without any force, as it was only intended to apply to chattel mortgages, but it might be construed to mean a conveyance in writing under seal. At all events, the intention of the legis-

Mr. George Cowper also for appellee.

Walker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to recover the amount of two notes, one for the sum of $450, and the other for the sum of $500. We are concerned only with the latter note, as the other is not in controversy. The note for $500 was executed by the defendant to his mother, Sarah F. Edwards, on the 8th day of June, 1888, and was payable eight years after its date, with 6 per cent interest. The defendant, having admitted the execution of the note, avers that it was transferred, indorsed, and given to him by his mother, and he also avers that, if the transfer from his mother was void, he acquired title to the note by gift from his father. At the time the note was executed, and also at the time it was alleged to have been transferred to the defendant by his mother, Darius Edwards, the husband of Sarah F. Edwards, was living, and did not assent to the transfer, and the same was made, if at all, without his knowledge, and with the belief, on the part of Mrs. Edwards and the lature in this case was that the word "convey" was alone applicable to personalty.

And in Luebbe's Estate, 179 Pa. 447, 36 Atl. 322, the word "conveyance" was held to apply to personal as well as real estate. In this case a gift of a note under seal was made by the testatrix to a charitable corporation within thirty days of her death. This was held void, under Pa. act April 26, 1855, providing that no estate, real or personal, shall hereafter be bequeathed, devised, or conveyed within thirty days of the testator's death. The court said: "It is unnecessary to inquire to what extent—if at all—the ruling of the court below may be in conflict with McGlade's Appeal, 99 Pa. 338. That case has been practically overruled by subsequent decisions construing the act of 1855." It may be said that this was not a parol gift, being a note under seal, but, as it overruled McGlade's Appeal, 99 Pa. 338, it is here inserted.

In McGlade's Appeal, 99 Pa. 338, a testatrix gave a letter of attorney to transfer a loan with the certificates to a third party, with instructions to sell the loan and pay the amount of her charitable legacies from the proceeds, and gave the balance to B. to use as he saw fit. It was held that the donee did not hold by virtue of a bequest, devise, or conveyance, but by virtue of a gift fully executed in the donor's lifetime, and was not within the act of 1855, supra.

Blackstone (Com. vol. 2, p. 309), speaking of deeds, says: "I shall only examine the particulars of those which, from long practice and experience of their efficacy, are generally used in the alienation of real estate, for it would be tedious, nay infinite, to descant upon all the several instruments made use of in personal concerns, but which fall under our general definition of a deed; that is, a writing sealed and delivered. The former, being principally such as serve to convey the property of lands and defendant, that he would not assent to the transfer. There was evidence in the case tending to prove that after Mrs. Edwards's death the note passed into the possession of her husband, who survived her, and remained in his possession until his death. There was evidence, on the contrary, which tended to prove that, while the note was in the possession of Darius Edwards after the death of his wife, it was delivered by him to the defendant, who kept it until the death of his father, and had possession of it until this suit was brought, when it was handed by the defendant's wife to one of the defendant's attorneys. When the case was here before, it was held that the defendant's possession of the note after the death of his father, in whose possession it had been subsequent to the death of his wife, who was the original owner and holder of the note, would, if established, raise a presumption that such possession was lawful, and that he is the owner of the note; and a new trial was granted to the defendant because of an erroneous ruling in the court below upon this point. At the second trial an issue was submitted to the jury as to the ownership of the note, the plaintiff asserting title to it as the administrator of Darius Edwards. The jury found against the defendant, and judgment having been rendered upon the verdict for the plaintiff, the defendant excepted and appealed. The only exceptions which we need notice were taken to the charge of the court, and to an instruction of the court given to the jury at the plaintiff's request, which is as follows: "If you find from the evidence that the defendant acquired possession of the $500 note by delivery from his mother, without the knowledge or consent of his father, Darius Edwards, then no title to the note would pass to the defendant thereby; and, if that were his only claim to the note, you should answer the first issue 'Yes.'" The court also charged the jury among other instructions, to which no exception was taken, as follows: "If the note was executed by the defendant to his mother, and by her indorsed and transferred to the defendant without her husband's knowledge or consent, and that was his only claim, that would avail the defendant nothing, and the note would have passed to the husband as his property upon tenements from man to man, are commonly denominated conveyances; which are either conveyances at common law, or such as receive their force and efficacy by virtue of the statute of uses."

the death of his wife, subject to the payment of her debts." Defendant excepted. These two exceptions are, in substance, the same, and may be considered together, and they involve the question whether a married woman can make a valid transfer to another of a note belonging to her, without the written consent of her husband.

The Constitution (art. 10, § 6) provides as follows: "The real and personal property of any female in this state, acquired before marriage, and all property, real and personal, to which she may, after marriage, become in any manner entitled, shall be and remain the sole and separate estate and property of such female, and shall not be liable for any debts, obligations, or engagements of her husband, and may be devised and bequeathed, and, with the written assent of her husband, conveyed by her as if she were unmarried." It is provided by the Code (§ 1826) that "no woman during her coverture shall be capable of making any contract to affect her real or personal estate, except for her necessary personal expenses, or for the support of the family, or such as may be necessary in order to pay her debts existing before marriage, without the written consent of her husband, unless she be a free trader, as hereinafter allowed." Our answer to the question we have stated must be in the affirmative. The decision of the case turns upon the construction of § 6 of article 10 of the Constitution, for if, by that section, a married woman is vested with the power of disposing of her personal property, such as the note upon which the suit was brought, this power cannot be divested or taken from her by any act of the legislature, and § 1826 of the Code can have no operation in such a case, assuming it to be fully sufficient in its scope to embrace her executed contracts of sale or gifts. It is provided by the Constitution, which is the higher, and indeed, the supreme, law, to which all conflicting legislation must yield, that the property of every female, whether acquired before or after her marriage, shall be and remain her sole and separate estate, and shall not be liable for any of the debts, obligations, or engagements of her husband. If this were all of the section, we would have to conclude that, as a married woman is thus vested with full and complete ownership of things, real and personal, acquired by her before or after her marriage, having both the legal and equitable title, she must necessarily have also acquired every right which inheres in, or is incidental to, such ownership, and the most important and most valuable among them is the right of alienation, or what is commonly known in the law as the jus dispo- endi. While this may not accord with the view taken of that section in one or two of the cases, it will be found upon examination that they did not involve a decision of the question of a married woman's right to dispose of her personal property, but of her power to contract so as to bind her property generally, and it was held that, notwithstanding the provision of § 6, art. 10, of the Constitution, the disability of coverture remains as it was at common law, and prevents her from making a valid executory contract.

It will be observed that it is ordained by the Constitution that all that a married woman has or acquires in things real and personal shall be her sole and separate estate and property. The word "property" is of very broad signification. It is defined as: "Rightful dominion over external objects; ownership; the unrestricted and exclusive right to a thing; the right to dispose of the substance of a thing in every legal way, to possess it, to use it, and to exclude everyone else from interfering with it. . . . Property is the highest right a man can have to anything, being used for that right which one has to lands or tenements, goods or chattels, which no way depends on another man's courtesy. . . . A right imparting to the owner a power of indefinite user, capable of being transmitted to universal successors by way of descent, and imparting to the owner the power of disposition. . . . The right of property is that sole and despotic dominion which one man claims and exercises over the external things of the world, in total exclusion of the right of any other individual in the universe. It consists in the free use, enjoyment, and disposal of all a person's acquisitions, without any control or diminution, save only by the laws of the land." Black, Law Dict. pp. 953, 954. The word "estate," which is also used in the Constitution, denotes the interest which anyone has in lands, or in any other subject of property. An estate in lands, tenements, and hereditaments, says Blackstone, signifies such interest as the tenant has therein. 2 Bl. Com. 103. It also signifies the condition or circumstance in which the owner stands with regard to his property. Both words are also used to describe the thing, real or personal, in which one has an estate or the subject-matter of ownership, or over which the right of property is exercised; and in this sense, perhaps, they were intended to be used in the Constitution. But the very word "property" implies the exclusive right of possessing, enjoying, and disposing of a thing, and, when used subjunctively, it means that with respect to which this right exists, or that which is one's own. So it must be admitted that, if there were no words in § 6 of article 10 of the Constitution to limit the scope of that part of the section which we have just quoted, a married woman would have the same dominion over her separate estate and property as if she were a feme sole. But there are such words of limitation, and how and to what extent they restrict the right of alienation is the difficult and delicate question presented for solution. After exempting her property from any debt, liability, or obligation of her husband, it is provided that she may devise and bequeath the same. This power is absolute. She may will her property with the same freedom as if she were unmarried or sui juris. And by the last provision of the act she may, with the written assent of her husband, "convey" her property as if she were a feme sole. A correct analysis of this section brings us to this conclusion: that a married woman may dispose of her property in any way she may see fit to do so, except that, when she conveys it, the written assent of her husband is essential to the validity of her conveyance. But what is meant by the word "convey?" The act by which she passes to another the title to her property must in law be a conveyance. Discussing a kindred subject in Kelly v. Fleming, 113 N. C. at page 138, 18 S. E. at page 81, this court, by Mr. Justice MacRae, says: "The word 'convey,' in its broadest significance, might embrace any transmission of possession; but we are restrained to its legal meaning, which, ordinarily speaking, is the transfer of property from one person to another by the means of a written instrument and other formalities. Rapalje & L. Law Dict.: Convey; Conveyance. According to Webster, a conveyance is 'an instrument in writing by which property or the title to property is conveyed or transmitted from one person to another.' The meaning of this word being well understood at common law, it must be understood in the same sense when used in a statute. Smithdeal v. Wilkerson, 100 N. C. 52, 6 S. E. 71." A conveyance is "an instrument in writing under seal (anciently termed an 'assurance'), by which some estate or interest in lands is transferred from one person to another; such as a deed, mortgage, etc." Black, Law Dict. p. 273, citing 2 Bl. Com. In Pickett v. Buckner, 45 Miss. 245, the court, in construing the dower act of that state, says: "In employing the term in the dower act . . . 'conveyance,' 'conveyed,' we suppose that the legislature meant the sense in which the word is ordinarily used in our jurisprudence. It is a technical or quasi-technical word, of precise and definite import. As defined by Bouvier (1 Law Dict. 346), 'Conveyance is the transfer of the title to land by one person to another.' The instrument itself is called a conveyance.'" In Nickell v. Tomlinson, 27 W. Va. 720, the word "convey" is thus defined: "But the language now used is probably just as open to criticism as the language used a hundred years ago. The language now used is: 'Shall operate to convey from the wife her right of dower in the real estate embraced in the deed.' Now 'convey' means transfer the title of land from one person or class of persons to another. See 1 Bouvier, Law Dict. p. 399. Clearly, an inchoate dower interest is no title to land. It is no estate, present or future, vested or contingent, and the term 'convey' can be properly used only when the transfer of some 'estate in land' is spoken of." Again, the court says: "Conveyance is a transfer of an estate in land from one person to another." In Thompson v. Hart, 58 App. Div. at page 449, 69 N. Y. Supp. 229, the court, in construing the word "convey" with reference to its sufficiency as a legal term to pass personal property, said: "Manifestly the word 'convey' is inappropriate to the transfer of personal estate."

In Klein v. McNamara, 54 Miss. 105, the word "conveyance" is said to be a general word, and "comprehends the several modes of passing title to real estate. It is defined to be 'the transfer of the title of land from one person, or class of persons, to another.'" Lambert v. Smith, 9 Or. 193; Edelman v. Yeakel, 27 Pa. 27. Defining the word in Jenckes v. Probate Court, 2 R. I. 255, the court says: "The term 'convey' is a technical term, long known or used in deeds conveying real estate." We believe all the lexicographers generally adopt, as the definition of the word "convey," the transfer of the title to realty, and of the word "conveyance" the instrument by which this is done. Anderson, Law Dict. p. 254; 1 Bouvier, Law Dict. (1897) p. 434; 1 Rapalje & L. Law Dict. 289; Abbott, Law Dict. 284. Blackstone emphasizes the distinction between instruments used in the alienation of "real estate" and those by which personal property and effects are transferred. "The former," he says, "being principally such as serve to convey the property of lands and tenements from man to man, are commonly denominated conveyances; which are either conveyances at common law, or such as receive their force and efficacy by virtue of the statute of uses." 2 Bl. Com. 309. And, speaking again of conveyances, he says: "The legal evidences of this translation of property are called common assurances of the Kingdom, whereby every man's estate is assured to him, and all controversies, doubts, and difficulties are either prevented or removed." 2 Bl. Com. 294, 295. Referring to this definition of Blackstone, the court, in McCabe v. Hunter, 7 Mo. 357, says: "It has been argued that there is nothing in our statute concerning conveyances which requires an instrument conveying lands to be sealed. The statute uses the word 'conveyance' to designate all instruments conveying lands from one to another. Blackstone says deeds which serve to convey the property of lands and tenements from man to man are commonly denominated conveyances. 2 Bl. Com. 309. We have seen that in England the word 'conveyance' carries with it the idea of a sealed instrument. This word is used by our legislature in the sense in which it is understood in England." But if the framers of the Constitution used the word "convey" in its widest sense, as meaning transfer of property or the title to property from one person to another by means of a written instrument and other formalities, and its substantive "conveyance" as signifying the instrument itself by which the transfer is effected (Prouty v. Clark, 73 Iowa, 55, 34 N. W. 614), we do not think it can affect the result in this case. The word "convey" must still be restricted in its operation to such property as is by law required to be transferred by a written instrument. The words "convey and devise" are technical terms relating to the disposition of interests in real property. It would not be technically or legally correct to speak of conveying personal property by a verbal sale of it, or even by a writing, any more than it would be to speak of devising it by last will and testament; not that a draftsman may not use a technical word to express his meaning without intending that it shall be construed in its strictly technical sense, but, in the absence of anything to clearly indicate that the word was not intended to have its commonly accepted meaning in the law, but was used in some other and different sense, we must adopt the legal definition of the word, because, in the first place, it must be presumed to have been used in that sense, and, in the second, because it would be unsafe to reject that well-understood meaning for another, unless the latter had been most clearly manifested; and this principle should especially apply to constitutions and statutes, which are generally written by those learned in the law, and are intended to declare what the law shall be. It must be assumed in such a case that the state of the law and the meaning of its technical terms at the time of the enactment was known, for we are required, in construing written laws, especially those changing the common law, to consider the old law, and, in comparing it with the new so as to gather the intent, words of well-known legal signification must have the meaning thus attached to them by the law; and especially must they be understood in the sense which they have acquired by actual judicial interpretation, unless, by such construction, we defeat the intention which clearly and distinctly appears from some other part of the enactment or from its context. It may be added that the framer of § 6, art. 10, of the Constitution, must have been familiar with the meaning of technical or legal terms, for he made the proper distinction between the disposition of realty and the disposition of personalty by will, when he used the words "devise" and "bequeath." It may fairly be assumed that he knew also that a writing was not essential to the transfer of personalty, and that when he used the word "convey" he intended it should have its technical meaning.

There is another reason why the restriction upon the wife's right of alienation should be confined to that kind of property which can be transferred only by a written instrument. Section 6 of article 10 of the Constitution provides that a married woman's separate estate and property may be conveyed by her, with the written assent of her husband, as if she were unmarried. Property in things personal, generally speaking, may pass from one person to another by mere delivery or by word of mouth. An unwritten sale or gift is quite sufficient for that purpose. This being so, can it be supposed to have been intended by that section to require that, in every case where the wife makes a sale or gift of her personal property by delivery or by word of mouth, however small or however inconsiderable in value the article of property may be, the husband must give his written assent thereto? Or, to put the case more strongly, is it intended by that section that, if the wife wishes to sell or give to another her personal estate or any part of it, however small that part, she cannot do so by delivery or by word of mouth,—a usual and immemorial method of transferring such property,—but she must, in every instance, reduce the transfer to writing, in order that her husband may assent in writing to it, and that without this kind of written assent a valid transfer cannot be made? Either one or the other of the two alternatives must be adopted, unless the restriction upon her right to convey her separate estate and property is held to apply only to her realty, or to property the title to which can pass only by a written instrument. It further appears from an examination of § 6, art. 10, of the Constitution, that it was not intended to vest in the wife merely the naked title, or power to hold in her own name this "sole and separate estate and property," without any of the usual incidents of ownership, and without the right of direct control or dominion over it; but it was manifestly the purpose that, as it was vested in her own right, it should become her sole and separate property as if she were a single female, subject only to the limitations of that section. It is an enabling provision of the law, and should be construed in the spirit which prompted its enactment, and, as it authorized the wife to take and hold property to her sole and separate use, without the interposition of a trustee, and has thus made her capable of holding it by herself and for herself, independently of her husband, she should be adjudged to have the capacity of disposing of it, except in so far as she may be expressly or impliedly restrained. That this was the spirit and purpose of the lawmakers is evidenced by the fact that she is given the absolute right to dispose of her estate by will, which is certainly something more than the naked right to own and possess it, and then she may also convey it. It is therefore perfectly clear that it was intended she should have the right of disposition, in one form absolutely, and in another under certain restrictions. As she is vested with her property, including the incidental right of disposing of it inter vivos, subject only to one condition, it must follow that in all other respects her right of alienation is left free and unfettered. The expression of the one limitation upon this right is the exclusion of all others. When the law says that in one case she shall be under the restraint of her husband, it means, necessarily, that in all other cases she shall be free. We may well ask, Why should a wife be permitted to devise and bequeath her property, real and personal, and be allowed to convey only her real estate? If the use of the word "convey" restricts the right of alienation to the real estate, as we have shown that it does, then as to the personal property she is left without the right of disposition, unless it was the intention to confer upon her a general power to dispose of her property, with the proviso that real estate should not be conveyed without the assent of her husband. There is no valid or sufficient reason for making any distinction between the right to dispose of real estate, and the right to dispose of personal property, which would deprive her of the latter right. We think the true meaning of § 6, art. 10, is that a married woman may dispose of her property without the assent of her husband, except in those cases where a written instrument or conveyance is required for that purpose. This construction of the Constitution seems to be strongly favored by the court in Withers v. Sparrow, 66 N. C. 138. Referring to Knox v. Jordan, 58 N. C. (5 Jones, Eq.) 175, Boyden, J., for the court, says: "But the court in that case seemed unwilling to sanction the doctrine that, as to the separate estate of the wife, she was to be regarded as a feme sole in all respects, as held in England and also in the state of New York. But however proper this unwillingness of the court to recognize that doctrine might have been at the time of that decision, there can be no reason, since the adoption of our present Constitution, why the English and New York doctrine should not now be followed in our state." We understand the court to mean that a married woman has under the Constitution the right to dispose of her separate estate in any manner, save in so far as she may be restricted to any particular method of alienation pointed out in that instrument, and not that she may contract generally, so as to subject her separate estate at law to the payment of her debts, as would be the case if she were sui juris. We are not at all disposed to change or impair the doctrine so frequently announced by this court with reference to the capacity of a married woman to contract. That question is not now directly before us. Nor do we think it necessary to disturb the principles established in Frazier v. Brownlow, 38 N. C. (3 Ired. Eq.) 237, 42 Am. Dec. 165; Harris v. Harris, 42 N. C. (7 Ired. Eq.) 111, 53 Am. Dec. 393; Knox v. Jordan, 58 N. C. (5 Jones, Eq.) 175; and more recently in Pippen v. Wesson, 74 N. C. 438; Dougherty v. Sprinkle, 88 N. C. 300; Flaum v. Wallace, 103 N. C. 296, 9 S. E. 567; and Farthing v. Shields, 106 N. C. 289, 10 S. E. 998; and still more recently in Harvey v. Johnson, 133 N. C. 352, 45 S. E. 644.

Our decision of the question involved in this case does not conflict with what this court has so often said, and which is thus clearly stated by Ruffin, J.: "At law a feme covert is incapable of making a contract of any sort, and any attempt of hers to do so is not simply voidable, but absolutely void. If, however, she be possessed of separate property, a court of equity will so far recognize her agreement as to make it a charge thereon. But even in that case, and in that court, her contract has no force whatever as a personal obligation or undertaking on her part. . . . Nor was there any change wrought in this particular by the alterations made in our court system under the Constitution of 1868, or by the adoption of the statute known as the married woman's act. It was in reference to these very alterations, and the effect of the statute, that the court declared in Pippen v. Wesson, 74 N. C. 437, and Huntley v. Whitner, 77 N. C. 392, that no deviation from the common law had been produced thereby as respects either the power of a feme covert to contract, the nature of her contract, or the remedy to enforce it; that as a contract merely her promise is still as void as it ever was, with no power in any court to proceed to judgment against her in personam." Dougherty v. Sprinkle, 88 N. C. 304; Flaum v. Wallace, 103 N. C. 296. 9 S. E. 567. The Constitution does not remove the incapacity which prevents a married woman from contracting debts or pecuniary obligations. So far as her power to thus contract is concerned, the disability of coverture remains as it was at common law, except where changes have been made by statute. In this connection the language of the court in Pippen v. Wesson, 74 N. C. at page 445, is appropriate: "We conceive that while it would be beyond the power of the legislature to destroy or alter the essential qualities of the separate estate given by the Constitution, as by giving the personal property to the husband, making the property liable for his debts, or by destroying the wife's power of disposition, yet it is within its power to regulate the manner in which the separate estate shall be held, to prescribe what contracts and what dispositions of their estates, other than those specifically authorized by the Constitution, married women may make, and by what forms and ceremonies all their contracts shall be made and authenticated, and their free consent thereto ascertained. The legislature may abolish all the incapacities of married women, and give them full power to contract as femes sole. The question is, Has it done so?"

In what respect the method of charging in equity a married woman's separate estate with liability for her agreements may be affected, if at all, by this decision, is not now presented for our consideration. We simply hold that, without the assent of her husband, she may dispose of any of her property, unless the law requires the disposition of it to be evidenced by a conveyance or a writing.

It is argued that the case of Walton v. Bristol, 125 N. C. 419, 34 S. E. 544, is at variance with the conclusion we have reached, but we do not think so. The conflict, if there is any, is more apparent than real. The note in that case, which belonged to the wife, was indorsed by her alone, and deposited by her with the Piedmont Bank as collateral security for her husband's indebtedness to that bank. His indebtedness having increased to the amount of $3,000, an arrangement was made by which the husband borrowed to the amount of his indebtedness from the Wilmington Bank, and gave his note to that bank for the loan, and, with the proceeds realized on his note to the Wilmington Bank, he paid the debt due the Piedmont Bank, which bank had indorsed his note to the Wilmington Bank, for his accommodation, upon an agreement with him that the note for $1,250 should be deposited with it as collateral security or indemnity for its indorsement, and the husband so notified the Wilmington Bank, by letter, both before and after that bank loaned him the $3,000. The wife did not assent to, and, so far as appears in the case, had no knowledge of, this new arrangement. Upon these facts it is clear, we think, that, as the wife could only be liable as surety for her husband by reason of the indorsement and deposit of her note at the bank (Purvis v. Carstaphan, 73 N. C. 575; Southern Loan & T. Co. v. Benbow, 135 N. C. 303, 47 S. E. 435; Fleming v. Barden, 126 N. C. 450, 53 L. R. A. 316, 78 Am. St. Rep. 671, 36 S. E. 17. 127 N. C. 214, 53 L. R. A. 326, 37 S. E. 219), the change in the arrangement fully discharged her, whether it be regarded as an extension of the time of payment to her husband as a novation of the debt, or as a payment of the debt and an extinction of her liability, the last being the correct view as we think. If the wife did not assent to the agreement by which her note was to be retained by the Piedmont Bank as indemnity against any loss resulting from its indorsement of her husband's note to the Wilmington Bank, and could not, in any view of the matter, be bound thereby, why inquire whether her indorsement of the note was valid and binding upon her? The indorsement had been virtually canceled and nullified by the payment of the note due the Piedmont Bank, whether it was originally valid or not, and the court so treated it, for it says "the wife never assented to the new arrangement," and was therefore not bound. The question as to the validity of her indorsement was not in the case, but, if it was, we would not be inclined to follow the decision, in so far as it conflicts with the conclusion which we have reached in this case. The question was not presented in Rawls v. White, 127 N. C. 20, 37 S. E. 68, which is also cited for the plaintiff.

But the plaintiff's counsel, in his well-prepared brief, insists that the point was decided in this case when it was here on a former appeal (128 N. C. 425, 39 S. E. 66), and also on the rehearing of that appeal (130 N. C. 70, 40 S. E. 853), and that it is res judicata, and has become the law of the case, whether the decision was right or wrong. We may admit the general proposition that the decision of a court of final resort upon a given state of facts becomes the law of the case upon a second trial and another appeal in regard to those facts, if they are substantially the same as those upon which the former decision was made, and yet, with that principle conceded, we do not think the question we are now considering has been finally adjudicated, as between the parties to this suit, so as to foreclose any further discussion of it and make any expression in either of the former opinions upon that question, whether correct or not, the law of the case. An examination of the record in the first appeal will show that the only question presented, and upon which the decision therein could have been made, was whether the defendant's possession of the note raised a presumption that he was the lawful holder of it, or, to speak more accurately, raised a presumption that the note had been paid. In passing upon this question, it could make no difference whether the note had been legally indorsed to defendant by his mother or not, for, if it had not been, he would still be entitled to the benefit of the presumption raised by the law from the fact of his possession of the note. When this court decided with him in regard to the presumption, it was not necessary to consider the other question as to the legal effect of the indorsement of his mother, even if it had been presented in a way to call for an adjudication of this court upon it. We have therefore concluded that the question as to the validity of the indorsement of the note by the defendant's mother to him is now open for our consideration.

The question as to the right of a married woman to dispose of her personal property without the written assent of her husband is directly and squarely presented in this case by the defendant's request for instructions and the charge of the court to which exception was taken; and it is the first time, as we think, that it has been so presented. Having held that the transfer of the note by his mother to the defendant was valid, it follows that the court erred in refusing to give the instruction requested by the defendant, and in giving the instruction to which he excepted, because, if the indorsement and delivery of the note to the defendant constituted a valid gift of it to him, the fact that the jury have found that he did not have possession of the note at the time of his father's death should not defeat his title to it acquired by the gift, as the defendant may be able to show that, even if his father had possession of the note at the time of his death, and there is therefore a presumption in favor of plaintiff, he is himself the real owner of it by virtue of the gift from his mother. This is a question for the jury to decide upon all the facts of the case and under proper instructions from the court, and, by holding that defendant acquired no title to the note by his mother's indorsement, the court deprived him of the use of that important fact in developing his defense. The error thus committed entitles the defendant to another trial.

New trial.

Montgomery, J., dissenting:

I still am of the opinion that the law on the subject of the right of a married woman to dispose of her separate estate, whether it consists of real or personal property, was properly decided in the case of Walton v. Bristol, 125 N. C. 419, 34 S. E. 544. The opinion in this case overrules that case. In Walton v. Bristol, supra, the court said: "The Constitution, as we have seen, so far as the wife's power to convey her separate estate is concerned, makes no difference between real property and personal property. If she undertakes to convey either species of property, the written assent of her husband must be had." Article 10, § 6, of the Constitution, is in these words: "The real and personal property of any female in this state, acquired before marriage, and all property, real and personal, to which she may, after marriage, become in any manner entitled, shall be and remain the sole and separate estate, and property of such female, and shall not be liable for any debts, obligations, or engagements of her husband, and may be devised and bequeathed, and, with the written assent of her husband, conveyed by her as if she were unmarried." It will be seen from reading that section of the Constitution that the words "real and personal property" are always associated, and that the copulative conjunction "and," leading the last clause, connects both real and personal property with the mode of conveying them. If inconveniences arise practically in the disposition of small articles of personal property by the wife, the written assent of the husband being required, the difficulties are created by the section of the Constitution above quoted, and this court cannot dispense with them. I can add nothing to what I said for the court in Walton v. Bristol, 125 N. C. 419, 34 S. E. 544.

CHARLOTTE ELECTRIC RAILWAY, LIGHT, & POWER COMPANY, Appt.

(136 N. C. 554.)

1. A statute making the injury or killing of cattle or other live stock by a railroad company prima facie evidence of negligence does not apply in case of the killing of a dog.
2. The engineer in charge of a moving locomotive is not bound either to keep as vigilant lookout for dogs on the track, or to exercise as great care in the management of his engine to prevent their injury, as in the case of cattle or live stock.
3. One in charge of a locomotive or motor car, seeing a dog near the track, is entitled to act upon the presumption that it will get out of the way in time to avoid danger, in the absence of anything to indicate that it is helpless or totally indifferent to its surroundings.
4. A street railroad company is not liable in damages for the killing of a dog by one of its cars in motion, unless the killing is done either wilfully, wantonly, or recklessly.
5. That the fender on the car which killed a dog was defective cannot be shown by evidence that witness had measured a fender on one of defendant's cars and found it to be too far from the ground, and that there were different kinds of fenders in use on different cars, without anything to show the condition of the fender on the car which did the injury.

(November 22, 1904.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Mecklenburg County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of his dog. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Burwell & Cansler, for appellant:

The evidence as to the fenders was inadmissible.

Grant v. Raleigh & G. R. Co. 108 N. C. 470, 13 S. E. 209; Raper v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 126 N. C. 563, 36 S. E. 115.

It is not the duty of the driver of a railway car or other vehicle to take any notice of the fact that a dog is upon, or crossing, the track in front of the on-moving vehicle, unless there is evidence, from its position, or conduct, which gives the driver notice that the dog is either absolutely oblivious of the approach of the danger, or is so situated as to be unable to extricate itself from it.

NOTE.—As to actions for injuries to dogs by railroads and street cars, see also cases in note to Graham v. Smith, 40 L. R. A. 503, and the later case in this series of Citizens' Rapid Transit Co. v. Dew, 40 L. R. A. 518, 67 L. R. A.

Jones v. Bond, 40 Fed. 281; St. Louis S. W. R. Co. v. Stanfield, 63 Ark. 643, 37 L. R. A. 659, 40 S. W. 126; Citizens' Rapid Transit Co. v. Dew, 100 Tenn. 317, 40 L. R. A. 518, 66 Am. St. Rep. 754, 45 S. W. 790; Detimers v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. 22 App. Div. 488, 48 N. Y. Supp. 23; Jemison v. Southwestern R. Co. 75 Ga. 444, 58 Am. Rep. 476; Wilson v. Wilmington & M. R. Co. 10 Rich. L. 52; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Scott (Tex. Civ. App.) 17 S. W. 1116; Strong v. Georgia R. & Electric Co. 118 Ga. 515, 45 S. E. 366; St. Louis, A. & T. R. Co. v. Hauks, 78 Tex. 300, 11 L. R. A. 384, 14 S. W. 691.

Defendant should not be held liable in damages for killing a dog, unless under such circumstances as to justify the conclusion that the killing was done either wilfully wantonly, or recklessly.

Dodson v. Mock, 20 N. C. 282 (4 Dev. & B. L. 146).

Mr. Thomas G. McMichael for appellee.

Montgomery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was commenced in a court of a justice of the peace for the recovery of $50 for the killing of the plaintiff's dog by the alleged negligent operation by the defendant of one of its street cars. There were no written pleadings in the case, but upon a reading of the evidence it would appear that the plaintiff on a trial in the superior court relied upon four alleged acts of negligence: First, excessive speed of the car; second, permitting high weeds to grow upon the sides of and near the track; third, the failure to stop the car in time to avoid the collision; and, fourth, failure to equip the car with a proper fender.

We have no case in our Reports where the injury to or the killing of a dog by a railroad or street car company is made the subject of a civil action for the recovery of damages by its owner. Our statute (§ 2326 of the Code) makes it prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of a railroad company, in an action for damages against the company, whenever it appears that any cattle or other live stock shall be killed by the engines or cars running upon the railroad. The statute does not give the right, in case of injury or killing of cattle or other live stock, to the owner thereof to bring an action for his loss of property. That right the owner had before. The statute made the killing prima facie evidence of negligence. The dog is not included, of course, in the category of cattle or live stock, but is a species or subject of property recognized as such by the law, and for an injury to which an action at law may be sustained. State

v. Latham, 35 N. C. (13 Ired. L.) 33. There would be no presumption of negligence, however, by the mere fact of killing or injury being shown. In numerous cases this court has laid down the law concerning the duties of engineers in charge of moving railroad locomotives in regard to cattle and live stock on and in near proximity to the railroad track and in front of the moving cars. In Wilson v. Norfolk & S. R. Co. 90 N. C. 69, the court said: "If the mule ran off the road quietly, and manifested by its acts no great alarm, but a disposition to get away from the road, or if at first it stood still, off the road, until the near approach of the train, then it suddenly ran back on the road a short distance ahead of the engine and was killed, the engineer being unable to stop the train, in such case there would not be negligence, and the defendant would not be liable. But, in another view, if the mule was greatly frightened at the whistle and the train,—was panic stricken; ran about wildly and recklessly in the immediate neighborhood of the road,—and would as likely, in its fright, run on as from it, and the engineer failed to slacken the speed of the train, and the mule suddenly dashed back on the road and was killed by the engine, this would be negligence, and the defendant would be liable for damages. It may be conceded that where cattle are quietly grazing, resting, or moving near the road,—not on it,—and manifesting no disposition to go on it, the speed of the train need not be checked; but the rule is different where the cow or mule is near the road, and runs on, then off, along, near to, and back upon it. In such a case reasonable diligence and care require that the engineer shall slacken the speed, keep the engine steadily and firmly under his control, and, if need be, stop it until the danger shall be out of the way." That case is cited and approved by this court in Snowden v. Norfolk Southern R. Co. 95 N. C. 93, and Ward v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 109 N. C. 358, 13 S. E. 926. And in Doster v. Charlotte Street R. Co. 117 N. C. 651, 34 L. R. A. 481, 23 S. E. 449, the court said: "Where a horse is being driven or is running uncontrolled along a highway parallel to a railway of any kind, though it give unmistakable evidence by its movements that it is alarmed at an approaching train or car, the engineer or motorman in charge is not negligent in failing to diminish the speed unless the animal is actually on the track in his front, or he has reasonable ground to believe that in its excited state it is about to go or may go upon it, so as to cause a collision." We think that the dog is not entitled to the same consideration at the hands of an engineer in charge of a moving locomotive that cattle or live stock are, and that the engineer is not, therefore, compelled to keep either a vigilant lookout for dogs, or as great care in the management of his engine or train, so as to prevent their injury, as he is for cattle or live stock. However, the dog in the case before us suddenly appeared on or near the track, and manifested no fear or excitement. It is not hazarding too much to say that it is a matter of common knowledge that in the classification of animal life (not including man) the dog occupies a position in point of intelligence, fidelity, and affection superior, probably, to all of the others. He is known to have been for ages, not only an animal of prey, but wonderfully acquainted with the habits and ways of both man and beast and birds, keenly sensitive as to sight, hearing, and smell, and remarkably agile in all of his movements. He can, by training and association with man, become adept in many useful employments, and can be taught to do almost anything except to speak. They are known ordinarily to be able to take care of themselves amidst the dangers incident to their surroundings. Where a horse, or a cow, or a hog, or any of the lower animals would be killed or injured by dangerous agencies, the dog would extricate himself with safety. In a line with the foregoing observations is one in the opinion in the case of Jones v. Bond, 40 Fed. 281, where the court, in denying the right of recovery for the negligent killing of a dog, said: "I presume the reason that other cases of like kind have not been before the courts is that the dog is very sagacious and watchful against hazards, and possesses greater ability to avert injury than almost any other animal; in other words, takes better care of himself against impending dangers than any other. He can mount an embankment or escape from dangerous places where a horse or cow would be altogether helpless; hence the same care to avoid injuries to an intelligent dog on a railroad is not required on the part of those operating the trains that is required in regard to other animals. The presumption is that such dog has the instinct and ability to get out of the way of danger, and will do so, unless its freedom of action is interfered with by other circumstances at the time and place." We think, therefore, that the dog, on account of his superior intelligence and possession of the other traits which we have mentioned, in respect to the diligence and care which locomotive engineers owe to their owners and to them, must be placed on the same footing with that of a man walking upon or near a railroad track apparently in possession of all his faculties, and that the engineer would be warranted in acting upon the belief that the dog would be aware of the approaching danger, and would get out of the way in time to avoid the injury. As the engineer would be negligent if he ran over and injured or killed a man on the track who was apparently helpless, so he would be if he killed or injured a dog near or upon the track in a position which showed that he was helpless, or totally oblivious of his surroundings.

In Citizens' Rapid Transit Co. v. Dev, 100 Tenn. 317, 40 L. R. A. 518, 66 Am. St. Rep. 754, 45 S. W. 790, the court allowed a recovery because it appeared that the dog which was killed was standing upon the track of the street railway, engaged in pointing some birds, which fact the motorman saw for a considerable distance before the car ran over the dog. Besides, we know of common knowledge that within this jurisdiction, at least, there is scarcely a household without a dog or dogs, that they are found in every street and public place, no limitation being put upon their free movements, and by the hundreds they daily pass in our cities and towns over the street railway track where and as often as they please. If, therefore, it should be required that motormen in charge of these cars should exercise the same degree of care to avoid running over a dog that the law requires of them to avoid injury to other animals, the public convenience of rapid transit in populous communities would be seriously impaired, and all business interests made to suffer. As the defendant's counsel say in their brief: "The dog would be absolute master of the situation, and would force the electric cars out of business." The true rule, we are satisfied, should be that street railway companies, when their cars are properly equipped, should not be held liable in damages for the killing of a dog by one of the street cars in motion, unless it was done under such circumstances as to justify the conclusion that the killing was done either wilfully, wantonly, or recklessly.

The undisputed evidence in this case renders it unnecessary to discuss, according to the view of the law which we have announced, either of the alleged acts of negligence except the last one, to wit, the failure to properly equip the cars with fenders. The plaintiff, in his examination in chief, had testified as to the killing of his dog and its value. He was afterwards recalled. and then testified, over the defendant's objection, that he had measured one of the fenders on one of the cars, and found that it was 25 inches from the track on one side, and 23 inches from the track on the other side; and, further, that he saw several fenders that were about the same height from the track, and that there were three or four different kinds of fenders on the cars, and that the defendant used on the big cars a very different fender from that used on the little cars, and that it was a little car that ran over his dog. That evidence ought not to have been received. It was offered, of course, to prove that the fender upon the car that killed the dog was either improperly constructed or had been permitted to become defective, and the jury might draw the inference that, if the fender had been of standard make or in good condition, the dog would not have been killed. But it was not competent to show that the fender on the car which killed the dog was defective by evidence to the effect that a fender on one of many cars was defective or out of repair. The evidence would be too highly conjectural. Especially is this so in this case, as it appears from all the evidence that the plaintiff would have had no difficulty in identifying the car which killed the dog. The statement of the plaintiff, too, that there were several different kinds of fenders on the different cars, and that those on the big cars were very different from those on the little cars, and that one of the latter killed the dog, did not amount to evidence of any kind pertinent to the case. It did not tend to show which were the superior fenders or which were defective fenders,—those on the big cars or those on the little cars. The evidence was misleading. And, besides, the very fact, if it existed, that the defendant had three or four different kinds of fenders, would make it quite clear that evidence of one kind of fender on one of the cars should not be used to show how another car was equipped as to the fenders. The motorman testified that the fender on the car which killed the dog was in good condition, and would do its work well, and there was no evidence to the contrary. The motion of the defendant to nonsuit the plaintiff because there was no evidence tending to show negligence on the part of the defendant, ought to have been allowed.

NORTH DAKOTA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of North Dakota ex rel. Charles J. FISK

v.

E. F. PORTER, Secretary of State.

(.....N. D.....)

*Section 491, Rev. Codes 1899, which prohibits the printing of the name of a candidate for office in more than one column of the official ballot, is, as to a candidate who is the nominee of a single political party and the nominee of electors by petition, a reasonable regulation of the manner of exercising the right of suffrage, and is valid and constitutional.

(October 24, 1904.)

APPPLICATION for a writ of mandamus to compel defendant to certify relator's name to the county auditors as a candidate for office. Denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles F. Templeton, Guy C. H. Corliss, and Tracy R. Bangs for plaintiff.

Messrs. C. N. Frick, Attorney General, John F. Philbrick, Newman, Spalding, & Stanbaugh, and R. H. Bosard for defendant.

Young, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Upon the application of the Honorable C. J. Fisk an alternative writ of mandamus issued out of this court directed to the secretary of state, and commanding him to certify relator's name to the county auditors of Grand Forks and Nelson counties as a candidate by petition for the office of judge of the district court of the first judicial district, or show cause why he has not done so. It appears from the relator's affidavit upon which the alternative writ was issued, and from the return of the secretary of state, and there is no controversy as to these facts, that the relator was regularly nominated as the Democratic candidate for said office, and on September 23, 1904, a certificate of such nomination, in due form, was filed in the office of the secretary of state; that thereafter, and on the 5th day of October, 1904, a certificate of nomination of said C. J. Fisk by petition of electors

*Headnote by YOUNG, Ch. J.

NOTE.—For other cases in this series as to validity of statute forbidding candidate's name to appear more than once on official ballot, see Todd v. Election Comrs. 29 L. R. A. 330; State ex rel. Bateman v. Bode, 34 L. R. A. 498; State ex rel. Runge v. Anderson, 42 L. R. A. 239; and Murphy v. Curry, 59 L. R. A. 97.

for the same office was filed in the secretary's office; that upon receipt of the latter certificate of nomination the secretary of state requested the relator to designate the column on the official ballot in which he wished his name printed, and on the same day the said C. J. Fisk, in answer to said request, demanded that his name be placed twice on the official ballot, once in the column headed "Democratic," and once in a column to be headed "A Non-Partisan Judiciary;" that because of the relator's refusal to designate a column the secretary of state certified his name as the nominee of the Democratic party, and directed his name to be placed in the column headed "Democratic" upon the official ballot and in no other, and for the reason that the Democratic nominating certificate was first filed in his office.

Under the statutes of this state the name of a candidate for office secures a place and is printed upon the official ballot when such candidate is nominated by an "assembly or convention of delegates held for the purpose of making nominations," in accordance with the provisions of § 498, Rev. Codes 1899, or when he is nominated by a petition of electors pursuant to the provisions contained in § 501, Rev. Codes 1899. Our statute (§ 491), in addition to prescribing the form and contents of the official ballot, provides for separate party columns, "under the appropriate party designation for each," in which the names of the party nominees are to be placed, also provides for one or more columns for the names of persons nominated by petition of electors under the designation "Individual Nominations." It also provides that "when the same candidate has been nominated for the same office by more than one assembly, convention, or body of electors qualified to make nominations for public officers, such candidate shall file with the proper officer . . . a statement in writing, signed by himself, designating one of the columns upon such ballot allotted to one of the parties, assemblies, conventions, or bodies of electors by whom said candidate has been nominated, as to the column upon such ballot in which such candidate desires his name to appear upon such ballot, and such candidate's name shall be printed upon such ballot in such column, but in no other. But if such candidate shall refuse or neglect to give notice to the proper officer as above provided, specifying in which column he wishes his name printed on the ballot, then in such case the said officer shall cause his name to be printed in the column of the party or political organization from which he received first notice of such person's nomination."

It thus appears that the refusal of the secretary of state to certify the nomination last filed, i. e., the nomination by petition of electors, was made in obedience to the legislative command contained in § 491, supra, prohibiting the printing of a candidate's name upon the official ballot in more than one column; and it is argued that nominations by petition of electors, such as that here in question, is within the prohibition of this section. Counsel for relator contend that the portion of the statute which prohibits the printing of a candidate's name in more than one column is unconstitutional and void, and that it is not within the power of the legislature to deny to him the right which he asserts, i. e., to have his name printed in his party column as a party candidate by virtue of his party nomination, and also in a separate column by virtue of his nomination by petition of electors. This particular provision is not peculiar to this state, and the question of its constitutionality is not a new one to the courts. It is contained in the Australian ballot laws of Wisconsin, Ohio, and Michigan, and in each of these states it has been held constitutional. State ex rel. Runge v. Anderson, 100 Wis. 523, 42 L. R. A. 239, 76 N. W. 482; State ex rel. Bateman v. Bode, 55 Ohio St. 224, 34 L. R. A. 498, 60 Am. St. Rep. 696, 45 N. E. 195; Todd v. Election Comrs. 104 Mich. 474, 29 L. R. A. 330, 62 N. W. 564, 64 N. W. 496. California has a provision somewhat similar. In that state it was held unconstitutional by a divided court. Murphy v. Curry, 137 Cal. 479, 59 L. R. A. 97, 70 Pac. 461.

These cases which are cited by counsel in support of their respective contentions will be found upon inspection to have involved questions which are not in this case. In each of the cases referred to the same candidate was the nominee of two or more political parties or organizations, and the question in each case was whether the legislature could restrict the printing of the candidate's name to one party column. The solution of that question involved a consideration of the rights of a nominee of two or more parties, the rights of political parties, and of electors as members of political parties. It will be seen that the weight of judicial opinion sustains the right of the legislature to restrict the printing of a candidate's name in such cases to one column. But we are not called upon to express an opinion on that question in this case. We have no such condition, and it will be time enough to answer that question when it is presented. The relator is the nominee of the Democratic party, and of no other party, and the secretary of state has certified his name to the county auditors as the Democratic nominee.

The only question which can arise in this case relates to the right of the relator or of the electors who signed the petition for his individual nomination to have his name printed in a separate column under the designation "Individual Nominations" as well as in his party column. The legislature has declared that it shall be printed in but one column. Does this deprive the relator or the electors of any constitutional right? We think not. Counsel have failed to point out any provision of the Constitution which is violated, and we know of none. If the relator were the nominee of two or more political parties, and were seeking a place on each party ticket, different questions would arise, such as were considered in the cases above referred to. But here the relator is the candidate of but one party or organization, and, under the statute and the facts as they exist, his name will appear in his party column. Hence no party interests or party question is involved. The electors who have nominated him by petition represent no party or organization. They merely represent themselves as electors. Atkeson v. Lay, 115 Mo. 538, 22 S. W. 481. They desire to have his name printed upon the ballot, so that they can vote for him without the annoyance of having to write or print his name upon the ballot. The state has afforded to electors this privilege, where a certain percentage or number of them join in a nominating petition, but at the same time has declared that it will print them in but one column, giving to the candidate the choice of columns in which his name shall appear. All authorities recognize the right of the legislature to regulate the manner of exercising the right of suffrage. The only restriction is that under the guise of regulating it shall not destroy the right. There is no ground whatever for contending that the electors' rights are either destroyed or impaired by the refusal to print the candidate's name in more than one column in a case like this, where the candidate has one party nomination and an individual nomination. It is altogether reasonable, under such circumstances, that the state should not be compelled to print a candidate's name in more than one column. The electors who join in making an individual nomination desire to vote for the man without regard to his party affiliations. If his name were printed under the head of individual nominations as well as in the party column, in order to vote for him they would have to designate their choice by a mark, and they are required to do nothing more where, as in this case, their candidate's name is printed in a party column. For those who desire to vote the straight Democratic ticket a single mark at the head of the ticket is sufficient. For those affiliated with other parties, or those who wish to vote a mixed ticket, a mark in the square opposite his name is sufficient, and this would be necessary even if his name appeared in a column under the head "Individual Nominations." Considered, then, entirely from the standpoint of convenience, no burden is added in this case by restricting the candidate's name to his party column.

The writ prayed for will be denied.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

Eugene N. ALEXANDER, Appt.,
v.
NANTICOKE LIGHT COMPANY.

1. A corporation which contracts to light a building by electricity undertakes to protect its occupants from injury by the electrical current, so far as it can do so, by exercising the highest degree of care, skill, and diligence in the construction and maintenance of its plant.
2. Injury to a property owner whose building an electric lighting company has contracted to light by means of an equipment furnished by itself, by the escape of a current from the wires when he attempts to turn on light at a particular lamp, raises a presumption of negligence on the part of the company, and places the burden of rebutting the presumption upon it.
3. That electricity can be safely conducted and used as an agent for production of light, heat, and power is a matter of judicial notice.

(October 10, 1904.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Luzerne County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Henry A. Fuller and Edmund G. Butler, for appellant:

Plaintiff was not required to prove that the injury was caused by the negligence of the company.

Fitzgerald v. Edison Electric Illuminating Co. 200 Pa. 540, 86 Am. St. Rep. 732, 50 Atl. 161; Devlin v. Beacon Light Co. 198 Pa. 585, 48 Atl. 482; Kane v. Philadelphia, 196 Pa. 503, 46 Atl. 893.

The electric current is a dangerous agent. The company which uses it is bound, not only to know the extent of the danger, but to use the very highest degree of care practicable to avoid injury to everyone who may be lawfully in proximity to its wires, and liable to come accidentally or otherwise in contact with them.

Fitzgerald v. Edison Electric Illuminating Co. 200 Pa. 543, 86 Am. St. Rep. 732, 50 Atl. 161; Heh v. Consolidated Gas Co. 201 Pa. 443, 88 Am. St. Rep. 819, 50 Atl. 994; Com. v. Northern Electric Light & P. Co. 145 Pa. 117, 14 L. R. A. 107, 22 Atl. 839.

Where the thing that causes the injury is under the management of the defendant, and the accident is such as, in the ordinary course of things, does not happen, the burden of proof is on the defendant.

The accident and attendant circumstances gave rise to a presumption of negligence.

Zahniser v. Pennsylvania Torpedo Co. 190 Pa. 350, 42 Atl. 707.

Messrs. Woodward, Darling, & Woodward, for appellee:

This is a case in which there did not exist between the defendant company and the injured person a relation imposing upon it an absolute duty, an obligation amounting to that of an insurer.

Smith v. East End Electric Light Co. 198 Pa. 19, 47 Atl. 1123; Fitzgerald v. Edison Electric Illuminating Co. 200 Pa. 540, 86 Am. St. Rep. 732, 50 Atl. 161.

Proof of the happening merely of an accident is not enough to establish the alleged negligence of a defendant.

Humes*, 188 Pa. 335, 41 Atl. 649; Baran v. Reading Iron Co. 202 Pa. 274, 51 Atl. 979.

There can be no recovery unless the plaintiff proves by affirmative evidence that the cause of the accident was one for which the defendant was liable.

Snodgrass v. Carnegie Steel Co. 173 Pa. 234, 33 Atl. 1104; Shafer v. Lacock, 168 Pa. 497, 29 L. R. A. 254, 32 Atl. 44; Alexander v. Pennsylvania Water Co. 201 Pa. 252, 50 Atl. 991; Price v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 202 Pa. 177, 51 Atl. 756.

The existence of a contractual relation between the plaintiff and the defendant company did not change the status of the parties.

Leidy v. Quaker City Cold Storage & Warehouse Co. 180 Pa. 323, 36 Atl. 851; Davidson v. Humes, 188 Pa. 335, 41 Atl. 649.

The doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applies where, under the circumstances shown, the accident presumably would not have happened if due care had been exercised.

Mr. James L. Morris also for appellee. 67 L. R. A.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The premises of the appellant, the proprietor of a china store in the borough of Nanticoke, were lighted by electricity. The electric light was furnished by the appellee, an electric light company. It had wired the store and cellar of the plaintiff, furnished the electric lamps, and made and maintained the connections. On the evening of August 19, 1898, he went into his cellar to show goods to a customer, and, while handling, in the usual way, an ordinary incandescent light bulb, suspended from the ceiling by a flexible extension cord, was severely shocked and seriously injured. From the facts submitted, it appeared that when he was shocked the electric wires on his premises were charged with a higher voltage than they should have carried, but the cause of this was not shown to have been any specific negligence of the defendant. Four theories were advanced as to what the negligence was, and four possible causes assigned for the accident. The learned trial judge, having been of opinion that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur did not apply, and that the burden of showing affirmatively the cause of the accident was upon the plaintiff, directed the entry of a nonsuit and refused to take it off, for the reason that, as plaintiff had not shown the cause of the accident, the jury would have had to guess at it if the case had been submitted to them.

Though electricity is the most powerful and dangerous element known to science, it has become part of the commercial, industrial, business, and domestic life of the world, working the wonders of the age. It can neither be seen nor heard, and is as deadly as it is invisible and silent; but, though such are its qualities, the same science that discovered it can control it in the endless variety of uses to which it has been put, and neither death nor danger need be encountered from it, if properly guarded against by those whose duty it is to have it safely conducted to the points at which it becomes only a useful and harmless agency. The appellee was incorporated for the purpose of furnishing light by electricity to the public and individuals in the borough of Nanticoke. It entered into a contract with the appellant to furnish him with such light, and part of its contract—the implied part—was that it would do so safely. Apart from any representation by the superintendent, who assured him, according to his testimony, that the electric light would be perfectly harmless, as there “was not power enough in it to kill a mosquito,” it was the implied contract between the appellant and the company that it would supply his premises with a safe electric current for lighting them by lamps which it furnished. By this it is not to be understood that the company became an insurer to its patron against all danger in the use of its electrical appliances on his premises, but simply that it had contracted with him to protect him from injury by exercising the highest degree of care, skill, and diligence in the construction and maintenance of its plant and appliances. In Fitzgerald v. Edison Electric Illuminating Co. 200 Pa. 540, 86 Am. St. Rep. 732, 60 Atl. 161, in which a painter went upon the roof of a house in the lawful exercise of his business, and was killed by coming into contact with a defectively insulated wire, we said, through the present chief justice: "Wires charged with an electric current may be harmless, or they may be in the highest degree dangerous. The difference in this respect is not apparent to ordinary observation, and the public, therefore, while presumed to know that danger may be present, are not bound to know its degree in any particular case. The company, however, which uses such a dangerous agent, is bound, not only to know the extent of the danger, but to use the very highest degree of care practicable to avoid injury to everyone who may be lawfully in proximity to its wires, and liable to come accidentally or otherwise in contact with them. The defendant, in accord with the common practice of electric companies, recognized this obligation by insulating its dangerous wire. But the duty is not only to make the wire safe by proper insulation, but to keep it so by constant oversight and repair." That it is the imperative duty of an electric light company to perfectly insulate its wires at all points where persons have a right to be, on business or pleasure, and to use the utmost care to keep the insulation perfect, has been repeatedly held in other jurisdictions. Among the cases announcing this rule are Schweitzer v. Citizens' General Electric Co. 21 Ky. L. Rep. 608, 52 S. W. 830; McLaughlin v. Louisville Electric Light Co. 100 Ky. 173, 34 L. R. A. 812, 37 S. W. 851; Geismann v. Missouri-Edison Electric Co. 173 Mo. 654, 73 S. W. 654; Lexington R. Co. v. Fain, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 1443, 71 S. W. 628. But when, as here, one on his own premises handles an electric lamp furnished to him by an electric light company for the very purpose of being handled as a means of getting light, the high standard of duty required of the company is that it must, in the operation of its plant, protect its patrons from the perilous current which is the basis of its business, by doing all that human care, skill, and vigilance can suggest.

When the foregoing rule is observed by an electric light company, the presumption is that no such injury will befall its patrons as was sustained by the present appellant; but, on the other hand, when such injury does occur, the presumption is that the rule had been disregarded. This is manifestly reasonable, for it is within the common knowledge of mankind, and therefore a matter of judicial notice, that electricity can be safely conducted and used as an agent for the production of light, heat, or power. The rule on this subject is nowhere more clearly stated than in Scott v. London & St. K. Docks Co. 3 Hurlst. & C. 596: "Where the thing is shown to be under the management of the defendant or his servants, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanations by the defendants, that the accident arose from want of care."

To say that one injured as the appellant was cannot recover unless he affirmatively proves, in the first instance, the specific act of negligence of the company which caused the injury, would in many cases be a denial of a right to recover at all, no matter how negligent the company might be. Against patent dangers, or against those as to which he may have been warned, the user of electricity must, of course, guard himself, and, if he dallies with them,—taking hold, by way of illustration, of an appliance emitting sparks, or handling an uninsulated wire after having been warned not to do so,—he voluntarily places himself in peril, and cannot recover, if injured; but when, as here, no danger was seen, and there was no reason to think it was lurking in the company's appliances, its patron took the lamp in his hand, and was severely shocked and injured, the only reasonable presumption instantly is that something was wrong, over which the company had exclusive control. The user of electricity, though having knowledge of its dangerous character, has no knowledge of how this danger can be controlled. He relies upon the company to control it, and when this appellant took the lamp in his hand he had a right to do so without a thought that it had not been controlled. What did he know of what it was necessary for the company to do, as a dealer in electricity, to protect its customers from the danger of its commodity? He is not presumed to know anything. As a rule, the man who takes in his hand an electric lamp or telephone receiver, starts an electric fan, or uses any other appliance which he has a right to use under his contract with an electric company, is helpless if the invisible and dangerous current has not been properly controlled by the company's officers and employees, who are conclusively presumed to know how to control it.

One of the cases cited by appellant in support of his contention that there was a presumption of appellee's negligence, which it was bound to rebut, is Alton R. & Illuminating Co. v. Foulds, 81 Ill. App. 322. There the wife of the plaintiff below went into a cellar to turn on an electric light, and, on taking hold of the lamp, received a shock and was killed. At the trial the plaintiff did not show by any specific evidence how the increased voltage that caused his wife's death had got on the wire. In affirming the judgment on the verdict in his favor, the court said: "When appellant wired the basement or cellar of appellee's house, and agreed to furnish him light for hire, it well knew it was dealing in an element that, delivered in a current of high voltage, such as was carried on its primary wires, was almost certain to bring death to the person who turned on the lamp, if there was a ground of the current on the circuit; hence the law imposes upon it the duty to exercise a high degree of care and skill in the delivery of the element it had contracted for. If the injury itself furnishes a presumption of negligence, so as to require the defendant to show by evidence that it has been guilty of no negligence that caused it, then it logically follows that all that is necessary to be averred in the declaration to entitle the plaintiff to recover . . . is the agreement, a negligent breach of it, and the result; also that the plaintiff has not by any neglect on his part contributed to the result." There are a number of cases upon which the appellant could place greater reliance as to the high degree of care required of an electric light company, and as to the presumption of negligence in case of injury to its patrons in the ordinary use of its appliances, but reference will be made to only two of them:

In Denver Consol. Electric Co. v. Lawrence, 31 Colo. 301, 73 Pac. 39, which was an action against the company for injuries caused by an electric shock to plaintiff while turning on a light in his home, in holding that it was proper to charge that the plaintiff was not required to point out the specific negligence which caused the accident, the court said: "Ordinarily the allegations of duty and a breach thereof are not sufficient, but, if the duty results from the facts stated, then the allegations of duty may be discarded as surplusage, and the complaint held to be sufficient. If the allegations of the complaint concerning the relationship of the parties and the character of the injuries received make out a prima facie case of liability, then the complaint is good as against a general demurrer. We think the complaint does, from the very character of the accident as set forth therein, call upon the defendant to make defense to the case of negligence in supplying electricity to the residence, which the facts, as charged, make out. The business of the defendant is that of selling electricity to the people of Denver, —a business so fraught with peril to the public that the highest degree of care which skill and foresight can obtain, consistent with the practical conduct of its affairs under the known methods and present state of its particular art, is demanded. Denver Consol. Electric Co. v. Simpson, 21 Colo. 371, 31 L. R. A. 566, 41 Pac. 499. The plaintiff while attempting to do that which every patron of the company must do to make use of the electric light, received into his body a current of electricity, burning his hands and feet and permanently injuring him. Such injuries are not, under ordinary circumstances, received by persons who turn on an incandescent lamp, if the company supplying the current has not been negligent. The defendant, when it contracted with the father of the plaintiff to sell electricity for light, contracted to keep its plant and appliances in such condition that no greater volume of electricity would be carried into the house than was necessary for its proper lighting. The quantity of electricity required for lighting purposes in residences is not sufficient, if it pass through the body, to cause the injuries described by the plaintiff in his complaint. It follows, therefore, that the plaintiff must have received a very much greater quantity of electricity than the company contracted to supply. The court therefore did not err in overruling the demurrer to the complaint, nor in overruling the objections to the introduction of testimony. The company insists that it is not an insurer, and that its obligation is that of using ordinary care. We are not prepared to say that it is an insurer, but the patrons of the company have the right to presume that they will not be injured in attempting to use that which the company sells, and that it will do all that human care, vigilance, and foresight can reasonably do, consistent with the practical operation of its plant, to protect those who use its electric light."

The other case is Royal Electric Co. v. Heye, Rap. Jud. Quebec, 11 B. R. 436. The facts in that case are singularly analogous to those in the present one; and there, as here, on the trial, different theories were advanced as to the specific negligence of the company which caused the injury. One was accepted by the court below as correct, but the appellate court thought another more probable. The case, however, was disposed of without regard to either: Hall, J., delivering the judgment of the court of King's bench, saying: "But in my opinion, it is a matter of indifference, legally speaking, where this current originated. The appellants should be held responsible for it under any circumstances. They deal in a commodity of a recognized dangerous character, the control of which is a matter of technical knowledge and experience, and entirely uncomprehended by the general public. When a company like the appellants' organized under the name of an electric company, hold themselves out to the public as dealers in and suppliers of that commodity, for gain, and make contracts with private individuals for furnishing light or power over a system constructed and controlled by themselves, they are bound to deliver it in a form and under conditions of safety for the person and property for whose use the company charge and receive compensation; and they are also bound, in the discharge of their part of the contract, to a supervision and diligence proportionate to the peculiar character and danger of the commodity in which they deal. In the case under consideration, the electric company not only had stipulated, but had exercised the right of supervision of their system within the premises of the deceased. As to that portion of the system outside of his premises, no one but their own employees had even the right of examination or interference. If their transformer was defective, or could become dangerous from the moisture of an ordinary rain storm, it was their business to have discovered and removed the cause of danger. If their system of wiring came within an inch of the wire of another company,—even if on a dead wire,—common prudence would have suggested their interference, either by a protest against the other company, or by the removal of their own wires, while it is in evidence that the proximity of the two systems had existed for months prior to this accident. The fact that guy wires become, from accident, live wires of the most dangerous character, is one, unfortunately, of too frequent occurrence to be overlooked or ignored in the exercise of the constant supervision which an electric system exacts, and which the public has the right to enforce. The implied contract between the appellants and deceased was that they should supply his premises with a safe electrical current for lighting purposes by the lamps which they furnished. They failed in this respect, and in the use of their lamp he received a current of electricity by which he was instantaneously killed. The presumption is that it came over the same system and from the same source as that by which his ordinary supply was delivered to him by appellants. The burden of proof is upon them to show the contrary. This they have failed to do, and the judgment holding them responsible for the accident should be confirmed." To these utterances, reason responds, and they must therefore be the law.

The presumption that the appellee was negligent is not conclusive. The accident may have been due to causes over which it had no control, and, if so, not being an insurer, it is not liable. But the presumption is that it was blamable, and it can escape liability for appellant's serious injury only by persuading a jury that it had performed its duties as we have here defined them.

As the burden was upon the defendant to show that it had not been negligent, the last assignment of error is sustained. The rest need not be considered.

Judgment reversed and procedendo awarded.

v.

NATIONAL INSURANCE COMPANY OF IRELAND.

(.....R. I.....)

A policy of insurance on the furniture of a house is void in toto if a large part of the furniture has been purchased on the instalment plan and is not paid for, and the policy provides that it shall be void if the interest of the assured is other than unconditional and sole ownership.

(September 13, 1904.)

ON PETITION by defendant for new trial after verdict in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged

NOTE.—For a case in this series very similar to the one above, holding that a purchaser of property on the instalment plan is not the sole and unconditional owner thereof, and that in case of a policy on furniture so purchased the invalidity of the policy as to a portion thereof renders the entire policy void, see Du-67 L. R. A.

mas v. Northwestern Nat. Ins. Co. 40 L. R. A. 358.

For another case denying that title of one to property purchased on instalment plan is sole and unconditional, see Westchester F. Ins. Co. v. Weaver, 5 L. R. A. 478.

to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Judgment in defendant's favor.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John A. Tillinghast and James E. Smith for defendant.

Messrs. Henry F. Thompson and Thomas F. Farrell, for plaintiff:

It is not the fact that the interest of the assured is other than sole and unconditional that renders void the policy, but the withholding of that knowledge from the insurer. Plaintiff informed the agent of the company at the time she applied for the policy that some of the goods she owned, and a portion she had on instalment. In possession of this information, the company executed and delivered the policy in question and accepted the premium.

An insurance company will not be permitted to take advantage of a condition contained in a policy to avoid payment of loss when the facts rendering the policy void by its terms were known to the insurer at the time it issued the policy and accepted the premiums.

Stiness, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question raised in this case is the validity of the policy, which covered household furniture of every description in the house occupied by the plaintiff. The policy is the standard form, as provided in Gen. Laws 1896, chap. 183, and contains a clause that the policy shall be void if the interest of the insured be other than unconditional and sole ownership, unless other ownership be assented to in writing. It is admitted that a considerable portion of the furniture was owned by others than the plaintiff, she holding it under what is called the instalment plan.

The plaintiff claims the right to recover on what she owned herself, and had a verdict under an instruction to that effect, to which the defendant takes exception. The condition of the policy is plain, and the breach of it is admitted. Ownership is an important element in a contract of insurance. As said by Marshall, Ch. J., in Columbian Ins. Co. v. Lawrence, 2 Pet. 25, 7 L. ed. 335: "Underwriters do not rely so much upon the principals as on the interest of the assured; and it would seem, therefore, 67 L. R. A.

to be always material that they should know how far this interest is engaged in guarding the property from loss." Accordingly, when insurance is contracted upon property as a whole, it is no answer to say that the insured owned a part of it. A new element would be introduced into the contract. We cannot say that the contract would have been made as it was, or even at all, if the fact had been known that only a small part of the property belonged to the plaintiff. Such a fact is deemed to be so important that it is no longer merely a provision of contract, but of statute, for the statute prescribes the clause in question. The terms of it apply to the policy as a whole. The policy is made void, not void simply as to the part of the property in which there may not be absolute ownership and valid as to the rest. We see no room for such a construction of the terms of the policy.

In Westchester F. Ins. Co. v. Weaver, 70 Md. 536, 5 L. R. A. 478, 17 Atl. 401, 18 Atl. 1034, where one point raised in the case involved the ownership of a piano, which the assured held under an instalment agreement, with condition to pay the full value in case of destruction by fire, a stronger case than this, the court said: "The terms of the policy required him (the insured) to be the unconditional owner at the time of the insurance, and this, it appears, he was not."

The question was not raised in that case whether the policy was void as a whole, but the following cases are to the effect that a false statement as to the ownership of a part avoids the policy: Cuthbertson v. North Carolina Home Ins. Co. 96 N. C. 480, 2 S. E. 258; East Texas F. Ins. Co. v. Brown, 82 Tex. 631, 18 S. W. 713; J. B. Ehrsam Mach. Co. v. Phenix Ins. Co. 43 Neb. 554, 61 N. W. 722; Home Ins. Co. v. Smith (Tex. Civ. App.) 29 S. W. 264; Waller v. Northern Assur. Co. 2 McCrary, 637, 10 Fed. 232; Mullin v. Vermont Mut. F. Ins. Co. 54 Vt. 223; Mt. Leonard Mill. Co. v. Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. 25 Mo. App. 259; Catron v. Tennessee Ins. Co. 6 Humph. 176.

We are of opinion that the refusal to charge that the policy was void was error, and, as this is conclusive of the plaintiff's right to recover, the case is remitted to the Common Pleas Division, with direction to enter judgment for the defendant.

Petition for rehearing denied.

(.....S. C.....)

1. Change of the stated price in a telegram intended to notify a purchaser of the market price of mules so as apparently to quote them at $10 a head less than their market price, which results in the sendee's directing the purchase of a certain number on his account, will render the telegraph company liable for the difference in the price paid and that stated in the telegram as delivered.
2. A nonsuit should not be granted in an action for breach of contract correctly to transmit a telegram, upon the ground that the action was not brought within the time limited by the conditions of the blank on which the message was written, since plaintiff has a right to prove waiver of such condition or estoppel to rely on it.
3. A local agent of a telegraph company, intrusted with the duty and responsibility of getting up all possible information with respect to claims for damages because of breach of contract to transmit messages, has power to bind the company by a waiver of a condition as to time within which the claim must be presented.
4. Seeking further information as to the merits of a claim against a telegraph company for damages for breach of a contract to transmit a message, long after receipt of verbal notice of it, and eight or ten days after receiving written notice, without disclosing any intention to rely on the fact that the claim was not presented in time, constitutes a waiver of that defense.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Evans & Finley for appellant.

Messrs. Sheppards & Grier, for respondents:

Woods, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs, R. M. Hays & Brother, were dealers in horses and mules at Greenwood, South Carolina. A. C. Hays, the junior partner, was sent to the St. Louis stock market, with the understanding that he should purchase only after he had telegraphed prices, and received instructions from his senior, R. M. Hays. On January 1, 1901, A. C. Hays delivered to the defendant, the Western Union Telegraph Company, in St. Louis, for transmission to R. M. Hays at Greenwood, a telegram in these words: "Fourteen half hands, ninety-five; fifteen hands, one hundred and five; fifteen half hands, one hundred seventeen fifty; pair for self, sixteen hands, two sixty,—all little less quality than before." As delivered to R. M. Hays, the telegram read "one hundred and seven fifty," instead of "one hundred and seventeen fifty," as written; and R. M. Hays was thus led to believe that mules 15½ hands high could be bought for $107.50, instead of $117.50. Acting on this impression, he telegraphed his partner to buy 24 mules of that size. R. M. Hays testified he was induced by the price to purchase mules of 15½ hands, instead of the cheaper mules of 15 hands, and that he could have sold in Greenwood the cheaper mules at about the same price; the market price there for the two classes of mules being about the same. The plaintiffs claimed of the defendant damages of $10 for each of the 24 mules purchased, being the difference between the price stated in the telegram as delivered and the price actually paid. In sending the messages, plaintiffs agreed to the printed contract: "That the company will not be liable for damages or statutory penalties in any case where the claim is not presented in writing within sixty days after the message is filed with the company for transmission." The claim was not presented in writing until more than sixty days had elapsed.

The defendant moved for a nonsuit: First, because there was no proof of any direct loss to the plaintiffs arising from the mistake of transmitting the telegram, but only of loss of profits: and, second, because plaintiffs did not present claim in writing within sixty days after the filing of the message for transmission, as stipulated in his agreement. The refusal of the motion for a nonsuit is made the first ground of appeal.

In Howard v. Stillwell & B. Mfg. Co. 139 U. S. 199, 35 L. ed. 147, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 500, the Supreme Court of the United States, after stating the rule that contingent or remote profits are not recoverable, says: "But it is equally well settled that the profits which would have been realized had the contract been performed, and which have been prevented by its breach, are included in the damages to be recovered in every case where such profits are not open to the objection of uncertainty or of remoteness, or where, from the express or implied terms of the contract itself, or the special circumstances under which it was made, it may be reasonably presumed that they were within the intent and mutual understanding of both parties at the time it was entered into." The general doctrine is well expressed in Griffin v. Colver, 16 N. Y. 489, 69 Am. Dec. 718: "The broad general rule in such cases is that the party injured is entitled to recover all his damages, including gains prevented as well as losses sustained; and this rule is subject to but two conditions: the damages must be such as may fairly be supposed to have entered into the contemplation of the parties when they made the contract,—that is, must be such as might naturally be expected to follow its violation; and they must be certain, both in their nature and in respect to the cause from which they proceed." See also Jenkins v. Charleston Street R. Co. 58 S. C. 373, 30 S. E. 703. The principle thus clearly stated is generally recognized, but there is often great difficulty in its application. In the case now under consideration, the telegram which defendant undertook to transmit indicated on its face the purpose to give information of the price of live stock by size, for the word "hands," as a term of measurement, is not usually applied otherwise. Such a message also gives notice that it will be used as a basis of business action or nonaction, and that loss or profit is liable to result. Indeed, the sole purpose of such telegrams is obviously to make profit by purchase and sale, and this purpose was within the understanding of the plaintiffs and the telegraph company when it undertook to deliver the message. Accordingly, the rule as to telegraph companies is thus stated in 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1069: "When a message announcing prices, sent in contemplation of a trade, is erroneously transmitted, the party injured through acting upon the erroneous message may recover the amount of his actual loss caused by the decrease in the price he obtained, or, in case he is a purchaser, the increase in price he is obliged to pay in consequence of the error." Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Dubois, 128 Ill. 248, 15 Am. St. Rep. 109, 21 N. E. 4. These views are not inconsistent with Sitton v. MacDonald, 25 S. C. 68, 60 Am. Rep. 484, where the profits claimed were not in the contemplation of the parties; nor with Mood v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 40 S. C. 524, 19 S. E. 67, where the special damages were held not sufficiently alleged; nor with cases like Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Hall, 124 U. S. 444, 31 L. ed. 479, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 577, where there was failure to deliver the telegram, and hence no purchase based thereon, leaving it entirely conjectural whether the plaintiff would have purchased if the telegram had been delivered, and would have subsequently sold on the rising market. Here there was evidence of an actual purchase on the faith of the telegram, and an actual loss of a profit which would have been made if the telegram had been correctly transmitted. In Wallingford v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 53 S. C. 410, 31 S. E. 275, the facts were entirely different, and that case is applicable only by analogy. There the defendant demurred to a complaint for damages, which alleged sale of a car load of mules would have been directed by one partner in answer to a telegram from another stating offer of purchase, if the telegram had been delivered; whereas, by reason of the failure to deliver the telegram, the firm was forced to hold the mules for some time at considerable expense, and then to sell for less than the price mentioned in the telegram. The mules were at Sheridan, Indiana, and the undelivered telegram related to an offer in that market. The court said: "The measure of damages in such a case as this is the difference between the market value of such mules on same terms at the time the message should have been delivered, and the price offered, in case such market value was less than the price offered. By market value is meant the price that could have been obtained in open market on fair competition on similar terms at Sheridan, Indiana, or, if there was no market price there, at any convenient market for mules, where there was at the time a market price." It is not necessary that the plaintiff should bring home to the defendant knowledge of the market conditions. In the case now under consideration, the market price of the mules in St. Louis, given in the telegram as delivered, was $10 less for each mule than the actual market price in St. Louis, which plaintiffs had to pay. There was evidence to the effect that plaintiffs would not have bought the mules they did buy if the telegram had been correctly transmitted, but would have bought the smaller mules at a price $10 lower for each, which would have answered the same purpose in the conduct of the plaintiffs' business, as they were worth in the Greenwood market, where they were to be sold, as much as the larger mules. This means that the plaintiffs paid out $240 on the faith of the telegram, and that they derived no substantial profit or advantage from the payment of this sum. Therefore, whether we regard the effect on the plaintiffs as a loss of profit, or the fruitless expenditure of money on the faith of the telegram, the result is the same. The difference in the price paid and the price stated in the telegram as delivered was, under the facts of this case, the true measure of damages.

The nonsuit could not have been granted on the second ground, because the plaintiffs had the right to prove in reply waiver or estoppel as to the stipulation that the claim should be presented in writing within sixty days. Copeland v. Western Assur. Co. 43 S. C. 26, 20 S. E. 754.

The charge of the circuit judge on the subject of profits was in accordance with the views above expressed in considering the motion for nonsuit, and was therefore not erroneous. The circuit judge refused the motion to direct a verdict, made on the ground that it was affirmatively proved that the claim had not been presented in writing within sixty days, and that there was no evidence of waiver. The jury were instructed that the contract requiring the claim to be presented in writing within sixty days was valid, and they were left to decide whether there was sufficient evidence of waiver of the stipulation. The question is, whether there was any evidence of waiver, for if there was no such evidence the jury should have been instructed to find for the defendant. Waiver is a voluntary relinquishment of a known right, and it does not require a new contract upon consideration to be effectual against the stipulation that the claim should be presented within sixty days. Kingman v. Lancashire Ins. Co. 54 S. C. 599, 32 S. E. 762. The transactions relied on as constituting waiver were altogether between the plaintiffs and Calhoun, the agent of the defendant at Greenwood, and hence it is necessary to determine how far the defendant should be bound by his course of conduct. A mere local telegraph operator, whose duty is confined to the receipt, delivery, and transmission of messages, cannot bind his principal by waiving its rights as to claims presented against it. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Brown (Tex. Civ. App.) 24 S. W. 918; 13 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 392; 4 Elliott, Railroads, § 1524. This is in accord with analogous cases in this state. Petrie v. Columbia & G. R. Co. 27 S. C. 63, 2 S. E. 837; Garrick v. Florida C. & P. R. Co. 53 S. C. 448, 69 Am. St. Rep. 874, 31 S. E. 334. In this case, Calhoun describes himself as "manager of the Western Union Telegraph Company at Greenwood." While too much importance should not be attached to an official designation, he testifies to the important fact that the company intrusted to him the duty and responsibility of getting up all possible information in such cases. After this claim was presented in writing, the company corresponded with him about it, but gave no special instructions to obtain further information. This correspondence furnished ample opportunity for the company to notify him not to exercise his usual duty of obtaining additional information from the plaintiffs. In the absence of such instructions, Calhoun was fully justified in acting on his general authority to seek information as to the merits of the claim as agent of the company, and defendant will be chargeable with the result of his action in that regard.

Waiver of contracts of forfeiture similar to this have been placed on several different grounds: (1) If some statement of proof has been furnished indicating the nature and grounds of the claim within the time prescribed, good faith requires notice of the defect relied on, so that it may be remedied in time, and failure to give such notice is waiver of the defect. McBryde v. South Carolina Mut. Ins. Co. 55 S. C. 589, 74 Am. St. Rep. 769, 33 S. E. 729; Davis Shoe Co. v. Kittanning Ins. Co. 138 Pa. 73, 21 Am. St. Rep. 904, 20 Atl. 838; Rheims v. Standard F. Ins. Co. 39 W. Va. 672, 20 S. E. 670. (2) The party to be charged waives the forfeiture if, with knowledge of all the facts, he requires the claimant to do some act or incur some trouble or expense inconsistent with the position that the contract had become inoperative in consequence of the breach of its conditions. Madsen v. Phœnix F. Ins. Co. 1 S. C. N. S. 24; Kingman v. Lancashire Ins. Co. 54 S. C. 603, 32 S. E. 762; Trippe v. Provident Fund Soc. 140 N. Y. 23, 22 L. R. A. 432, 37 Am. St. Rep. 529, 35 N. E. 316; Hudson v. Northern P. R. Co. 92 Iowa, 231, 54 Am. St. Rep. 550, 60 N. W. 608. In this proposition there is also the element of estoppel, and it is applicable to all contracts for forfeiture. (3) Where the statement or proof is presented after the time limited by the contract, and the claimant thereafter does nothing, and incurs no expense or trouble in consequence of any demand of the party to be charged, yet waiver of the form of the claim and of the time limit will be implied, if the statement or proof is retained and considered on its merits, without notice that the time limit, or a lack of written demand in proper form, will be relied on. McBryde v. South Carolina Mut. Ins. Co. 55 S. C. 593, 74 Am. St. Rep. 769, 33 S. E. 729; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Stratemeyer, 6 Ind. App. 125, 32 N. E. 871; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Bogard, 78 Miss. 11, 27 So. 879; Wabash R. Co. v. Brown, 152 Ill. 484, 39 N. E. 273; Commercial Union Assur. Co. v. Hocking, 115 Pa. 407, 2 Am. St. Rep. 562, 8 Atl. 589.

It is to be borne in mind that stipulations as to the form of such claims and the time within which they shall be presented do not relate to the merits. They do not affect the consideration or condition upon which liability or risk is assumed, nor are they contracts of exemption from particular risks or liabilities. These things—the consideration, the exemption from liability, and the conditions of liability—form the very basis of the contract, and are of its substance, and it is not reasonable to suppose known rights as to them will be lightly relinquished. Therefore, in many such cases waiver is based on the fact that the claimant has changed his position as a result of the conduct of the party to be charged. In this view it was held in Joye v. South Carolina Mut. Ins. Co. 54 S. C. 375, 32 S. E. 446, that the promise of the president of an insurance company to pay the loss did not constitute waiver, as it was followed by another letter, denying liability because the consideration of the policy had not been paid; no change in the condition of the insured having taken place in the meantime. On the contrary, provisions as to the form of claims and the time of presentation are intended only to secure the orderly conduct of the business of the company by giving it an opportunity to investigate while the facts may be ascertained, and hence any indication given to the claimant of its election to consider the claim on its merits will be regarded evidence of waiver. There was evidence here that before the expiration of sixty days the plaintiffs notified defendant's agent and manager at Greenwood of the loss, and that they would hold the company liable unless it should turn out that Calhoun, the Greenwood agent, had made a mistake. In these circumstances, long after the verbal notice, and when the telegraph company had had the written claim in hand eight or ten days, Calhoun, on behalf of the company, sought of the plaintiffs further information about the merits of the claim. The evidence does not disclose any expression of intention to claim the time limit during these negotiations, or at any time until the answer was filed. The failure of the defendant to object that the first notice was not in writing, its subsequent receipt and retention of the written claim without objection after the time had expired, and the request for further information as to the merits while it had the written claim in hand, taken together, furnished evidence of waiver sufficient to go to the jury.

Under the views above expressed as to the scope of the duties and responsibilities imposed by defendant on Calhoun, its Greenwood agent, it was manifestly competent for the plaintiffs to prove the notice and presentation to him of the claim, and his demand for information concerning it.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Gary, A. J., dissenting:

This is an action for damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiffs on account of an error in the transmission of a telegram. At the time hereinafter mentioned, the plaintiffs conducted the business of a general sale stables for the sale of horses and mules at Greenwood, South Carolina. On the 18th of January, 1901, A. C. Hays delivered to the defendant at East St. Louis the following telegram, to be transmitted to R. M. Hays, the other member of the firm, to wit: "Fourteen half hands, ninety-five; fifteen hands, one hundred and five; fifteen half hands, one hundred and seventeen fifty; pair for self, sixteen hands, two sixty,—all little less quality than before." The defendant erroneously, however, sent the following telegram to R. M. Hays: "Fourteen half hands, ninety-five; fifteen hands, one hundred and five; fifteen half hands, one hundred and seven fifty; pair for self, sixteen hands, two sixty,—all little less quality than before." R. M. Hays telegraphed to A. C. Hays: "Buy twenty-four mules. Fifteen, two hands; pair sixteen hands for farm. Get nice colors, fully half mare mules. Give Thomson preference. Wire when ship." The mules were purchased, shipped to Greenwood, and sold by the plaintiffs.

On cross-examination, R. M. Hays testified as follows:

Q. When you speak of your loss being so much, what do you mean by that; is that you made that much less than you expected to make?

A. I didn't mean that. I meant to say that I could have used fifteen hand mules and sold the same mules at the price they were bought at.

Q. Did you, as a matter of fact, lose a dollar on this car load of mules?

A. I couldn't state that as a fact.

Q. Would you say you lost a dollar?

A. No, sir, I never figured it out. I stated this: I said that fifteen hand mules at $105 sold for the same money on the market as fifteen and one-half hand mules.

The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for $240.

The appellant's ninth exception assigns error on the part of his honor, the presiding judge, as follows: "In charging the jury in accordance with the second, third, fourth, and fifth requests of the plaintiffs, that profits which are direct and immediate fruits of a contract may be recovered; the errors being that the contract out of which the profits might have come was not before the court for consideration, and that there was no pretense or claim on the part of the plaintiffs that they had actually lost anything by giving $117.50 per head for the mules, but only that they had failed to make what they would have made by buying them at $107.50." Those requests are as follows: "(2) Profits which are the direct and immediate fruits of a contract can be recovered. There are many cases in which the profits to be made by the bargain is the only thing purchased, and in such cases the amount of such profits is the measure of damages. (3) Where the profits are the direct and immediate fruits of the contract, they are free from the objection of being speculative, and can be recovered. (4) Whenever it is shown by the evidence that a telegraph company has by its fault in the transmission of a message caused the sender to fail to make some gain or profit which he otherwise would have made, and the amount thereof is shown with certainty by the evidence, the gain or profit thus prevented is a proper element of damages in an action against the company for its breach of contract. (5) Damages may be recovered for losses sustained or gain prevented when they are the proximate and certain results of the defendant's fault." There was no testimony that the defendant had notice of the fact that the first message related to the purchase of mules, nor that the mules were purchased for resale, nor as to the market value of the mules at the time the plaintiffs' right of action accrued. His honor, the presiding judge, erred in the test for the admeasurement of damages which he submitted to the jury for the reason that profits were not a proper element of damages in this case. In the leading case of Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 341, the following general rules are indicated: "First. That damages which may fairly and reasonably be considered as naturally arising from a breach of contract according to the usual course of things are always recoverable. Second. That damages which would not arise in the usual course of things from a breach of contract, but which do arise from circumstances peculiar to the special case, are not recoverable unless the special circumstances are known to the person who has broken the contract." Cited with approval in Sitton v. Macdonald, 25 S. C. 68, 60 Am. Rep. 484. In the earlier cases, both English and American, there was a general concurrence in excluding profits in actions of tort as well as on contract, which merely might have been realized had the injury not been done or the contract been performed. 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 617. "Profits which depend upon the fluctuations of the markets and the hazards and chances of business are considered too contingent and speculative to enter into a safe or reasonable estimate of damages. Thus any supposed successful operation the party might have made, if he had not been prevented from realizing the proceeds of the contract at the time stipulated, is a consideration not to be taken into the estimate of damages; for besides the uncertain and contingent issue of such an operation in itself, it has no legal or necessary connection with the stipulations between the parties, and cannot, therefore, be presumed to have entered into their consideration at the time of contracting." 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 618, 619.

In the case of Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Nye & S. Grain Co. (Neb.) 63 L. R. A. 803, 97 N. W. 305, it was held that "where the negligent delay of a telegraph company in the delivery of a message delivered to it for transmission by the plaintiff results in the loss to the plaintiff of a sale of a quantity of corn at a price above the market value of the corn at the time and place it would have been delivered had such sale been made, the measure of damages is the difference in value between the price the plaintiff would have received for the corn had the sale been made and the market value of the corn at such time and place of delivery, unaffected by the price at which the plaintiff may have disposed of the corn after that time." In discussing the question of profits, the court uses this language: "In such cases the general rule is that, so far as it can be done by money, the injured party is to be placed in the same situation in which a performance of the contract would have placed him. But it would be impossible to follow the labyrinth of remote results and consequences of a breach of contract, and determine either the ultimate situation of the party as affected thereby, or what such situation would have been had the contract been performed. The law, therefore, takes into account only proximate results, and disregards such as are remote, or are the product of intervening or independent causes. Hence the situation of the injured party which forms the basis of the comparison must be his situation when the breach of contract occurred, and before remote or independent causes had intervened to change it. His situation after that time can never be material as an ultimate fact in the case, because after the intervention of such causes it can never be known, with any reasonable degree of certainty, to what extent it is due to causes only remotely connected with the breach of contract, or wholly independent of it."

Whatever may be the rule elsewhere, the courts of this state have followed the earlier decisions, both English and American, which held that anticipated profits could not be recovered, for the reason that they were indefinite, uncertain, and too remote. In the case of Sitton v. Macdonald, 25 S. C. 68, 60 Am. Rep. 484, the plaintiff carried on the business of buying old cotton ties, and manufacturing them into new ones. In the operation of its machinery it used a peculiar kind of punch, which could not be repaired by a blacksmith. The plaintiff carried it to the defendant, who undertook to repair it. The defendant failed to carry out its contract, and the plaintiff brought an action for $1,000 damages. Upon the trial the plaintiff offered to prove as damages the amount of profits he would have earned in the ordinary employment of the punch during the time it was detained by the defendant. The defendant objected to the testimony, on the ground that such damages were too speculative, remote, and contingent. The objection was sustained. The court said: "We are aware that there are circumstances under which one who, by a breach of contract, has delayed a sale until there is a fall in the marketable value of the property, may be charged as damages with the difference in price; but we do not see that such principle applies to a case where the only question is as to more or less profits, which as a whole as profits are excluded as too contingent, remote, and speculative." In commenting on the case of Hunt v. D'Orval, Dud. L. 180, the court uses this language: "In this latter well-considered case, it was held that 'for the breach of an executory contract, without fraud or imposition, the jury can only give such damages as fairly and naturally result from it, and which can be measured by a pecuniary standard; remote and consequential damages cannot be allowed.'"

We desire to call special attention to the fact that profits were excluded in the case of Sitton v. Macdonald, 25 S. C. 68, 60 Am. Rep. 484, on the ground that they were too contingent, remote, and speculative. Are anticipated profits in the case under consideration less contingent, remote, and speculative than in the case just mentioned? They are in their very nature problematical, conjectural, uncertain, indefinite, speculative, and remote. They are dependent upon many contingencies,—fluctuations in the market, caprice of purchasers, value of services employed in selling the articles, interest on capital invested, and various other circumstances that cannot be contemplated with any degree of certainty.

The rule for the admeasurement of damages is correctly set forth in Wallingford v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 53 S. C. 410, 31 S. E. 275. In that case the plaintiff brought an action for damages on account of the failure on the part of the telegraph company to deliver seasonably a message whereby the plaintiffs lost the sale of a lot of mules. Mr. Justice Jones thus states the principle in the admeasurement of damages: "The measure of damages in such a case as this is the difference between the market value of such mules on same terms at the time the message should have been delivered and the price offered, in case such market value was less than the price offered." It certainly cannot be successfully contended that the plaintiffs are entitled, not only to profits, but likewise to the difference in the amount paid for the mules and their market value at the time their cause of action accrued. The law does not allow both measures of damages in one case. We therefore conclude that either the rule for the admeasurement of damages laid down in Wallingford v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 53 S. C. 410, 31 S. E. 275, is erroneous, or the principle announced in the opinion of Mr. Justice Woods is wrong.

The rule stated in Wallingford v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 53 S. C. 410, 31 S. E. 275, should, for a stronger reason, be applied in this case, because the error in transmitting the telegram did not prevent the plaintiffs from becoming the purchasers of the mules, nor deprive them of the opportunity of making whatever profit they saw fit by a resale of the mules. The direct and proximate result of the error in sending the message was to cause the plaintiffs to purchase the mules, for which they had to pay a larger sum than they contemplated as the purchase money thereof, and the measure of their damages was the difference in the market value of the mules at the time their right of action accrued and the amount they were compelled to pay by reason of said error. This mode of admeasuring damages is more certain than determining the amount of anticipated profits supposed to have been lost by the error. In 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 611, it is said: "Where the damages may be estimated in more than one way, that mode should be adopted which is most definite and certain." The quotation which Mr. Justice Woods makes from 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1069, shows that when the person affected by an error in the transmission of a message is the purchaser, he is entitled to recover the increase in price which he is obliged to pay in consequence of the error; but it does not sustain the doctrine that the purchaser has the right to recover lost profits.

As I think the judgment of the circuit court should be reversed, I dissent from the opinion of Mr. Justice Woods.

CRoss APPEALS from a decree of the Court of Chancery Appeals reversing a decree of the Chancery Court for Anderson County which dismissed a bill filed to enforce a mechanic's lien on its railroad; the defendants appealing from so much of the decree as held that a lien existed; and plaintiffs appealing from so much as refused to recognize the lien for the full amount claimed. Reversed on plaintiffs' appeal.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Shields, Cates, & Mountcastle, for complainants:

The furnisher of material is only required to give his notice within ninety days from the time that the last material was furnished.

Wilkes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This bill seeks to fix a lien upon the railroad company for the cost of powder and other blasting material furnished to construct the railroad and blast a tunnel on its line known as "Dossett's tunnel."

Mason, Hoge, & Company had a contract with the railroad company to build the road, excavate the tunnel, and furnish all the necessary material for that purpose. They sublet the excavating and boring of this tunnel to Cole & Company, who, in terms, agreed to do all the work and furnish all necessary material and labor for that purpose. Cole & Company made a contract with each of the complainant companies, to wit, the Hercules Powder Company and the Repauno Chemical Company, by which they agreed to buy from these companies all of the explosives and explosive supplies which would be required in the excavation or boring of said tunnel.

The powder company furnished, under its contract, four bills or lots,—one October 13, 1902, amounting to $2,200; one May 27, 1903, $2,200; one July 8, 1903, $480; and the last September 18, 1903, $384.36.

Cole & Company paid on account $721.46, leaving due $4,543.90. All of the material bought by this company was used in the construction and boring of this tunnel.

The chemical company furnished in March, 1903, $4,534.03 of explosive material, and Cole & Company paid it on account $3,636.76, leaving a balance unpaid of $897.36.

About October 1, 1903, Cole & Company announced to its creditors that they were insolvent, and could not complete their contract with the railroad.

On October 10, 1903, each of complainant companies notified the railroad company that they had furnished explosive materials to Cole & Company, for which they had not been paid, as before stated, and that they claimed liens upon the railroad company for the amounts due them.

Upon the hearing the chancellor held that complainants had no lien for the explosive materials furnished Cole & Company as against the railroad, and dismissed the bill, and complainants appealed.

In the court of chancery appeals the majority of that court were of the opinion that explosives used in excavating a roadway through a tunnel in building a railroad was material within the meaning of the acts of 1883 and 1891, and that complainants under these acts were entitled to liens upon the railroad property, provided proper notices were given the railroad as provided by those acts.

It held, however, that the Repauno Chemical Company had not given such notice, and was entitled to no lien, and that the Hercules Powder Company was entitled only to a lien for the explosives furnished Cole & Company within ninety days of November 10, 1903, when notice of the lien was given the railroad company; and under this holding adjudged the powder company entitled to a judgment for $384.36.

The Hercules Powder Company assigns as errors that part of the holding and decree of the court of chancery appeals which finds and adjudges that it is only entitled to a lien upon the Knoxville, Lafollette, & Jellico Railroad Company's railroad and 67 L. R. A.

property for the blasting materials furnished to Cole & Company within ninety days from November 10, 1903, the date of said notice, and that it is not entitled to a lien for the whole balance due to it for blasting materials furnished under its said contract with Cole & Company, amounting to $4,543.90.

The court of chancery appeals found that G. H. Cole & Company agreed and contracted with the Hercules Powder Company to buy from it all of the explosives needed in the excavation of Dossett's tunnel under their contract with Mason, Hoge, & Company; that said explosives were to be furnished in the quantities and as ordered by G. H. Cole & Company, and were to be paid for within thirty days after they were used; that the Hercules Powder Company actually delivered goods to Cole & Company under said contract on September 18, 1903, and that on October 10, 1903, the Hercules Powder Company gave the notices required by the acts of 1891 of the fact that it had furnished said material and claimed said lien.

It is assigned as error that under these facts the court of chancery appeals should have held, and erred in not holding, that the contract to furnish said blasting material was an entirety, and that the Hercules Powder Company had ninety days from the date that the last material was delivered under said contract within which to give said notice, and that the giving of said notice on October 10, 1903, entitled the complainant to a lien for the full balance due to it for the material furnished as aforesaid, which is found by the court of chancery appeals to be the sum of $4,543.90.

The Repauno Chemical Company assigns as error that part of the decree of the court of chancery appeals which finds and adjudges that it is not entitled to a lien upon the Knoxville, Lafollette, & Jellico Railroad Company's railroad and property for the balance due it for the materials furnished by it to Cole & Company, with which to excavate said Dossett's tunnel. It is claimed that said court should have held, and erred in not holding, that the Repauno Chemical Company was entitled to a lien upon said railroad company's railroad and property under chapter 220, p. 296, of the Acts of 1883, as amended by chapter 98, p. 215, of the Acts of 1891, and should have decreed, and erred in not decreeing, that complainant was entitled to have said railroad company's railroad and property sold for the satisfaction and payment of complainant's said claim.

The court of chancery appeals based its decree denying the Repauno Chemical Company said lien on the ground that it did not deliver any of said material within ninety days of the date of its said notice to the railroad company that it claimed said lien. With reference to the facts governing this claim the court of chancery appeals said:

"The complainant Repauno Chemical Company made a contract with Cole & Company, as before stated, to furnish all the explosives and explosive supplies needed in their contract with Mason, Hoge, & Company, and all the material actually furnished under this contract by the Repauno Chemical Company was shipped on March 9 and March 17, 1903, to Cole & Company, and aggregated in value the sum of $4,534.03. Under its contract with Cole & Company the powder used in each month was to be paid for by Cole & Company in the following month. Cole & Company are entitled to credit on said amount of $3,636.76, leaving a balance due the Repauno Chemical Company of $897.27.

"About October 1, 1903, Cole & Company announced to their creditors that they were insolvent, and could not complete their contract. At this time Cole & Company had ordered other goods from the Repauno Chemical Company under their contract with it and said goods were in transit to Cole & Company. The delivery of the same, however, was stopped by the Repauno Chemical Company upon receiving information that Cole & Company were insolvent, and they afterwards sold to Mason, Hodge, & Company."

The Repauno Chemical Company gave its notice October 10, 1903.

The complainants assign as error that part of the decree of the court of chancery appeals dismissing the bill as to the Repauno Chemical Company, and denying the Hercules Powder Company a lien for the full amount of the balance due it for explosive materials furnished to G. H. Cole & Company and in taxing complainants with a part of the costs.

It is contended that the court of appeals should have found and decreed, and erred in not finding and decreeing, that the complainants were entitled to a lien against the railroad and property of the Knoxville, La-follette, & Jellico Railroad Company for the full amount of the respective claims sued for by them in this cause, together with interest and all the costs of this cause.

The defendant, by its assignments of error, and in defending against complainants' assignments, raises the question whether the explosive supplies furnished by complainants constitute material within the sense and meaning of the statutes and laws of 67 L. R. A.

Tennessee relating to liens of furnishers of materials used in the construction of railroads as set out in the acts of 1883 and 1891.

The complainants rely for their liens upon the provisions of the Acts of 1883, chap. 220, p. 296, the 1st section of which is in the words and figures following: "Section 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the state of Tennessee, that where any railroad company contracts with any person or persons, for the grading of its roadway, the construction or repair of its culverts and bridges, the furnishing of cross-ties, the laying of its track, the erection of its depots, platforms, wood or water stations, section houses, machine shops, or other buildings, or for the delivery of material for any of these purposes, or for engineering or superintendence, there shall be a lien upon such railroad in favor of the person or persons with whom the railroad company contracts for the performance of the work, or the delivery of the materials to the amount of the debts contracted therefor, which lien shall continue in force for six months after the performance of the work or the delivery of the material, and until the terminal of any suit commenced within the time for its enforcement;" and upon the provisions of chapter 98, p. 215, of the Acts of 1891.

That act provides, in substance, as follows: "Section 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the state of Tennessee that § 3 of the act passed March 29, 1883, as referred to in the caption of this bill, the same being § 2778 of Milliken and Vertrees' Compilation of the Laws of Tennessee, be and the same is hereby so amended as to provide that hereafter every subcontractor, laborer, material man, or other person who performs any part of the work in grading any railroad company's roadbed," etc., "or for the delivery of material for any of these purposes, . . . all and every such person or persons shall have a lien on such railroad, its franchises, and property for the value of such work and labor done, or material furnished, or services rendered as hereinbefore set out and specified, in as full and ample a manner as is now provided by law for persons contracting directly with such railroad company for any such work and labor done."

In other words, the act of 1891 was passed for the express purpose of extending to all subcontractors and furnishers of material the same lien that was guaranteed by the act of 1883 to persons contracting directly with the railroad company.

For the railroad it is insisted that the term "materials," as used in these acts, means something which enters into the construction of the roadway and forms a part of it, and cannot be held to apply to such material as is consumed in constructing the roadway, and, being consumed, it constitutes no part of the roadbed or roadway after it is constructed.

We are of opinion that the general assembly intended to give persons who furnished materials for grading the roadbed a lien, as well as those who furnished such material as was used in the superstructure placed upon the roadbed after it was graded, such as cross-ties, culverts, etc.

The fact that the materials were consumed in the use, and were thus destroyed in the construction, we think does not deprive the furnisher of his lien. The consumption of explosives is the only use that can be made of them, and their consumption is absolutely necessary to the excavation of tunnels through rock. In other words, they are material which enter into the building and grading of the road, as much so as trestles, bridges, and culverts, contain materials which are necessary to the grading of the road at such places as require trestles and bridges and culverts.

It is difficult to see what other material than explosives could be used in boring a tunnel and grading a road through stone.

While the general definition of the word "materials," as given by the lexicographers, may not go to this extent, and there are some cases holding, apparently, a different doctrine, we think the word must be defined in the connection and for the purposes for which it is used and intended to be applied.

In Knapp v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 6 Mo. App. 210, the court said: "The theory of statutory liens of this class [on railroads] is that the laborer or material man is entitled to a certain beneficial interest or security in the structure whose value is increased by his labor or materials actually incorporated therewith."

Yet in the later case of Rapauno Chemical Co. v. Greenfield & N. R. Co. 59 Mo. App. 6, it was said, construing a Missouri statute similar to ours, as follows: "The rule to be deduced from the foregoing authorities is that, in order to maintain a lien for materials furnished, it is not necessary in all cases that such materials should actually have gone into the structure and formed a part thereof. It is sufficient if their use was necessary, and they were in fact used or consumed in the making of the improvements. Hence we think that the argument is unsound that the lien in the case here must fail because the powder was entirely consumed, and therefore could not have been actually incorporated in the work." 07 L. R. A.

Such a construction of the statute we conceive to be a strained one, and not within its equity or spirit. What was said on this subject by the supreme court in the case of Simmons v. Carrier, 60 Mo. 581, must be read in the light of the particular facts of that case. There the claim was for lumber. The court held that a lien could not be maintained for such material unless it actually entered into the construction of the building. This was undoubtedly a proper construction of the statute as applicable to lumber and such like materials to be used in or on the improvements; but, in our opinion, it is unreasonable to apply such a test to powder which is entirely consumed in its use."

The lien statute of Missouri (Rev. Stat. 1889, § 6741) reads as follows: "All persons who shall do any work or labor in houses, depots, bridges, or culverts of any railroad company, incorporated under the laws of this state or owning or operating a railroad within this state, and all persons who shall furnish ties, fuel, bridges, or material to such railroad company, shall have, for the work done and labor performed, and for the material furnished, a lien," etc.

The question under consideration has been before the New York courts. Hazard Powder Co. v. Byrnes, 21 How. Pr. 189. The statute of New York provides that any person who shall, in conformity with the terms of the contract between the owner and contractor, furnish to the contractor any materials in building any house or building shall have a lien on the improvement. In the case above cited the plaintiff claimed a lien for powder and fuses furnished the contractor for the purpose of blasting rock preparatory to laying the foundation walls for the defendant's building. In delivering the opinion of the court, Judge Hilton said: "I think the fair and reasonable interpretation of such language is that the right of lien extends to all such materials as ordinarily enter into or are used in the construction of buildings, and which are within the express or implied terms of the building contract made between the owner and contractor. Wood v. Donaldson, 17 Wend. 550; McDermott v. Palmer, 8 N. Y. 383. Here the contract imposed upon the builder the duty of removing rock from the surface of the land preparatory to laying the foundation walls, and hence the powder and fuses furnished became necessary for the purpose of blasting the rock and enabling the contractor to construct the contemplated building. Such materials, when thus impliedly contracted for, and actually furnished and used, must, I think, be classed within the list of things which

In Colorado there is a lien statute applicable particularly to mines, wherein it is provided that any person furnishing "timber or other materials to be used in or about the mines shall have a lien therefor." In Keystone Min. Co. v. Gallagher, 5 Colo. 23, one of the claimants had furnished powder, steel, and candles, which were used in working the mine, and for which he claimed a lien on the mine. In disposing of the objections made to this claim the court said: "It is objected that the decree as to Boettcher's claim is erroneous, because the articles furnished by him were not of the character comprehended by the lien law, specifying 'timber or other materials to be used in or about the mine.' The testimony shows that the articles furnished were powder, steel, and candles for the use of the mine. These articles are as clearly within the meaning of the statute as anything we can conceive of essential to the working of a mine."

In the last edition of Mr. Elliott's Work on Railroads, under the heading, "For what lien may be obtained," the rule is laid down as follows: "The nature of the claim for which a lien may be acquired depends, of course, upon the governing statute in each particular case. It is generally required that the labor should be performed or the material used in the construction of the road. Under such a statute it has been held that giant powder furnished to be used, and used, by the contractor in constructing the road is 'material' for the value of which a lien may be acquired; but a lien cannot be obtained for machinery furnished to a contractor to be used in doing the work upon a bridge. under a statute authorizing a lien for all materials 'used in and about' the construction of the bridge. So, of course, groceries and food furnished for the workmen, while in a sense used in the construction of the road, are not materials which so enter into its construction that a lien can be based upon them." Elliott, Railroads, p. 1597, § 1068.

All of the decisions upon this subject draw a clear distinction between the explosives and explosive supplies used in the construction of a railroad company's roadway, and which are necessarily consumed in the use thereof, and machinery and tools furnished for that purpose, which are held to be a part of the contractor's plant, and which do not go into the building of the roadway, but retain their identity and fitness for future use, saving the limited and gradual wear and tear incident to such use. 67 L. R. A.

The explosives which are necessarily consumed in the use are held to be liens, while the tools and equipment which constitute the contractor's plant do not constitute liens under the several lien statutes. This distinction is forcibly drawn and fully discussed in the case of Giant Powder Co. v. Oregon P. R. Co., reported in 8 L. R. A. 700, 14 Sawy. 560, 42 Fed. 474. In that case the Giant Powder Company brought suit to recover the value of powder sold by it for use, which was used in the construction of the roadway of the Oregon Pacific Railway Company, and to have the same declared a lien upon the defendant's railroad and property under § 1 of the acts of the Oregon legislature for the year 1885.

In deciding that case, Judge Deady, of the United States circuit court, said: "Was this material 'used' in the construction of this section on this road, within the meaning of this statute? In Basshor v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 65 Md. 99, 3 Atl. 285, cited by counsel for the demurrer, it was held, under a statute giving a lien on a bridge for all materials 'used in or about' its construction, that a person furnishing a contractor with machinery wherewith to build a bridge could not have such lien. Admitting the correctness of this decision, as I do, the cases are not, in my judgment, parallel. The machinery and appliances furnished the contractor in that case, although 'used' in the construction of the bridge, did not enter into the structure and become a part of it. They were the contractor's 'plant,' and retained their identity and fitness for further use, saving the limited and gradual wear and tear incident to such use. This powder was not only 'used' in the construction of this road, but it was thereby necessarily consumed, and it was so intended. It was furnished to be so used in the construction of this road. Nice questions may arise as to whether material is 'used' in the construction of a road as a tool or plant simply, or so used and consumed as to entitle the furnisher to a lien on the result for its value. The food furnished a contractor for his workmen may be said to be 'used' and 'consumed' in the construction of the road on which they work, but this is only so in a remote and consequential way or sense. The food does not enter directly into the structure, and is not so used. Mason work may be done on a road in a dry country or season, when large quantities of water must be hauled many miles for the preparation of the necessary mortar. Upon the completion of the structure and the hardening of the mortar the water has as thoroughly disappeared as the powder after the blast. Again, lumber may be used in the construction of a building for the purpose of scaffolding. However, it does not thereby literally enter into the composition of the building, nor, so to speak, become a part of it. But, in my judgment, both it and the water have been 'used' in the construction of the building and mason work, within the meaning of the lien law, and the purpose for which it was enacted. And so I think this powder was 'used' in the construction of this section of the road, whereby it was consumed, not gradually and incidentally as a tool or part of a contractor's plant, but wholly and at once, in aiding to clear and fix the roadway for the reception of the ties and rails."

It may be that the statutes under which these decisions are made are somewhat broader than our own statute, but the principle involved is the same, and to such statutes the courts will give a liberal construction in favor of the laborer or material man.

Thus, in Bladen v. Marietta & N. G. R. Co. 97 Tenn. 393, 37 S. W. 135, it was held, construing the act of 1891, that a book-keeper of a bridge contractor and the cook and cook's helpers employed by him for the bridge gang had a lien on the railroad for salary and wages under the provision giving a lien to anyone who performs any valuable service, manual or professional, by which any railroad company receives a benefit.

We are of opinion, therefore, that explosives used in blasting rock in tunnels and in the grading of the road are materials for which, under the act, the furnisher is entitled to a lien.

We pass now to the question whether complainants gave the notice which the statute requires.

The provision of the statute in regard to notice is: "Provided, that within ninety days after such work and labor is done or completed, or such materials are furnished, or such services are rendered, such subcontractor, laborer, material man, or other person or persons rendering the hereinbefore-mentioned service, shall notify in writing any such railroad company," etc.

The shipments by the Hercules Powder Company to Cole & Company were made as follows: October 13, 1902, $2,200; May 27, 1903, $2,200; July 8, 1903, $480; and September 18, 1903, $384.36. Only the last sale and shipment of $384.36 was delivered within the ninety days next before the notice was given, November 10, 1903.

It is evident that the account between the powder company and Cole & Company was a running account; that the powder was furnished from time to time as was demanded by Cole & Company; and the sales were 67 L. R. A.

not separate and distinct, but the contract was an entirety, to be performed by shipments from time to time as might be desired.

The whole of the explosives furnished by the Repauno company were furnished before the ninety days. A shipment made within the ninety days was stopped in transit, and it is not in controversy in this case. On October 10, 1903, Cole & Company notified their creditors of their insolvency. At that time the Repauno Chemical Company had a shipment in transit to them, which was stopped only because of this insolvency. It was being shipped in pursuance of that company's contract to furnish the explosives, and, if they had been received, the case presented would be identical with that of the powder company, as the Repauno Chemical Company gave their notice on the same day, November 10th.

We think that this contract must also be regarded as an entirety, and in each case the ninety days must be reckoned from the date of the last shipment in pursuance of the entire contract.

The fact that the last shipment was not delivered was due to the abandonment of the work by Cole & Company and their notice of insolvency, and within ten days after the contract was terminated by the wrongful conduct of Cole & Company, and within ten days from the time when the last delivery would have been made but for their failure, the notice was given.

Under the construction given to this act by the court of chancery appeals with reference to the claims of both of the complainants, in order to obtain a lien under said act it is necessary that furnishers of material should give notice every time within ninety days after they deliver a wagon or a car load of material, although they had an agreement with the contractor to furnish all of the material necessary to complete the contract. Not only this, but, carrying this construction forward to the other parties who are given liens by said acts, it would be necessary for the laborer, or engineer, or superintendent, in whose favor liens are provided by said acts, to give notice within ninety days after the end of each day's work, although they continue to work and had a contract to work until the whole contract was completed.

Section 3540 of Shannon's Code gives liens to furnishers of material for the erection of buildings and improvements on real estate, provided notice is given within thirty days to the owner of the property; and this court had held that the furnisher of material has thirty days after the last articles furnished for said improvements were delivered, or thirty days after the completion of the contract, within which to give said notice. Daniel v. Weaver, 5 Lea, 393; Green v. Williams, 92 Tenn. 220, 19 L. R. A. 478, 21 S. W. 520; Cole Mfg. Co. v. Falls, 92 Tenn. 607, 22 S. W. 856.

In the case of Basham v. Toors, 51 Ark. 309, 11 S. W. 282, the supreme court of that state said: Where a contractor abandons a contract when partially completed, the time for presentation of subcontractors' notice begins to run from such abandonment, and not from the completion of the building by the owner under another contract.

The contract in reference to notice, where the contract is an entirety, is laid down in Phillips on Mechanics' Liens, 2d ed. p. 530, as follows:

"So, where a party furnishes materials for a building at different times, but in pursuance of one contract, he is in time if he commence proceedings to establish his lien within the period allowed by the statute, counting from the date of the last act done in execution of the contract. As where persons made a contract in May, 1857, with machinists, for all machinery and materials required to build a mill, and received them all at that time excepting the bolting cloth, it being uncertain what kind of cloth would be needed, they informed the machinist that they would order it from them afterwards, which was done, and received in the following September. The machinists commenced proceedings to enforce their lien within the statutory period, counting from the last item, but not if from the former; and it was held that, as the cloth had been furnished under the same contract as the other materials, the proceedings were commenced in time to enforce the lien for the whole amount of materials furnished."

So where, in the fall of 1868, plaintiffs contracted with W. to furnish him lumber for the erection of a new dwelling house and the repair of an old one, and they commenced furnishing lumber for that purpose the same season, and continued doing so until the last day of August, 1868. In August, 1868, W. became owner of a second lot immediately adjoining that first mentioned, and removed the old house upon it, and made the repairs on said house in the spring of 1869. In that spring, also, the contract for lumber was enlarged by plaintiffs agreeing to furnish lumber to build a barn. It was held that, for the purpose of enforcing the lien against W., it was but a single contract for the whole lumber, and the time within which it could be enforced was to be counted from the last delivery.

But it is said that the Repauno Chemical Company cannot recover, because all the material furnished by it was not used in the excavation of said tunnel by Cole & Company. It is true that Cole & Company did sell $1,332 of explosives that had been furnished to them by the Repauno Chemical Company, and the court of chancery appeals so finds, but with reference to this sale the court of chancery appeals says: "The proof does not make it appear when this sale was made to Walton, Wilson, & Company and it also fails to show whether or not the explosives sold by Cole & Company to said Walton, Wilson, & Company were paid for to the Repauno Chemical Company out of the actual cash paid by Cole & Company to said Repauno Chemical Company."

Section 1, chap. 98, p. 215, of the Acts of 1891, gives the lien claimed in this case to the material man "for the delivery of material for any of these purposes" (that is, for any of the improvements in the act); and all that is necessary, it is claimed, to entitle the furnisher to a lien, is that he should prove that he delivered said material to the contractor or subcontractor in good faith, to be used for any of the purposes provided for in said act.

In the case of Stewart-Chute Lumber Co. v. Missouri P. R. Co. 28 Neb. 39, 44 N. W. 48, the supreme court of Nebraska, quoting their own act, and deciding the question now under consideration, said, in substance: Under Neb. Comp. Stat. 1887, chap. 54, § 2, which provides that, "when material shall have been furnished or labor performed in the construction, repair, and equipment of any railroad, canal, bridge, viaduct, or other similar improvement, such labor and material man, contractor, or subcontractor shall have a lien therefor," the lien of a material man attaches upon the delivery in good faith of the material to the contractor or subcontractor, and it is not necessary that the material furnished should have been actually used in the improvement.

Plaintiff furnished lumber and other material to a subcontractor for the erection of shanty boarding houses for his men and stables for his horses. These shanties and stables were not erected on the right of way, but at convenient points 150 yards from the line of the road. Held, that the lumber and other materials so supplied was material furnished in the construction of the railroad within the meaning of the Nebraska statute, and that plaintiff was entitled to a lien therefor. See 39 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. p. 566.

The question presented upon this feature of the case is one of extreme difficulty. The act gives the lien "for the delivery of the material." It nowhere makes a condition that the material shall be used in the com-struction of the road. It clearly contemplates that the delivery shall be in good faith for purposes of construction. But does it require that the furnisher shall follow up his material, and see that it is actually used in the construction? To hold this doctrine would well-nigh defeat the lien, since the furnisher would be obligated with a duty which would be burdensome, if not impossible, to comply with.

On the other hand, it is a hardship to hold the road liable for material that it did not get the benefit of, and to fix the lien upon its property, although such material was neither used nor consumed upon it.

The question is rendered still more difficult in this case by the indefinite findings of fact by the court of chancery appeals. That court finds that not all of the material furnished by the Repauno company was used upon the road, but that $1,332 worth of explosives furnished by them were sold by Cole & Company to Walton, Wilson, & Company. They do not find that the explosives for which the present charge is made were not used in constructing the road. They do not find that Walton, Wilson, & Company did not pay for the material they bought to Cole & Company, and that Cole & Company did not turn over the proceeds to the Repauno company. So that we have no definite finding of fact that the explosives for which recovery is now sought were not used upon the road. Now, if the delivery alone is the act which gives the lien, the chemical company is entitled to their lien.

Our mechanic's lien law provides that every journeyman or other person employed by such mechanic, founder, or machinist to work on the buildings, fixtures, machinery, or improvements, or to furnish machinery for the same, shall have a lien, etc., and this court, in construing this act, said: "It is not the actual use of lumber in repairs to a building by the owner that gives the furnisher a lien, but the furnishing under a contract for that use, and the lien exists whether the lumber was used or not." Daniel v. Weaver, 5 Lea, 392.

That was a case, however, where the material was furnished to the lessee of a mill-dam, and the court held that the lien would extend to the leasehold interest, but not to the owner's or lessor's interest in the premises. In that case the material was furnished to the party against whom the lien was sought, but here it was delivered to a subcontractor, who stood two removes from the railroad, against whom the lien was sought.

The question resolves itself into this: Who shall be responsible for the good faith of the subcontractor who buys the material, 67 L. R. A.

and to whom it is delivered,—the furnisher, who sells the material, or the railroad, which expects to use it and receive benefit from it?

The subcontractor, while not the agent of the road, stands in the place of the railroad company as to the construction of the road, and does his work under the superintendence and direction of the road authorities. It is to be presumed that they will, better than anyone else, know what materials go into the construction of the road, and certainly better than the furnisher, who never gets to the premises, and is not concerned further than to sell and get pay for his material.

In addition, the railroad has ample opportunity to protect itself against such defaults by taking proper bonds from its contractors, while, if a furnisher were required to protect himself by such bonds, it would prevent him in many, if not all, cases from making sales.

Without deciding this question, we are content to hold, under the findings of the court of chancery appeals, that this material for which the present action is brought was in good faith delivered to Cole & Company to be used on the railroad, and there is no definite proof that it was not so used.

The result is that both companies are entitled to the amount sued for, and interest, and all costs, and for these amounts liens are declared, and a decree will be entered accordingly reversing and modifying the decree of the Court of Chancery Appeals and the decree of the chancellor.

An appellate court may, instead of reversing a judgment for damages in an action for tort in which the verdict is so excessive as to evince passion, prejudice, or caprice, require the prevailing party to remit the portion which it deems excessive upon penalty of a reversal for refusal to comply, and affirm the judgment for the smaller amount in case the plaintiff assents to it.

NOTE.—As to power of appellate court to require remittitur of excessive damages, see also, in this series, Burdick v. Missouri P. R. Co. 26 L. R. A. 384, and note, and the later case of Sloane v. Southern California R. Co. 32 L. R. A. 193.

(October 8, 1904.)

A PPEALS by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Hamilton County in favor of plaintiffs in actions brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed on condition of remittitur.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Shepherd & Frierson for appellant.

Messrs. Thomas & Thomas, for appellee:

Where a verdict has been reached, and the trial judge has approved the fact of the verdict, its amount will not be disturbed by the appellate court, unless it is made to appear, from the record, that there was a manifest abuse of their trust by the jury, such as to indicate passion, prejudice, partiality, or unaccountable caprice or corruption.

It is not the province of either the trial judge or the appellate court to interfere with a verdict, even though thought by them to be excessive upon the facts, unless, in their opinion, it is so excessive as to indicate passion or prejudice.

Tennessee Coal & R. Co. v. Roddy, 85 Tenn. 400, 5 S. W. 286.

Wilkes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These are two separate cases heard together in the court below by consent, and involving damages for personal injuries caused by a collision between the cars of the Rapid Transit Company and the Alabama Great Southern Railroad Company. The plaintiffs are both minors, Faustina at the time of the injury being about thirteen years of age, and Edista being about nine years old. The suit was brought for the benefit of the minors by their father as next friend against the Alabama Great Southern Railroad Company, the Rapid Transit Company, and the Belt Line Company. There was a verdict in favor of the latter two, but against the Alabama Great Southern Railroad Company, in favor of Faustina for $2,000, and in favor of Edista for $800, and the railroad has appealed and assigned as the only error that the verdict in each case is so excessive as to evince passion, prejudice, or caprice on the part of the jury. Counsel for the railroad company admitted that his company was liable for some damages, and expressed his willingness to pay what was reasonable, and that the jury might fix the amount.

There was no claim made in the case for vindictive, punitive, or exemplary damages. The court below ruled that only compensatory damages could be received under the agreement of the parties, and to this there was no exception by plaintiff.

The court charged the jury to take into consideration the mental and physical pain and suffering resulting to each from the accident, and let their verdict be for a reasonable compensation for the actual injuries sustained in each case, taking into consideration the mental and physical pain and suffering, and from the proof determine whether the injuries received were permanent or temporary, looking to the proof to ascertain the nature, character, and extent of the injuries in each case, and from the proof make up their report.

No exception was made to this charge in the court below, nor is any made in this court.

Counsel for the plaintiff, in his brief, states that the proof in the court below was confined to the mere question of compensatory damages, and insists that the amount found is only compensatory, and not subject to the assignment that it is so excessive as to evince passion, prejudice, or caprice on the part of the jury.

We have before us, therefore, cases of verdicts upon facts which, it is conceded, make a case of liability in which the element of exemplary or punitive damages is not involved, but only what is compensatory for personal injuries. The liability of the defendant being conceded, the only question is whether the amounts found by the jury for the two girls are so excessive as to evince passion, prejudice, and caprice on the part of the jury; and in our opinion they are so excessive as to fall within the rule, and should be abated—that of plaintiff Faustina from $2,000 to $1,250, and that of Edista from $800 to $400; and for these amounts only, together with all costs, are they entitled to judgment.

This court therefore suggests to plaintiff's counsel that the recoveries be reduced to these amounts; and, in the event they consent thereto, judgments will be so entered, and ten days is granted to them, and each of them, respectively, to accept or reject this suggestion. In the event either of said plaintiffs, by their attorneys, shall not accept this suggestion of the court, and agree thereto, the judgment of the lower court will be reversed as to such one, and a new trial awarded as to her, and the appellee not agreeing will pay costs of her appeal.

Inasmuch as this is to some degree a new practice in Tennessee, the court deems it proper to state the reasons for adopting it and the law applicable to it.

It has heretofore been held that, when a verdict of a jury is special, and a certain part thereof is not lawfully recoverable, this court will allow the verdict to stand if a remittitur is entered as to the objectionable part. Memphis v. Kimbrough, 12 Heisk. 133. So, when there is apparent an error of calculation in an action of debt, this court will not reverse and remand, but will remit the erroneous part. McKinley v. Beasley, 5 Sneed, 170. See also Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Wallace, 91 Tenn. 35, 14 L. R. A. 548, 17 S. W. 882.

When the judgment in the court below is for an amount greater than that laid in the suit and declaration, this court will reverse unless the appellee remit the excess, as he might have done in the court below. Crabb v. Nashville Bank, 6 Yerg. 332. So when a verdict is based upon several items, and is divisible, this court may remit so as to reduce the total amount by such items as have been improperly allowed by the jury. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Wallace, 91 Tenn. 35, 14 L. R. A. 548, 17 S. W. 882.

This is perhaps the full extent to which this court has heretofore gone in causing or suggesting remittiturs; and the usual practice in damage suits for personal injuries, when there is a gross verdict or judgment to cover all damages, has been, in case the verdict is so excessive as to evince passion, prejudice, or caprice on the part of the jury, to set aside the judgment and verdict and award a new trial. The consequence has been to prolong litigation, to swell bills of cost, to delay final adjudication, and, in a large number of instances, to have such excessive judgments repeated over and over, upon the new trial. It is believed that this is a result which may be remedied by adopting the practice herein suggested, and which already prevails in the majority of the states of the Union. This practice will conform to that of the court below, and we can see no good reason why it should not prevail.

The rule in the lower court is that the trial judge may suggest a remittitur to the plaintiff, and, if he assents thereto, he may avoid a setting aside of the verdict and a new trial. Branch v. Bass, 5 Sneed, 366. But such remittitur cannot be entered over the protest of the successful plaintiff, and if he do not assent thereto the circuit judge must set aside the judgment and grant a new trial. Massadillo v. Nashville & K. R. Co. 89 Tenn. 661, 15 S. W. 445.

The general rule is stated as follows: The trial judge may, as the condition of denying the motion for a new trial, made by the defendant in an action of debt, require a remittitur of part of the verdict which he deems excessive, but it is optional with the plaintiff to comply with such condition or suffer a new trial. Young v. Cowden, 98 Tenn. 588, 590, 40 S. W. 1088, Citing Branch v. Bass, 5 Sneed, 366; Nashville & D. R. Co. v. Jones, 9 Heisk. 27; Massadillo v. Nashville & K. R. Co. 89 Tenn. 661, 15 S. W. 445; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Wallace, 91 Tenn. 35, 14 L. R. A. 548, 17 S. W. 882; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Garrett, 8 Lea, 450, 41 Am. Rep. 640; Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Foster, 10 Lea, 366, Approved in Western U. Tele. Co. v. Frith, 105 Tenn. 174, 58 S. W. 118.

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Garrett, 8 Lea, 438, 41 Am. Rep. 640, it was held to be an error, but not reversible under the facts of that case, to require a remittitur if the defendant would abide by the judgment and not appeal, and when the defendant would not agree the judgment was allowed to stand.

The defendant in case of remittitur cannot be required to abandon or waive his right of appeal as a condition to acceptance by plaintiff. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Foster, 10 Lea, 357; Tennessee Coal & R. Co. v. Roddy, 85 Tenn. 400, 5 S. W. 286.

These cases show the extent to which this court has gone in suggesting remittiturs in this court and approving remittiturs in the court below. As before stated, the practice in this court has heretofore been, in cases of excessive judgments for damages for personal injuries, to set them aside and remand for a new trial, if the verdict is so excessive as to evince passion, prejudice, or caprice. When the excess does not go to this extent, the verdict of the jury and judgment of the court below is not disturbed by this court. Tennessee Coal & R. Co. v. Roddy, 85 Tenn. 400, 5 S. W. 286.

The rule prevailing in a large number of states of the Union is that a remittitur may be required as well in this court as in the trial court. 18 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 137, and authorities there quoted.

It is also laid down in 18 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 125, that the great weight of authority is that a court may permit or require the entry of a remittitur in actions for unliquidated damages for torts. See cases cited. Again it is said: "It is also a very common practice for an appellate court, when it deems the damages recovered to be excessive, and this is the only error, to require a remittitur of the amount considered excessive as a condition to the affirmance of the judgment."

In support of this, a large number of cases are cited from the following states: Arkansas, California, Connecticut, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Maine, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, New York, Ohio, Oregon, Texas, Washington, Wisconsin, and cases from the Federal and United States Supreme Court. In many of these states the rule has been adopted in later cases over a contrary holding in earlier cases. Notably is this the case in Missouri, as is shown by the case of Burdick v. Missouri P. R. Co. 123 Mo. 221, 26 L. R. A. 384, 45 Am. St. Rep. 528, 27 S. W. 453.

This is a well-considered case and extensively annotated, and the different holdings in the several courts are distinguished and illustrated. In some states, as in Louisiana, it is held that the court has power to cut the verdict without the assent of the parties; but the great weight of authority is that it cannot be done over the protest of the successful plaintiff. See our own cases heretofore cited, especially Massadillo v. Nashville & K. R. Co. 89 Tenn. 661, 15 S. W. 445.

The doctrine of remittitur applies to damages in torts as well as to damages for breach of contract. The judge may set aside the verdict in such cases in toto. It follows that he may determine what would be a reasonable amount. Such is not a usurpation by the court of the province of the jury. The facts have been passed on by a jury, and the right to recover has been determined by the jury, and not by the court. The judge expresses his opinion as to the reasonableness of the amount, the plaintiff accedes to the justice of the judge's estimate, and agrees to accept it; and, while the judgment is for an amount smaller than that found by the jury, it is a judgment based upon facts which the jury have found fixes liability, and not upon facts found by the court. Branch v. Bass, 5 Sneed, 369; Young v. Cowden, 98 Tenn. 589, 40 S. W. 1088; Arkansas Valley Land & Cattle Co. v. Mann, 130 U. S. 69, 32 L. ed. 854, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 458; 18 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 127; Burdick v. Missouri P. R. Co. 123 Mo. 221, 26 L. R. A. 384, 45 Am. St. Rep. 528, 27 S. W. 453.

It may be said that this practice of requiring a remittitur is the exercise of original jurisdiction by this court; and, in the same connection, it may be said that, if this court has the right to reduce the judgment of the court below, it has the right to increase it. Neither of these objections is well grounded. This court cannot, and does not, render any judgment as an exercise of original jurisdiction when it reduces the verdict and judgment of the court below. 67 L. R. A.

It merely reviews and corrects the judgment rendered to the extent of the excess; and, as to this excess, it may very well be said there is no evidence to sustain it. But it cannot give judgment for an amount in excess of what the jury has found, which the jury has not found, for that would be the exercise of original jurisdiction.

In the cases of Hutchins v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 44 Minn. 5, 46 N. W. 79, it is said, in substance, that, while no court has any right to substitute its own estimate of the damages for that of a jury, yet it has the right to determine the amount beyond which there is no evidence, upon any reasonable view of the case, to support the verdict.

In a number of cases it has been held that when the damages are so excessive as to evince passion, prejudice, or caprice, the error cannot be corrected by remittitur, because such passion, prejudice, and caprice will be presumed to have permeated the entire verdict, and to have influenced or caused the finding of the question of any liability on the facts. See cases cited in 18 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 144.

We cannot admit the soundness of the view of these cases under our practice. If a jury, through passion, prejudice, and caprice has given a judgment, whether excessive or not, when the facts do not warrant any judgment, it is the practice of this court to set aside the verdict because there is no evidence to support it. But when the court can see that there is liability, and especially when that liability is conceded for some amount, as in the present case, and the only error is the amount of damages awarded, certainly there is no good reason to set aside the verdict in toto if justice and right can be reached by reducing the damages. There may be cases where a verdict for any amount whatever would evince passion, prejudice, or caprice, and these cases can readily be reached under the rule of this court to reverse when there is no evidence to support the verdict. The courts are not uniform in the mode of submitting or requiring remittiturs, and the practice in each state is modified by other rules touching the same errors.

We are of the opinion, therefore, that it is good law, sound policy, and no invasion of the rights of parties or the province of the jury, and no exercise of original jurisdiction, to adopt the practice of requiring remittiturs in this court at the option of the appellee, to the end that justice may be reached and an end put to litigation.

TEXAS COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEALS.

A. J. MOORE, Appt.,

v.

STATE of Texas.

(.....Tex. Crim. App.....)

1. Defendant in a criminal case may be required to testify that he had married the state's main witness just prior to the trial, even though he married her for the purpose of suppressing her testimony.
2. The state cannot place on the stand the wife of one on trial for a crime, and ask her questions as to the commission of the crime, for the purpose of forcing defendant to object to her testimony against him in order to prejudice his case, by supporting a theory that he married her to suppress her testimony under a statute making her incompetent to testify against him.

(Henderson, J., dissents.)

(June 23, 1903.)

NOTE.—Effect of marrying a witness in order to prevent her from testifying.

- I. Competency at common law, 409.
- II. Competency under statutory provisions, 501.

I. Competency at common law.

At common law a husband or wife was held incompetent to testify for or against each other. Several reasons have been given for this rule, as, that the testimony of such witnesses for each other would contradict the maxim, Nemo in propria causa testis esse debet, and, if they testified against each other, it would be contrary to another maxim, Nemo tenetur seipsum accusare. Another reason given for the enforcement of the rule was that it would be a cause of discord and dissention and the means of great inconvenience. An exception was early grafted upon this rule in prosecutions against the husband for unlawfully taking away and marrying an heiress, under 3 Hen. VII., chap. 2, making such offense a felony, and the weight of authority is that the woman was a competent witness in such a case, though some doubt has been expressed as to whether she would be competent if the cohabitation had been mutual and with her voluntary consent. The reasons for the adoption of this exception are various. It was early held to be an exception to the general rule that the wife could testify against the husband in matters of personal violence, beginning with Lord Audley's Trial, 8 How. St. Tr. 414, although some doubt has been thrown upon this case in T. Raym. 1, and 1 Vent. 244; and it was claimed that the abduction of an heiress was an act of violence continuing up to the time of the marriage. It was also asserted as a rule for allowing this exception that she, in reality, was not his wife, because consent was lacking; and it has been contended by some of the writers that this evidence was admissible under the maxim that no man can take advantage of his own wrong. Another ground for making this an exception to the general rule is laid down in 1 Hale's P. C. 301, that, if she APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Hill County convicting him of murder. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. C. M. Smithdeal for appellant.

Messrs. B. Y. Cummings, C. F. Greenwood, and Howard Martin for the State.

Davidson, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is the second appeal from a conviction of murder. Moore v. State, 44 Tex. Crim. Rep. 526, 72 S. W. 595. While testifying in his own behalf, appellant was permitted, over objections, to testify that he had married, on the day before his trial began, the state's witness Susie Jones. The bill is explained by the court as follows: "The court was then and is now of the opinion that the question and answer were proper, as the state had a right to show why was not competent, the statute would be vain and useless.

In 1 Bl. Com. 443, it was said: "But in trials of any sort they are not allowed to be evidence for or against each other: . . . But, where the offense is directly against the person of the wife, this rule has been usually dispensed with; and, therefore, by statute 3 Hen. VII., chap. 2, in case a woman be forcibly taken away and married, she may be a witness against such her husband, in order to convict him of felony. For in this case she can with no propriety be reckoned his wife; because a main ingredient, her consent, was wanting to the contract; and also there is another maxim of law, that no man shall take advantage of his own wrong, which the ravisher here would do if, by forcibly marrying a woman, he could prevent her from being a witness, who is perhaps the only witness to that very fact."

The author was evidently mistaken in using the word "by statute 3 Hen. VII.," or else he used the word "by" as synonymous with the word "under," as she was competent in prosecutions under the statute, but was not made competent by the statute.

In Wakefield's Case, 2 Lewin, C. C. 1, 279, which was a prosecution for conspiring to take away an heiress against her will and to cause her to marry one of the defendants, the wife, who had been decoyed into the marriage, was offered as a witness. It was objected that the validity of the marriage could be established by other evidence than that of voir dire, and the defendant sought to prove the validity of the marriage so as to exclude his wife. But it was held that she was a competent witness upon the voir dire, and was required to testify to the facts on the ground that the wife was competent to testify against her husband in all cases affecting her liberty and person. The court said: "It would be unreasonable to exclude the only person capable of giving evidence in certain cases of injury. Our law recognizes witnesses ex necessitate; and it would be strange, indeed, that the husband should be allowed to exercise every atrocity against the Susie Jones, the only immediate eyewitness to the homicide, was not put on the stand; and this tended to show that fact." That appellant had married the main state's witness on the day before his trial began is a legitimate subject of inquiry, and it was not error to require defendant to state that fact while testifying in his own behalf, even though he married her, as insisted by the court, for the purpose of suppressing her testimony.

The state also placed Sheriff Satterfield upon the stand, and asked him if Susie Jones was then in attendance upon the court. He stated he did not know whether she was present or not, whereupon the county attorney required the witness to go out and ascertain whether she was present in attendance upon the trial. After going to the witness's room, he returned with Susie Jones. After he had brought her in the courtroom, the county attorney placed her upon the witness stand. Objection was urged because it had already been shown that she was the wife of appellant, and the state had no right to call her to the witness stand; that it was done for no legitimate purpose, and only for the purpose of prejudicing defendant in the minds of the jury. The court failed to rule upon these objections, "and the county attorney proceeded to ask said Susie Jones certain questions with reference to this case; and the defendant was compelled to and did object to said Susie Jones testifying on the ground that she was his wife, and therefore not a wife, and her evidence not be admitted. . . . I am not convinced, by what Mr. M'Niel has said, that this marriage is valid in Scotland. If it is not, the witness, Miss Turner, is admissible, of course. If not, I still think her so, for the reasons I have stated."

In Queen v. Yore, 1 Jebb. & S. 563, on an indictment for fraudulently alluring and carrying away, against the will of the mother, an heiress, and marrying her, it was objected that the wife was not a competent witness against the accused because she was his wife; and on the further ground that she had an interest in convicting him, under 10 Geo. IV., chap. 34, § 23, providing that her property, upon conviction, should be vested in trustees for her sole use. It was held that the wife was a competent witness. The court did not discuss the competency at length, but followed Wakefield's Case, 2 Lewin, C. C. 1, 279. The prosecution contended that, on general principle, a wife could not give evidence against her husband on the ground that it would give rise to domestic disturbances, but claimed that the rule did not extend to the case of a wife de facto, and that such evidence in this case was admissible from necessity, and that the traverser had no right by his own criminal act to exclude her testimony.

In Brown's Case, 1 Vent. 243, the wife, of the age of fourteen years, was held to be a competent witness on an indictment for forcibly taking her away and marrying her, she being an heiress. The court said: "First, for that there was one continuing force upon her, from the beginning till the marriage, wherefore, whatsoever was done while she was under that violence was not to be respected. Secondly, As such cases are generally contrived, so heinous a crime would go unpunished, unless the testimony of the woman should be received."

And in Fulwood's Case, Cro. Car. 482, 484, 488, 493, the defendants were indicted for violently and with force taking and carrying away an heiress, a ward of chancery, and marrying her to one of the defendants. The wife was introduced as a witness, and objection does not seem to have been made as to her competency. In this case it was pretended that she married him by reason of his threats, and when she was in such fear that she did not know what she did.

But in Rex v. Locker, 5 Esp. 107, which was an indictment against defendants for conspiracy in procuring a young lady, a ward of chancery, to marry one Locker, the counsel for another defendant proposed to call Mrs. Locker to show that his client was not guilty; but it was held that she was not admissible on the ground that the wife could not be called as "an evidence for or against her husband." Lord Ellenborough said: He was clearly of opinion that she was not admissible. A joint crime was imputed, in which her husband was implicated; and who would be benefited by it? It was a clear rule of the laws of England that a wife could not be called as an evidence for or against her husband, except in the excepted case of Lord Audley; and, whether her evidence was mediately or immediately to affect him, the legal objection equally applied.

And in Rex v. Serjeant, Ryan & M. 352, where it was held that a husband was not a competent witness in a prosecution of the wife for conspiracy in procuring the husband to marry, it was said: "There is no doubt but the wife was a competent witness in the cases which have been cited from the State Trials; and in King v. Perry (1795) 1 Hawk. P. C. chap. 41, § 13, a case of abduction tried before the late Chief Justice Gibbs when recorder of Bristol, the evidence of the wife was received. But these cases are very distinguishable from the present. Rex v. Locker, 5 Esp. 107, has decided that, in an indictment for a conspiracy in procuring a lady, then a ward of chancery, to marry, the wife was not a competent witness for one of the codefendants, if her evidence might inure to the acquittal of her husband. I think, therefore, upon the whole, it is the safest course in the present case not to receive the evidence of the husband. In the case tried before Lord Chief Justice Gibbs, to which I have alluded, the wife was called as a witness for her husband, and that learned judge stated that he could see no distinction between admitting a wife for or against her husband, that the principle was exactly the same; and I entirely concur in his opinion. King v. Perry was much talked about at the time, and Chief Justice Gibbs expressed his surprise that any doubt should have been entertained that a wife was in all cases a competent witness for her husband when admissible against him."

In 4 Bl. Com. 208, it was said: "It is held that a woman thus taken away and married may be sworn and give evidence against the offender, though he is her husband de facto, competent witness." The court finally sustained this objection. The court says that the reason he failed to rule upon the first objection was that there was nothing upon which to rule, "and the court could not know what state's counsel wanted to know, what Susie Jones was present for, and did not feel authorized and required to prevent the county attorney from asking the sheriff, in the presence of the jury, whether Susie Jones was present and in attendance upon the court, nor from placing her on the witness stand. Defendant, while on the stand, had stated that he had married Susie the day before, but this was by no means conclusive; and when Susie was placed on the stand, and objection made to her testifying on the ground that she was the wife of defendant, the court then asked her if she had been married to defendant, and upon her answering that she had been and was his wife the court sustained the objection. The state certainly had the right to explain why the only immediate eyewitness to the shooting was not placed upon the stand by the state. Besides this, the state had the right to show by her that she was not the wife of defendant, and competent to testify; and, if she had answered that she had not been married to defendant and not his wife, she could have testified, notwithstanding defendant's statement, the question being one for the jury in case of an issue of the kind." The witness Satterfield could have been required to testify that Susie Jones was in attendance upon the trial and in the jury contrary to the general rule of law, because he is no husband de jure, in case the actual marriage was also against her will. In cases, indeed, where the actual marriage is good, by the consent of the inveigled woman, obtained after her forcible abduction, Sir Matthew Hale seems to question how far her evidence should be allowed; but other authorities seem to agree that it should even then be admitted, esteeming it absurd that the offender should thus take advantage of his own wrong, and that the very act of marriage, which is a principal ingredient of his crime, should (by a forced construction of law) be made use of to stop the mouth of the most material witness against him."

In 1 East, P. C. 454, it was said; "A woman so taken away and married may without doubt be a witness against the offender, if the force were continuing upon her till the marriage; because then he is no husband de jure; and she herself may prove such continuing force; accordingly, it was so done in Fulwood's Case [M. 13 Car. I.] Cro. Car. 488, in Brown's Case [Tr. 25 Car. II.] 1 Vent. 243, and in Haagen Swendsen's Case [M. 1 Ann.] 5 St. Tr. 456. Upon the second of these Lord Hale observes that there were other witnesses who proved the taking by force, though none but the child herself proved the marriage to be forcible. And most, he adds, were of opinion that, if she had lived with him any considerable time, and assented to the marriage by any free cohabitation, she could not have been admitted as a witness. This reasoning seems to imply that, if the woman after her forcible abduction give her consent to the marriage, her testimony could not be received. Yet Mr. Justice Blackstone [4 Bl. Com. 209], on a review of the several authorities, thinks that it should even be allowed where the marriage is good by the previous consent of the inveigled woman after her forcible abduction; adverting to the absurdity of otherwise permitting the offender thus to take advantage of his own wrong. And surely there can be no doubt of her competency where the marriage was against her will at the time, notwithstanding her subsequent assent; for, if she were a competent witness at any time after the crime committed, I know not by what rule of law her subsequent assent to the crime can incapacitate her; much less how, by any lapse of time, she can be incapacitated. However, these circumstances may and ought to weigh with the jury 67 L. R. A.

who are to decide upon the credit of her testimony. But further, I conceive it to be now settled that in all cases of personal injuries committed by the husband or wife against each other the injured party is an admissible witness against the other."

In Pedley v. Wellesley, 3 Car. & P. 558, it was held that the wife of the defendant, who was sued in assumption for work and labor, was incompetent to testify against her husband, where he had married her after the act had been committed and she had been subpoenaed as a witness. Best, Ch. J., said: "I will allow the witness to be examined if the defendant consents, but not without." It was claimed by the plaintiff in this case that a party to a suit could not, by marrying his adversary's witness, deprive him of the benefit of the evidence of such witness.

II. Competency under statutory provisions.

In this country the statutes generally provide that the husband or wife is incompetent to testify in actions against the other party, with an exception in cases of personal violence. Construing these provisions of the statutes, it seems to be generally held that the wife is incompetent to testify against her husband in regard to matters occurring prior to the marriage. Most of the cases in which the question arose were those of sexual crimes occurring before the marriage, and prosecutions under the polygamy laws, and a prosecution for murder. Under the polygamy laws it was held that the wife was incompetent to testify as to her husband's former marriage to another party; but under a different statute it was held that the wife was in contempt where she refused to testify in regard to this before the grand jury; and it was held that the grand jury had a right to the evidence in order that they might determine whether or not the witness was a lawful wife, and so determine whether she was competent.

The wife was held incompetent to testify in a prosecution against her husband for the commission of a rape on her prior to the marriage, she being under the age of fourteen years at the time of the alleged offense. State v. Evans, 138 Mo. 116, 60 Am. St. Rep. 549, 39 S. W. 462.

This was under Mo. Rev. Stat. 1889, § 4218, authorizing the wife to testify for the husband, at his option, but not against him. It room, and the state could have shown by any witness other than appellant's wife the matters about which the inquiry was made. The fact that appellant had married Susie Jones the day prior to his trial was also the subject of legitimate inquiry from proper sources. But here the statute expressly prohibits the use of the wife as a witness against her husband; and this though he had married her for the express purpose of suppressing her testimony against him. Miller v. State, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. 575, 40 S. W. 313; United States v. White, 4 Utah, 499, 11 Pac. 570. It makes no difference at what time the relation of husband and wife begins. The exclusion of their testimony under our statute, and to its fullest extent, operates wherever the interests of either are directly concerned (1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 334, 336), and this although he married the witness after she was placed under process (Pedley v. Wellesley, 3 Car. & P. 558; State v. Armstrong, 4 Minn. 335, Gil. 251). And the question of public policy is not an argument to the contrary. Public policy must be in accord with our statutory enactment. When the marriage ceremony is performed, no matter what the motive was or may be, the witness thenceforward becomes the lawful wife of defendant, and is prohibited under our statute from testifying against her husband, except where the offense is by the husband against her person. It will be observed in this case that the county attorney called the witness in behalf of the state, and asked her several questions in regard to the case, when, upon objection by appellant that she was his wife, the court then asked her the question if she was his wife, and, receiving an affirmative reply, excused her from the witness stand. This whole proceeding seems to have been a spectacular performance to force defendant to object to his wife testifying against him, in order to get the benefit of her testimony thus far in aid of the supposition and theory that appellant had married her to suppress her testimony. The point insisted upon by the state in regard to this whole matter of proving the recent marriage of appellant to Susie Jones was to convince the jury, first, that Susie Jones was the only eyewitness to was contended that it was an exception to the general rule, on the ground that it was a criminal injury to the wife. The court said: "Ex vi termini a wife is only admitted to testify concerning criminal injuries to herself as a wife, not to a woman who was not at the time of the injury the wife of the defendant."

And under Cal. Penal Code, § 1322, providing that, except with the consent of both, or in cases of criminal violence upon one by the other, neither husband nor wife is a competent witness for or against the other in a criminal action or proceeding to which one or both are parties, it was held that the wife was not a competent witness against her husband to prove the crime of rape committed by him prior to the marriage in having sexual intercourse with her while under the age of sixteen years. People v. Curiale, 137 Cal. 534, 59 L. R. A. 588, 70 Pac. 468. In this case she had subsequently married the man freely, and lived with him as his wife. The court said: "In the case at bar, if the girl had never freely consented to the marriage and cohabitation with defendant, the question would be different." The court further said: "The statute is founded upon public policy. It prohibits, in general terms, the examination of one spouse against the other without his or her consent. For the purpose of protecting one against the criminal violence of the other, the statute provides further that the prohibition shall not apply to cases of criminal violence by one upon the other,—that is, by one spouse upon the other spouse. The exception does not extend to acts committed before the marriage. This has been the uniform interpretation of similar statutes in other states, so far as we are advised."

And under Minn. Gen. Stat. 1894, § 5662, the wife was held not to be a competent witness in a prosecution against her husband for carnally knowing her, a female child under the age of sixteen years, prior to the marriage. State v. 67 L. R. A.

This statute provided that the wife cannot be examined for or against her husband, without his consent, but this exception does not apply to a criminal action or proceeding for a crime committed by one against the other. The court said: "It prohibits, on grounds of public policy, in general terms, the examination of one spouse as a witness against the other without his or her consent; but, for the protection of the one against the criminal acts of the other, the statute further provides that the prohibition shall not apply to a criminal action or proceeding for a crime committed by one spouse against the other. The statute deals with the parties in the marriage relation, and not as to acts committed before the marriage."

So it was held that the wife was an incompetent witness against her husband upon a prosecution for rape occurring before their marriage, when she was under sixteen years of age. People v. Schoonmaker, 117 Mich. 190, 72 Am. St. Rep. 560, 75 N. W. 439.

This was under 3 How. Anno. Stat. (Mich.) § 7546, providing that a wife is incompetent to testify against her husband, except where the cause of action arose out of a personal wrong or injury done by one to the other. The court, speaking of this statute, said: "This provision is declaratory of the common law, and has its origin in the recognized necessity of protection to the injured spouse."

And under Tex. Code Crim. Proc. 1895, arts. 774, 775, providing that the husband and wife may in all criminal actions be witnesses for each other, but they shall in no case testify against each other, except in a criminal prosecution for an offense committed by one against the other, it was held that a wife was incompetent to testify against her husband in a prosecution for an abortion committed by the husband on the wife before marriage. Miller v. State, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. 575, 40 S. W.

the homicide for which appellant was being tried; second, that he had married her for the express purpose of suppressing her testimony; and, third, her evidence was of a damaging character to him. Any fact drawn from the wife proving, or tending to prove, that appellant had married her for the purpose of suppressing her testimony was directly against him. The county attorney had no right to call her as a witness against him. It is thoroughly demonstrated by the facts that appellant had married her; and, if the court and the county attorney were not satisfied with the statement of appellant that he had married the witness, it was a matter easily ascertained without calling the wife, and the good or bad faith of appellant in marrying her, and whether the court believed what the defendant testified in regard to it, would make no difference. The fact that she was the wife of defendant put the seal upon her lips, and excluded her being called as a witness against him. The fact that appellant had married the witness, and the further fact that it was done for the purpose of suppressing her testimony, were so intimately blended under the peculiar facts that they could not be separated; and the fact that he had married her was one of the main facts relied upon by the state to show appellant's act in what the state contended was suppressing the testimony of the wife. It is well settled in cases of bigamy that the lawful wife cannot be called to prove her marriage with the accused, nor for the purpose of identifying him. Boyd v. State, 33 Tex. Crim. Rep. 470, 26 S. W. 1080, and authorities cited; Law of Evidence, by Burr W. Jones, vol. 3, § 752, authorities collated in note 1. See also § 753, note 18. There is no question of the injurious effect of this action of the county attorney as sustained by the court, because it tended to uphold with fearful effect the contention of the state that by reason of his marriage with the witness the day before his purpose was to suppress her testimony, and that her evidence was of a seriously damaging effect against him. It was admitted upon the theory that it was a suppression of the testimony, and the wife was the most important witness in regard to the

313. The court said that "at common law the principle of exclusion applies in its fullest extent, wherever the interest of either of the spouses is directly concerned. Where the defendant married one of the plaintiff's witnesses after she was actually summoned to testify in the suit, she was held incompetent to give evidence." The court further said: "If it be conceded that the acts constituting the abortion stated in the record were acts of personal violence, they were not at the time directed against his wife."

In a prosecution for polygamy a wife was held incompetent to testify against her husband, under Utah Laws 1884, § 1156, p. 259, providing that the wife cannot be examined for or against her husband without his consent; but this exception does not apply to a criminal action or proceeding for a crime committed by one against the other. United States v. White, 4 Utah, 499, 11 Pac. 570. In this case the accused was charged with the crime of unlawfully cohabiting with Diana and Jane White. Diana was his first wife and died in 1886, and the defendant, who had been cohabiting with Jane for ten years, married her in April, 1886. The sole object in having the marriage ceremony performed was to close the mouth of the witness and to prevent the government from obtaining her testimony, and it was argued that it was contrary to public policy to permit parties to defeat the ends of justice by entering into the marriage relation for the sole purpose of suppressing testimony. But it was held that, no matter what the motive was, the witness was the lawful wife of the defendant, and could not testify against his objection.

The second wife was held incompetent as a witness, in a prosecution of her husband for polygamy, to prove that he had previously married another wife, who was still living. Miles v. United States, 103 U. S. 304, 26 L. ed. 481. The court said: "The result of the authorities is that, as long as the fact of the first marriage is contested, the second wife cannot be admitted to prove it. When the first marriage is duly established by other evidence to the satisfaction of the court . . . [the second] may be admitted to prove the second marriage, but not the first; and the jury should have been so instructed. In this case the injunction of the law of Utah that the wife should not be a witness for or against her husband was practically ignored by the court."

In Ex parte Hendrickson, 6 Utah, 3, 21 Pac. 396, under a prosecution for polygamy, the wife of the accused refused to testify before the grand jury as to whether or not the defendant was married to another woman on the same day that he was married to her. It was held, under the Edmunds-Tucker law of Congress (24 Stat. at L. 635, chap. 397, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3635, Comp. Laws of Utah, 1888, p. 114), providing that a lawful wife could not, in a case against her husband, be compelled to testify against his consent, that she could not refuse to answer, as the question was one to establish her competency or incompetency, and that the grand jury had a right to be satisfied that this witness was not the first wife. The court said: "If she had answered that she knew of no one else having been married to the accused on that day the answer could have tended to confirm her claim of exemption, but, had she made answer that another woman was married to the accused on that day, further inquiry may have disclosed that such marriage was prior to her marriage. She would then not have been the first wife, and her claim to being the lawful wife would have been invalid. She had been instructed, as had the grand jury, that such evidence was simply to ascertain her competency, and could not be used by the grand jury against the accused. Her claim of exemption from giving testimony could not be set up as against such a question. It was not a question as to her giving evidence against the accused. The investigation had not reached the riage is contested, the second wife cannot be admitted to prove it. When the first marriage is duly established by other evidence to the satisfaction of the court . . . killing; and it would seem that the state placed the wife on the stand to get whatever of benefit there could arise from the objection urged by appellant that she was his wife in support of the theory of suppression of evidence. This is made patent by the reason it was the subject of a considerable portion of the argument of state's counsel before the jury. It was held in Brock's Case, 44 Tex. Crim. Rep. 335, 60 L. R. A. 465, 100 Am. St. Rep. 859, 71 S. W. 21, that the use of the wife against accused was reversible error, whether exception was reserved or not. Certainly it could not be held less an error where appellant was urging his objection from the time this matter became involved in the case until its final termination.

Because of this error the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

Henderson, J., dissenting:

I do not agree to the reversal of this case, and because I believe the question is an important one I will express my views.

On the trial the state was permitted to prove by appellant on cross-examination that on the day before the trial he had married Susie Jones. The state was also permitted to prove by Sheriff Satterfield that Susie Jones was present in court. The state then called her to the witness stand, and proved by her that on the day preceding she had married appellant, and then proceeded to ask her certain questions concerning the case. Appellant objected to any interrogation of the witness by the state because she was his wife. This objection was sustained by the court, all of the other objections leading up to this having been overruled by the court. Appellant insists that when it was first disclosed that Susie Jones was the wife of appellant the conduct of the state in bringing her to the witness stand, and again proving by her that she was appellant's wife, and then proceeding to ask her questions regarding the case, and compelling appellant to object to her testimony on the ground that she was his wife, was not in good faith, but was a spectacular performance on the part of the state, calculated to prejudice appellant before the jury, and was really the use of appellant's wife against him as a witness. I believe it was proper for the state to assure itself that Susie Jones was really the wife of appellant, and that she had married him only the day before; and it was not only competent to elicit this fact from appellant himself in cross-examination, but the state was authorized to show that Susie Jones was in attendance on the court, and to prove by her also that she had married appellant. And I cannot say that this conduct on the part of counsel for the state was not done in good faith. If she had not been presented to point where her claim of exemption could be set up."

In Ex parte Hendrickson, 6 Utah, 3, 21 Pac. 396, the court distinguished the case of Miles v. United States, 103 U. S. 804, 26 L. ed. 481, saying: "It is true that in the Miles Case the court said that 'the testimony of the second wife to prove the only controverted issue in the case, namely, the first marriage, cannot be given to the jury on the pretext that its purpose is to establish her competency.' That rule was laid down under a former territorial statute, which said: 'A husband shall not be a witness for or against his wife, nor a wife a witness for or against her husband.' Utah Comp. Laws 1876, § 1604. Under that statute the court in the Miles Case recognized that the wife was prima facie incompetent. The court said in that case: 'Witnesses who are prima facie competent, but whose competency is disputed, are allowed to give evidence on their voir dire to the court upon some collateral issue on which their competency depends; but the testimony of a witness who is prima facie incompetent cannot be given to the jury upon the very issue in the case, in order to establish his competency, and at the same time prove the issue.' Our local statute then absolutely disqualified the wife, and the accused could object to her testifying. But the later act of Congress—the Edmunds-Tucker act, above referred to—has changed this completely. The accused cannot raise any valid objection, but as to him she is a competent witness. The exemption is wholly a personal privilege of the witness. The Ed- 67 L. R. A.

Edmunds-Tucker law reads as follows: 'Section 1. That in any proceeding or examination before a grand jury, a judge, justice, or a United States commissioner, or a court, in any prosecution for bigamy, polygamy, or unlawful cohabitation, under any statute of the United States, the lawful husband or wife of the person accused shall be a competent witness, and may be called; but he or she shall not be compelled to testify in such proceeding, examination, or prosecution without the consent of the husband or wife, as the case may be,' etc. 24 Stat. at L. 635, chap. 397, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3635. 1 Utah Comp. Laws, § 1, pp. 114, 115. Had this statute been in existence when the Miles Case was decided, it is evident that the ruling of the court would have been different, as the first wife is, under this latter statute, a competent witness."

In MOORE v. STATE a man was prosecuted for murder, and had married the prosecuting witness on the day before the trial. The marriage was proved by the defendant. It was held error for the prosecution, during the trial, to place defendant's wife upon the stand, requiring him to object to her testimony, as this would bias the jury in believing that he had married her for the purpose of suppressing her evidence. Texas Code Crim. Proc. § 775, provides that the husband and wife may in all criminal actions be witnesses for each other, but they shall in no case testify against each other except in a criminal prosecution for an offense committed by one against the other.

the jury, they would not have been apprised of the fact that she was then present, and in a situation to testify for appellant, and her absence might have been accounted for on various pretexts. If any fact regarding the homicide had been elicited from her, of course a different question would be presented; but here we have in evidence, strongly, it is true, the fact of her intermarriage with appellant on the day before, and her presence then in court. This was not using her as a witness against appellant, but was affording the jury an insight into his conduct with reference to her, which they had a right to know. The circumstances here shown, to wit, the fact of appellant's intermarriage with the principal state's witness only the day before, would tend to show—at least it would bear that construction—that he had married her for the purpose of suppressing her testimony. I understand it is a rule of universal application that it can always be shown that a defendant has fabricated or suppressed testimony.

Appellant further maintains that the court committed an error in allowing state's counsel to animadvert on the failure of appellant to use his wife as a witness on his behalf, and in this connection he complains that the court refused to give certain requested special instructions on this subject. It has long been the doctrine in this state, that argument could be made on the failure of a defendant to use his wife as a witness. Mercer v. State, 17 Tex. App. 452; Armstrong v. State, 34 Tex. Crim. Rep. 250, 30 S. W. 235; Smith v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 65 S. W. 186; and Locklin v. State (decided at present term) 75 S. W. 305; Boyd v. State, 33 Tex. Crim. Rep. 470, 26 S. W. 1080; and authorities cited in that connection in the majority opinion, are not in point, because the question there was bigamy, and the former and subsequent marriages were the material issues in the case, and of course the first wife was not a competent witness against the husband to prove the marriage. Graves v. United States, 150 U. S. 118, 37 L. ed. 1021, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 40, also cited by appellant's counsel, is not in point. There it was held by a majority of the court that, inasmuch as the wife could not be a witness for appellant, her absence from his side during the trial could not be argued before the jury to his prejudice. That is not the character of case here presented, for our statute authorizes the wife to be a witness for the husband, and his failure to produce her, where the record shows she was present at the homicide, is both upon principle and authority a legitimate subject for criticism on the part of the state. In this case she was present at the homicide, and had been used on a former trial as a witness on behalf of the state. Appellant was shown to have married her on the day before. Under the circumstances the state could not use her. Miller v. State, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. 575, 40 S. W. 313. But it was entirely proper that the jury should be informed of the reason that prevented the state from placing her on the stand, and this although it might suggest very strongly appellant had married her for the express purpose of suppressing her evidence. Any other view would overrule the line of cases already referred to in which it has been uniformly held by this court that it was competent for counsel in argument to refer to the failure of appellant to use his wife as a witness, where the facts show that she was present at the time of the alleged offense, and would be a material witness for him if his theory is true. If an argument of this character can be made on inferences merely, it would certainly indicate that so much of the facts can be proved from which the inferences or deductions can be drawn. In this particular case no fact was proved in regard to the case by appellant's wife. The facts developed by other witnesses showed that she was present at the time of the homicide, and was a witness for the state on the former trial, and it was merely shown by her that she had married defendant on the day previous to the trial. On objection being made to her testifying, the court declared her disqualified, and sustained the objection. I cannot regard this as using the wife as a witness against her husband. Only the disqualifying fact was shown by her, and no more. Therefore I do not believe the court is correct in holding this case should be reversed, inasmuch as the wife testified to no fact in the case in regard to the homicide, and consequently was not used as a witness against him, which is the language of the statute.

August JOHNSON, Respt.,
v.

UNION PACIFIC COAL COMPANY, Appt.

(.....Utah.....)

1. To justify a consideration of the manner in which a particular class of work is usually performed by other employers, in determining whether a particular employer was negligent in its performance, so as to be liable for injuries to a servant, it must be shown that the conditions under which the work is performed by the respective employers are similar.
2. The term "common law of England," as used in a statute adopting such law as a rule of decision in a state, does not include judicial decisions of English courts rendered subsequently to the independence of America.
3. Decisions of the English courts, rendered since the independence of America, are entitled to respect upon the question as to what the common law is, and in particular cases may properly be regarded as conclusive.
4. The common law of England at the time of its adoption by Wyoming had no relation to the master's liability for injuries to his servants and decisions by the English courts subsequently rendered are not binding in determining the question of the liability of the master for injuries occurring within that state.
5. If rails, loaded under the supervision of a foreman, to be sent down an incline into a mine, are negligently loaded so that one falls from the car and injures an employee, the negligence is that of the foreman, and not of the servant working under him, and the master will be liable for the resulting injury.
6. Persons engaged in the service of a master, who are intrusted by him with the management or direction of his general work, or with some particular part thereof, are not fellow servants with the subordinate employees, but are vice principals, for whose negligence, resulting in the injury of employees, the master is liable.
7. When the evidence, as to whether or not a master has promulgated suitable rules for the government of his employees, is such that reasonable men might differ as to whether or not the duty has been performed, the question must be determined by the jury.
8. Under an allegation that, by reason of the character of the work and the conditions under which it is done, the letting down into a mine of cars loaded with rails

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Summit County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Le Grand Young and W. H. Hatteroth, for appellant:

To entitle plaintiff to recover, the defendant must have been guilty of negligence which was the proximate cause of his injury, and to constitute proximate cause it must be "a cause from which a person of ordinary intelligence would anticipate some accident."

Wilber v. Follansbec, 97 Wis. 577, 72 N. W. 741, 73 N. W. 559; Dougan v. Champlain Transp. Co. 56 N. Y. 1; Cleveland v. New Jersey S. B. Co. 68 N. Y. 307; Davis v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 93 Wis. 470, 33 L. R. A. 654, 57 Am. St. Rep. 935, 67 N. W. 16, 1132; Block v. Milwaukee Street R. Co. 89 Wis. 378, 27 L. R. A. 365, 46 Am. St. Rep. 840, 61 N. W. 1101.

The defendant could not have anticipated any danger from this method of lowering rails, as it was not shown that any such accident prior to this one had ever happened in that way, or from this cause. The manner in which the rails were loaded was the usual and ordinary way, and surely there was no negligence in doing this in such way.

Gas & E. L. Co.* 18 Utah, 493, 56 Pac. 90; Boyle v. Union P. R. Co. 25 Utah, 420, 71 Pac. 991.

The manner of lowering rails into the mine not having been shown to have been negligent, no rules requiring them to be tied or fastened on were necessary.

The failure to adopt rules is not proof of negligence, unless it appears, from the nature of the business in which the servant is engaged, that the master, in the exercise of reasonable care, should have foreseen and anticipated the necessity of such precautions.

Messrs. Mahlon E. Wilson and John A. Street, with Mr. Lindsay R. Rogers, for respondent:

If the evidence of plaintiff tended to show that defendant failed in a single element of duty substantially charged in the complaint, then the question was one for the jury on motion for a nonsuit, and likewise on motion to direct a verdict.

Plaintiff had the right to rely that his master would exercise such diligence in all operations going on above him in the slope as plaintiff's powerless situation demanded.

Even if plaintiff had been aware of all the facts, the rule in this jurisdiction and of many other states would exonerate him from imputation of assumption of the risk, unless he was aware of the defects and knew and appreciated the risks resulting therefrom.

Mangum v. Bullion, B. & O. Min. Co. 15 Utah, 547, 50 Pac. 834.

Baskin, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is alleged, in substance, in the complaint, that the plaintiff, as an employee of the defendant, was, on the 5th of December, 1901, engaged in working in defendant's coal mine, in the state of Wyoming, at the bottom of a shaft in said mine, which extended from the surface, on an incline of 25 degrees, a distance of about 800 feet; that on said day the defendant was, and for a long time prior thereto had been, engaged in constructing a railway track down said shaft; that in doing so the iron rails necessary to the construction of said track were loaded upon the top of an ordinary pit car, and let down to the place where needed by means of a wire cable operated by machinery at the surface; that by reason of the weight of the rails, and the downward slope of said shaft, and the jerking of the cable, the letting down of the rails was extremely dangerous to the plaintiff, working at the bottom of the shaft, by reason whereof it became and was the duty of the defendant to securely fasten the rails to the top of the car by means of ropes, cables, or otherwise, and carefully work and operate the machinery, and to warn the plaintiff at the bottom of the shaft before letting down the pit car loaded with rails, and that the defendant had full notice of such risks, dangers, and hazards, and was well aware of its said duties; that on said day said defendant, in violation of its duty to the said plaintiff, negligently and carelessly, and without any notice or warning to the plaintiff, used said pit car in letting down said rails to the bottom of the shaft, and carelessly and negligently failed and omitted to fasten or secure said rails to the top of said car, but left the same loose and unfastened upon the top of said car, whereby and by consequence of which one of the said rails, being loose and unfastened, as aforesaid, on the top of said car, slipped from and over the end of said car, and fell down the slope of the shaft to the bottom thereof, where it struck the said plaintiff and injured him. In addition to the foregoing, it is alleged in the second count of the complaint that it became and was the duty of the defendant to make, prescribe, promulgate, and enforce rules among its said employees who were engaged in letting down said rails to the bottom of the shaft, requiring that said rails were by said employees to be securely fastened or tied to said pit or trip car by and with the said cables, ropes, or other effective appliances before said pit car loaded with said rails was started down the slope of the shaft. It is further, in substance, alleged that the defendant negligently failed and omitted to perform said duties. A verdict and judgment were entered in favor of the plaintiff.

At the close of the plaintiff's evidence the defendant moved for a nonsuit, which was denied. Defendant also requested the court to instruct the jury to return a verdict in favor of the defendant, which was also denied. The denial of each of these motions is assigned as error.

Without stating the evidence in detail, as it is very voluminous, it is sufficient to say that, after a careful consideration of the whole of it, we are fully satisfied that it, as well as the evidence of the plaintiff in chief, standing alone, is such as required the case to be submitted to the jury, and that, therefore, the trial court did not err in denying either the motion for the nonsuit or the request to instruct the jury to find a verdict for the defendant.

2. The refusal of the court to give the following instructions, requested by the defendant, is also assigned as error, viz.: "The court further charges you, in the matter of what is a reasonably safe way to do a thing or perform an act, may be defined to be the way and manner that people engaged in the same business have adopted for doing like work. If you find from the evidence that the defendant adopted the ordinary and usual way of lowering the rails into its mines, which was the way that was adopted generally by mine owners in like cases, then in that event it would not be deemed carelessness or negligence on defendant's part to lower rails into the mine in this manner; and, if an accident occurred thereby, it would be an accident incident to the business, and one for which the defendant is not liable." It is well settled that the master is required to exercise "reasonable or ordinary" care for the safety of his servants while performing their duties. Reasonable care and ordinary care, which in law have the same meaning, "is the care which reasonable and prudent men use under like circumstances" (Cayzer v. Taylor, 10 Gray, 274, 69 Am. Dec. 317), and must be measured by the character, risk, and exposure of the business; and the degree required is higher where life or limb is endangered. As stated by Mr. Justice Field in The Nitro-glycerine Case (Parrott v. Wells, F. & Co.) 15 Wall. 524-538, 21 L. ed. 206-211: "The measure of care against accident, which one must take to avoid responsibility, is that which a person of ordinary prudence and caution would use if his own interests were to be affected and the whole risk were his own." In the case of Boyle v. Union P. R. Co. 25 Utah, 422, 430, 71 Pac. 988, 991, which the appellant has cited as supporting its contention, Mr. Justice McCarty, speaking for this court, correctly stated the rule upon this subject as follows: "The rule has become elementary that it is a duty the master owes to his servant to use reasonable care and prudence for his safety by providing the machinery in use with such appliances as will enable the servant, with ordinary and reasonable care on his part, to perform the duties required of him without danger, except as may be reasonably incident to the business or employment engaged in. That is, the master is required to provide the same kind of appliances, or appliances equally as safe, as those in general use by men of ordinary prudence who are engaged in the same kind of business. Bailey, Master's Liability for Injuries to Servant, pp. 15, 16, and cases cited; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 194; Pool v. Southern P. Co. 20 Utah, 210, 58 Pac. 326. It is not only the master's duty to provide his servants with reasonably safe appliances, but it is also his duty to use ordinary care in looking after, inspecting, and keeping them in repair. Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 195; Bailey, Master's Liability for Injuries to Servant, p. 101." The same rule is stated in Titus v. Bradford, B. & K. R. Co. 136 Pa. 618, 626, 20 Am. St. Rep. 944, 20 Atl. 517, 518, which the appellant also cited, as follows: "No man is held by law to a higher degree of skill than the fair average of his profession or trade, and the standard of due care is the conduct of the average prudent man." In Dickert v. Salt Lake City R. Co. 20 Utah, 394, 59 Pac. 95, this court held that, "However unusual the method of a common carrier, such as a street railway company, in starting its cars, if that method is dangerous, and its use violative of the high degree of care which the carrier is required to observe regarding its passengers, and in the use of that method a passenger is injured, the carrier is liable." Reasonable or ordinary care cannot be determined abstractly, for what would be such care in one case might be gross negligence in another, and therefore whether such care has been exercised depends upon, and can only be determined by, the facts in each particular case, and is generally a question of fact for the jury to determine. Under the well-settled rule upon the subject before mentioned, the instructions so as aforesaid requested are erroneous in this: That they are not limited in their application to the reasonable or ordinary manner in which similar work as that in which the defendant was engaged is generally performed, under similar circumstances, by reasonable and prudent persons engaged in the same occupation. As there was no proof that the conditions under which the work of the defendant was performed were the same as those under which reasonable and prudent persons engaged in the same occupation as the defendant generally perform their work, the instructions requested were not proper for that reason.

3. Defendant's attorney asked M. J. Blake, a witness for defendant, "What was the general method of letting down rails in those mines you say you have worked in, in the state of Wyoming, prior to the time of this accident?" To this question counsel for plaintiff objected on the ground that it was incompetent, and did not include conditions existing at the time and place of the accident. This and several objections of the same kind were sustained, and the ruling of the court is assigned as error. It follows from what has been said under the second head of this opinion that these objections were properly sustained.

4. The refusal of the court to give each of the following instructions, requested by the defendant, is assigned as error:

"(5) You are instructed that when the plaintiff engaged in the employment of the defendant for compensation he took upon himself the risks and perils ordinarily incident to the performance of the service for which he was employed. That one of the risks and perils, under the laws of Wyoming, so assumed by the said deceased, is that resulting from the carelessness and negligence of the other servants in the same general employment. If you therefore find from the evidence that the accident resulted from the negligence of the engineer operating the hoisting engine, or from the negligence of any of the men who were employed in taking rails down the slope, then and in either of said cases plaintiff could not recover in this case, for the reason that the accident was caused by the omission or act of a fellow servant with the deceased, for which omission or negligence the said defendant is not liable."

"(9) The court instructs you that the defendant in this case is not liable for any neglect or misconduct of the fellow servants of plaintiff which may have caused his injury, and further charges you that Mr. Tate and Mr. McDonald and other men under Mr. Blake were fellow servants, with the plaintiff, and if, therefore, the accident happened because of the negligence of these men to obey the orders of Mr. Blake, the mine boss, to fasten the rails upon the car, you will find no cause of action against the defendant."

"(12) You are instructed that where two or more persons are employed in the same general work by a company, if one is injured by the negligence of the other his employer is not responsible. The court further charges you that Mr. Blake, the mine foreman, and Mr. Tate, his assistant, and Mr. McDonald, and the others loading the cars with the iron rails in question, were fellow servants of the plaintiff in this case."

The first sentence of the fifth request was given in the court's charge. Appellant's counsel contend that the case at bar is governed by the common law of England on the subject of the liability of the master for injuries to the servant, as adopted by § 2695 of the Revised Statutes of 1899 of the state of Wyoming, and for that reason the requests should have been given. Said section is as follows: "The common law of England as modified by judicial decisions, so far as the same is of a general nature and not inapplicable, and all declaratory or remedial acts or statutes made in aid of, or to supply the defects of the common law, 67 L. R. A.

prior to the fourth year of James the First (excepting the 2d section of the 6th chapter of 43d Elizabeth, the 8th chapter of 13th Elizabeth and 9th chapter of 37th Henry VIII.), and which are of a general nature and not local to England, shall be the rule of decision in this state when not inconsistent with the laws thereof, and shall be considered as of full force, until repealed by legislative authority." This court has held that the law of the state where the injury occurs governs. Sartin v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. 27 Utah, 447, 76 Pac. 219. To determine the question thus presented it is necessary to ascertain what the phrase "common law of England," as used in said section, includes. Blackstone, in defining the "common law of England," uses the following language: "The municipal law of England . . . may with sufficient propriety be divided into two kinds: The lex non scripta, the unwritten or common law; and the lex scripta, the written or statute law. The lex non scripta, or unwritten law, includes, not only general customs, or the common law properly so called, but also the particular customs. . . . Their original institution and authority are not set down in writing, as acts of Parliament are, but they receive the binding power and the force of laws by long and immemorial usage, and by their universal reception throughout the Kingdom. . . . Whence it is that in our law the goodness of a custom depends upon its having been used time out of mind; or, in the solemnity of our legal phrase, time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. This is it that gives it its weight and authority; and of this nature are the maxims and customs which compose the common law, or lex non scripta, of this Kingdom." 1 Sharswood's Bl. Com. 63-66. See also Broom, Common Law, 4th ed. p. 7. The lex non scripta, or common law, of England, was brought over to the American colonies by our ancestors, and was adopted by them so far as applicable to their new conditions, and has been adopted by most of the states in the Union substantially in the same form as by the state of Wyoming. It is stated in 8 Cyc. Law & Proc. 386, that, "in determining what the common law is, the courts will consider as evidence, although not as conclusive, Blackstone's and Kent's Commentaries and other standard works on the subject; and will examine and weigh the reasoning of the decisions of the state and Federal courts down to the present time. English decisions rendered prior to July 4, 1776, if they are clear and consistent, while they do not constitute a part of the common law, are usually considered conclusive evidence of what the common law is; but those rendered after that date, while entitled to great respect, are not binding upon us. The courts will also, in ascertaining the principles of the common law, consider English statutes amendatory or declaratory of the common law. English decisions construing English statutes adopted in the United States, made prior to their adoption, or prior to the Revolution, but not afterwards, will generally be followed." In 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 279, it is stated that "English decisions are freely used in deciding cases in the Federal and state courts in the United States, and are deemed of great value in these tribunals; and where such decisions were rendered prior to the war of the Revolution they form a part of the common law of the United States, and are binding upon American courts. But, though binding, they do not constitute the law itself, but are only evidence of what the law is, and hence should be clear and unequivocal. On the other hand, it is equally well settled that decisions of English courts, rendered since that time, though entitled to respect, and at times regarded as persuasive, are not authoritative, and will be disregarded should the exigency so require." In Murdock v. Hunter, 1 Brock. 135-140, Fed. Cas. No. 9,941, Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, in the opinion, said: "On passing from principle to authority, it may not be improper to premise that, as the common law of England was and is the common law of this country, and as an appeal from the courts of Virginia lay to a tribunal in England, which would be governed by the decisions of the courts, the decisions of those courts, made before the Revolution, have all that claim to authority which is allowed to appellate courts. Those made since the Revolution lose that title to authority, which was conferred by the appellate character of the tribunal which made them, and can only be considered as the opinions of men distinguished for their talents and learning, expounding a rule by which this country, as well as theirs, professes to be governed." The same doctrine was announced by the same distinguished judge in the cases of Livingston v. Jefferson, 1 Brock. 203-210, 211, Fed. Cas. No. 8,411, and in Cathcart v. Robinson, 5 Pet. 264, 8 L. ed. 120. Chief Justice Shaw, in Com. v. York, 9 Met. 93-110, 43 Am. Dec. 373, announced the same doctrine in the following language: "If we consult English decisions made since the Revolution, it is not because they have any binding force as rules, but because they are expositions of the rules and principles of the common law by men of great experience and judgment in the knowledge and application of the same laws which we are seeking to expound. And, if we read the digests and treatises of reputable authors published since we ceased to be English subjects, it is because they contain the authentic records of the precedents and judicial proceedings which furnish the evidence of the common law." See also Koontz v. Nabb, 16 Md. 549; Robert v. West, 15 Ga. 122; 1 Kent, Com. 13th ed. 473. Judge Cooley, in his work on Const. Lim. 7th ed. laid down the same doctrine, and on page 53 stated: "The opening of the war of the Revolution is the point of time at which the continuous stream of the common law became divided, and that portion which had been adopted in America flowed on by itself, no longer subject to changes from across the ocean." In Cowhick v. Shingle, 5 Wyo. 87, 95, 25 L. R. A. 608, 63 Am. St. Rep. 17, 37 Pac. 689, 692, Mr. Justice Clark, speaking for the court, said: "As a rule, the term 'common law' means both the common law of England as opposed to statute or written law, and the statutes passed before the emigration of the first settlers of America. Patterson v. Winn, 5 Pet. 241, 8 L. ed. 111; Com. v. Leach, 1 Mass. 61. And, applying this definition to the matter in hand, I am unable to perceive that there is any 'common-law' rule upon the subject." The 1st. section of the Washington Code of 1881 (2 Hill's Anno. Statutes & Codes, § 108, p. 34) is as follows: "The common law, so far as it is not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States, or of the state of Washington, nor incompatible with the institutions and condition of society in this state, shall be the rule of decision in all the courts of this state." In the case of Sayward v. Carlson, 1 Wash. 29-40, 23 Pac. 830, 833, which involved the question of whether the plaintiff's injury was caused by a fellow servant, the court, in its opinion, said: "Plaintiff in error maintained that § 1 of the Code of 1881, which makes the common law of England the rule of decision in all the courts of Washington territory, was decisive as to the first step of the inquiry, namely, where the court should look for the proper rules. We agree to this. But we do not subscribe to the next proposition,—that resort can be had only to the decisions of English courts, or to those of American courts which have followed them, to ascertain what the common law of England is or was, unless the English decisions commend themselves to reason, or have been so long and generally followed that to depart from them would tend to unsettle what has, by 'immemorial and universal usage,' been understood to be settled. . . . And we understand by § 1 of the Code that, where there are no governing provisions of the written laws, the courts of the late territory, and of this state, are, in all matters coming before them, to endeavor to administer justice according to the promptings of reason and common sense, which are the cardinal principles of the common law; but not that the decisions of the English courts are to be taken blindly, and without inquiry as to their reasoning or application to the circumstances. We have been led to these remarks because of the fact that this question of injuries by servants of the same master, negligently inflicted upon each other, has given rise to extensive discussion and wide divergence of decision in both English and American courts."

In view of the foregoing authorities, I am clearly of the opinion that the phrase "common law of England," as used in § 2695 of the Wyoming Revised Statutes of 1899, was not intended to and does not include the judicial decisions of England upon the subject rendered subsequently to the independence of America. But, notwithstanding such decisions are not a part of the common law adopted by the state of Wyoming, and are not, therefore, binding upon the courts of that state, yet, as evidence of what the common law, as so adopted, is, they are entitled to respect, and in particular cases may properly be regarded as conclusive. This brings us to the consideration of whether the common law so adopted is applicable to the case at bar.

The first decision in England upon the subject of the master's liability was rendered in 1837, in the case of Priestley v. Fowler, 3 Mees. & W. 1. The declaration in the case stated that "the plaintiff was a servant of the defendant in his trade of a butcher; that the defendant had desired and directed the plaintiff, so being his servant, to go with and take certain goods of the defendant in a certain van of the defendant then used by him, and conducted by another of his servants, in carrying goods for hire upon a certain journey; that the plaintiff, in pursuance of such desire and direction, accordingly commenced and was proceeding, and being carried and conveyed by the said van, with the said goods; and it became the defendant's duty to use proper care that the van should be in a proper state of repair, and should not be overloaded, and that the plaintiff should be safely and securely carried thereby. Nevertheless, that the defendant did not use proper care that the van should not be overloaded, or that the plaintiff should be safely and securely carried, in consequence of the neglect of which duties the van gave way and broke down, and 67 L. R. A.

the plaintiff was thrown to the ground, and his thigh fractured." The judgment rendered upon the verdict for the plaintiff was, on motion, arrested. Lord Abinger, in the opinion said: "It has been objected to this declaration that it contains no premises from which the duty of the defendant, as therein alleged, can be inferred in law; or, in other words, that from the mere relation of master and servant no contract, and therefore no duty, can be implied on the part of the master to cause the servant to be safely and securely carried, or to make the master liable for damage to the servant arising from any vice or imperfection unknown to the master, in the carriage, or in the mode of loading and conducting it. . . . It is admitted that there is no precedent for the present action by a servant against a master. We are therefore to decide the question upon general principles, and in doing so we are at liberty to look at the consequences of a decision the one way or the other."

The next decision on the subject in England was made in 1850, in the case of Hutchinson v. York, N. & B. R. Co. 5 Exch. 343, and in the opinion it is said: "This case appears to us to be undistinguishable in principle from that of Priestley v. Fowler, 3 Mees. & W. 1. . . . That case was fully considered, and the court, after a verdict for the plaintiff, arrested the judgment on the ground that a master is not, in general, liable to one servant for damages resulting from the negligence of another.

. . . The principle is that a servant, when he engages to serve a master, undertakes, as between him and his master, to run all the ordinary risks of the service, and this includes the risk of negligence on the part of a fellow servant, whenever he is acting in discharge of his duty as servant of him who is the common master of both. . . . Though we have said that a master is not, in general, responsible to one servant for an injury occasioned to him by the negligence of a fellow servant while they are acting in one common service, yet this must be taken with the qualification that the master shall have taken due care not to expose his servant to unreasonable risks."

While, as a general principle, it has been well settled by the decisions of the courts of both England and this country that the master is not liable for an injury to the servant caused by the negligence of a fellow servant, it has likewise been settled that it is the duty of the master to exercise due care, and use all reasonable and ordinary means to prevent the servant from being exposed to unnecessary danger, and, if the master neglects to perform that duty, he is liable whenever such neglect either directly causes or materially contributes in causing the injury. But as to what specific duties the master is bound to perform in order to avoid liability, and as to who are fellow servants, under these general principles, the decisions of the courts of England, prior to the employer's liability act of 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. chap. 42; Digest of Cases and Statutes [2d vol.] 2236), as also the decisions of the courts of this country up to the present time, widely differ. Some of the English cases upon the subject previous to said act are as follows: In the case of Tarrant v. Webb (decided in 1856) 18 C. B. 797, it was held that "a master is not generally responsible for an injury to a servant from the negligence of a fellow servant; but that rule is subject to this qualification, —that the master uses reasonable care in the selection of the servant." Lord Jervis, in the opinion, quoting from the opinion of Lord Cranworth in the case of Paterson v. Wallace, 1 Macq. H. L. Cas. 748, 751, says: "When a master employs a servant in a work of a dangerous character, he is bound to take all reasonable precautions for the safety of that workman. This is the law of England no less than the law of Scotland. It is the master's duty to be careful that his servant is not induced to work under a notion that tackle or machinery is staunch and secure, when in fact the master knows, or ought to know, that it is not so. And if, from any negligence in this respect, damage arise, the master is responsible." In Murphy v. Smith (decided in 1865) 10 C. B. N. S. 361, it was held that, "to render a master liable for an injury to one in his employ through the negligence of another person, also in his employ, it must be shown that the latter was placed by the master in such a position of trust and authority as to be fairly considered as his representative in the establishment." In Vose v. Lancashire & Y. R. Co. (decided in 1858) 2 Hurlst. & N. 728, it is said: "A servant in the employment of the E. L. Company, engaged in repairing a carriage on a siding at a station in the joint occupation of the E. L. Company and the L. & Y. Company, was killed by an engine of the L. & Y. Company being shunted into the siding at which he was at work. It appeared that rules for the regulation of the station were published, headed in the joint names of the two companies, and that the servants employed in shunting the engines were the joint servants of the two companies, but the engine drivers and persons employed, as the deceased was, in repairing the carriage, were the separate servants of each company. It was found that the rules as to the precautions to be taken before shunting trains into sidings had been observed, and that there had been no negligence on the part of the deceased, the shuntsman, pointsman, or engine driver, but that the accident was occasioned by the rules being defective. Held, that the L. & Y. Company were liable to an action at the suit of the administratrix of such servant." Clarke v. Holmes (decided in 1862) 7 Hurlst. & N. 937: "The plaintiff was employed by the defendant to oil dangerous machinery. At the time the plaintiff entered upon the service the machinery was fenced, but the fencing became broken by accident. The plaintiff complained of the dangerous state of the machinery, and the defendant promised him that the fencing should be restored. The plaintiff, without any negligence on his part, was severely injured in consequence of the machinery remaining unfenced. Held, in the exchequer chamber (affirming the judgment of the court of exchequer), that the defendant was liable for the injury." In the opinion Cockburn, Ch. J., said: "I consider the doctrine laid down by the House of Lords in the case of the Bartonshill Coal Co. v. Reid as the law of Scotland with reference to the duty of a master as applicable to the law of England also, namely, that where a servant is employed on machinery from the use of which danger may arise it is the duty of the master to take due care, and to use all reasonable means, to guard against and prevent any defects from which increased and unnecessary danger may occur." Byles, J., also said: "I think the master liable on the broader ground, to wit, that the owner of dangerous machinery is bound to exercise due care that it is in a safe and proper condition. The case of Priestley v. Fowler introduced a new chapter into the law, but that case has since been recognized by all the courts, including the court of error and the House of Lords. So that the doctrine there laid down, with all the consequences fairly deducible from it, are part of the law of the land. But the principles laid down in Priestley v. Fowler, and all the examples there given of their application, relate to the conveniences and casualties of ordinary or domestic life, and ought not to be strained so as to regulate the rights and liabilities arising from the use of dangerous machinery. . . . To hold that the master is responsible to his workman for no absence of care, however flagrant, seems to me in the highest degree both unjust and inconvenient. . . . It may be true that some of the cases cited at the bar are not quite consistent with this rule, particularly those which seem to make the personal misconduct or personal knowledge of the master a necessary ingredient in his responsibility. But we are a court of error, at liberty to decide on principle, and fortified by higher authority. Why may not the master be guilty of negligence by his manager or agent, whose employment may be so distinct from that of the injured servant that they cannot with propriety be deemed fellow servants? And if a master's personal knowledge of defects in his machinery be necessary to his liability, the more a master neglects his business and abandons it to others the less will he be liable." To the same effect is the case of Murphy v. Phillips (decided in 1876) 35 L. T. N. S. 477.

The following quotation from the opinion in Hough v. Texas & P. R. Co. 100 U. S. 221, 25 L. ed. 612, further shows the views of English courts upon the subject, as well as the view of the Supreme Court of the United States up to the date of that decision, viz.: "The question came before the House of Lords in Paterson v. Wallace, 1 Macq. H. L. Cas. 748, and again in 1858, in Bartonhill Coal Co. v. Reid, 3 Macq. H. L. Cas. 266. In the last-named case Lord Cranworth said that it was a principle, established by many preceding cases, 'that when a master employs his servant in a work of danger he is bound to exercise due care in order to have his tackle and machinery in a safe and proper condition, so as to protect the servant against unnecessary risks.' This he held to be the law in both Scotland and England. At the same sitting of the House of Lords, Bartonhill Coal Co. v. McGuire, 3 Macq. H. L. Cas. 307, was determined. In that case Lord Chancellor Chelmsford delivered the principal opinion, concurring in what was said in the Reid Case. After referring to the general doctrine as announced in Priestley v. Fowler, and recognized subsequently in other cases in the English courts, he said: 'In the consideration of these cases it did not become necessary to define with any great precision what was meant by the words "common service" or "common employment," and perhaps it might be difficult beforehand to suggest any exact definition of them. It is necessary, however, in each particular case to ascertain whether the fellow servants are fellow laborers in the same work, because, although a servant may be taken to have engaged to encounter all risks which are incident to the service which he undertakes, yet he cannot be expected to anticipate those which may happen to him on occasions foreign to his employment. Where servants, therefore, are engaged in different departments of duty, an injury committed by one servant upon the other by carelessness or negligence in the course of his peculiar work is not within the exception, and the master's liability attaches in that case in the same manner as if the injured servant stood in no such relation to him.' "

The particular acts of the master which entitle the servant to recover for injury caused thereby, were not definitely fixed by the law in England previously to the passage of the employer's liability act in 1880, the 1st and 2d sections of chapter 42 of which are as follows:

"Section 1. Where after the commencement of this act personal injury is caused to a workman, (1) by reason of any defect in the condition of the ways, works, machinery, or plant connected with or used in the business of the employer; or (2) by reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer who has any superintendence intrusted to him whilst in the exercise of such superintendence; or (3) by reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer to whose orders or directions the workman at the time of the injury was bound to conform, and did conform, where such injury resulted from his having so conformed; or (4) by reason of the act or omission of any person in the service of the employer done or made in obedience to the rules or by-laws of the employer, or in obedience to particular instructions given by any person delegated with the authority of the employer in that behalf; or (5) by reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer who has the charge or control of any signal, points, locomotive engine, or train upon a railway, the workman, or in case the injury results in death, the legal personal representatives of the workman, and any persons entitled in case of death, shall have the same right of compensation and remedies against the employer as if the workman had not been a workman of nor in the service of the employer, nor engaged in his work.

"Sec. 2. A workman shall not be entitled under this act to any right of compensation or remedy against the employer in any of the following cases: . . . (1) Under subsection 1 of § 1, unless the defect therein mentioned arose from, or had not been discovered or remedied owing to, the negligence of the employer, or of some person in the service of the employer, and intrusted by him with the duty of seeing that the ways, works, machinery, or plant were in proper condition. (2) Under subsection 4 of § 1, unless the injury resulted from some impropriety or defect in the rules, by-laws, or instructions therein mentioned: Provided that, where a rule or by-law has been approved or has been accepted as a proper rule or by-law by one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, or by the Board of Trade or any other department of the government, under or by virtue of any act of Parliament, it shall not be deemed for the purposes of this act to be an improper or defective rule or by-law. (3) In any case where the workman knew of the defect or negligence which caused his injury, and failed within a reasonable time to give, or cause to be given, information thereof to the employer, or some person superior to himself in the service of the employer, unless he was aware that the employer or such superior already knew of the said defect or negligence."

It follows from the foregoing facts and the decisions mentioned upon the subject that the common law of England, at the time of its adoption by the state of Wyoming, had no relation whatever to the master's liability for injuries to the servant, and that the decisions of the English courts prior to the adoption of the employer's liability act are not binding upon us in the case at bar.

It appears that the engineer mentioned in the fifth request was at the time the plaintiff was injured, and previously thereto had been, in charge of the defendant's engine, but there was no evidence whatever tending to show that he was negligent in any respect. It also appears that the witness Blake at the time of the injury was and had been defendant's "mine foreman," and that both he and the witness Tait, who was assistant foreman, were present while the rails (among which was the rail by which the plaintiff was injured) were being loaded.

Mr. Blake, as appears from the following questions asked him by defendant's counsel and his answers to the same, directed the loading of the rails, and knew the manner in which it was done:

Q. Mr. Blake, you say you were present the morning—afternoon at least—this party was injured, and I will ask you again now if you were there when the rails were loaded that went down the trip from which Mr. Johnson was hurt?

A. I had been around there.

Q. Were you present at the time?

A. Not all the time.

Q. Were you there at all?

A. Yes, sir; part of the time.

Q. State whether or not you superintended loading those rails, or instructed them to be done.

A. I instructed them. I didn't personally superintend.

Q. State how those rails were loaded so far as you know.

A. They were loaded on the trip of about five empty cars.

Q. How?

A. On the last car, front end of the trip going down the slope. There were two pieces of 3x10 and one piece of 3x12 plank placed in the end of the car, and in the bed of the car—

Q. Did they stand endways?

A. Yes, stand endways in the bed of the car. The bed of the car was then filled up within 3 or 4 inches of the top with mine ties.

Q. Three or 4 inches of the top?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And then what?

A. And the rails were loaded on top of the trip and placed against the plank.

Q. Did you see the men load the rails?

A. Yes, sir.

Mr. Tait testified that he was present and assisted in loading the rails, and in answer to the question by defendant's counsel, "Under whose supervision were the rails loaded?" said, "Mr. Blake's." Mr. Tait, as assistant foreman, had control over the miners and track layers, and Mr. Blake, the mine foreman, had control over all of the men, and had power to hire and discharge them. No one engaged in the work had authority superior to that of Mr. Blake's. There was no evidence to show that the employees in conducting the cars down the shaft were negligent, or did it in any different way than required by their instructions.

No statute of Wyoming upon the subject of the master's liability has been called to our attention, and the only decision in that state relating thereto which we have been able to find was rendered in the case of McBride v. Union P. R. Co. 3 Wyo. 248, 21 Pac. 687, cited by appellant's counsel as supporting their contention. In that case the "plaintiff had been ordered by the gang boss to assist in lowering an engine in defendant's shops. The engine was hoisted above the track, and was resting on timbers, which in turn were resting on the rails, and above a pit 2 or 3 feet deep. In removing the last timber but three men were employed, plaintiff being on the right-hand side, and J. and E. on the left. By order of the boss, J. left the work, and the end of the timber held by E. dropped into the pit, causing the other end to fly up and hit plaintiff, inflicting the injuries complained of. The jury found that the gang boss had immediate control of the work, but that he was under the general control of the master mechanic; that the latter was not in the shops at the time, but that the foreman, who superintended the work in the shops under the general directions of the master mechanic, was present. Held, that the defendant could not be held liable for the negligence of the gang boss as a vice principal in the exclusive control of a department." In the opinion, delivered by Mr. Justice Corn, it is said: "None of the authorities, we believe, go to the length of holding the master liable for the negligence of an employee as vice principal in control of a department, when there is in the same department, and present at the time of the accident, a superior under whose orders and control such employee perform his duties. There is, however, a class of cases where the employee is the representative of the master, though not in control of a separate department; and where the master is liable for his negligence, not upon any ground of superior rank or grade in the service, but from the character of the service which he is designated to perform. 'One of the exceptions to the general rule of the common law that the master is not liable to one employee for the negligence of a co-employee in the same service arises from the obligation of the master, whether a natural person or a corporate body, not to expose the servant, when conducting the master's business, to perils or hazards against which he may be guarded by proper diligence upon the part of the master.' Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Fox, 31 Kan. 597, 3 Pac. 322. Such proper diligence imposes upon the master such duties as to furnish to the men a reasonably safe place in which to work, to furnish them proper and safe machinery and materials with which to work, to exercise reasonable care and diligence in making sufficient regulations for the safe running of trains, so as to avoid injury from collisions, etc., to furnish sufficiently skilful coemployees and in sufficient number for the safe performance of any particular piece of work in which an employee is called upon to take part," etc. The same exceptions referred to by Justice Corn have been made in the statutes of several of the states, are the same as those mentioned in some of the English cases before cited, and are among the exceptions set out in the employer's liability act of 1880. Independent of statute, they are, in principle, correct, and are sustained by public policy and the decisions of many well-considered cases by the courts in this country. Under these exceptions a person intrusted by the master with the management of his general business, or with some special part of it, is not a fellow servant with the subordinate employee. The duties imposed by these exceptions are personal duties of the master, which can in no way be delegated by him so as to relieve him from liability. Nor is the negligence of the person to whom the management of the master's business is intrusted among the risks of the employment which the servant assumes. As Blake, the foreman, and his assistant, were both present when the rails were being loaded, the former directing and the latter assisting the men engaged in the work, if the manner of loading the rails upon the cars was negligent, and in consequence thereof, as alleged in the complaint, one of the rails on the top of the cars, being loose and unfastened, fell down the slope, and injured the plaintiff, it was the negligence of the foreman and his assistant, and not that of the employees working under them. Whether the manner was negligent was in issue, and, under the evidence, was a question for the jury to determine. The case at bar is distinguishable from the Wyoming case in this: The plaintiff was not, as in that case, present and assisting in the operation which caused the injury. Nor was the head foreman in that case, as in the case at bar, present and directing the operation.

It follows from what we have said that all of the requests under consideration were properly refused, first, because it is not the law in the state of Wyoming that "persons employed in the same general work" of the master are fellow servants, and on principle, and by the weight of authority, persons engaged in the service of the master, who are intrusted by him with the management or direction of his general work, or with some particular part thereof, are not fellow servants with the subordinate employees, but are vice principals; and, second, under the evidence the alleged negligence is not attributable to either the engineer or the subordinate employees who assisted in loading the rails upon the cars.

5. The appellant also has assigned as error the giving of the following instruction: "(7) It is the duty of the master, when the nature of the business required it, to make and promulgate rules for the protection of his servants, and to use due care and diligence, after the making and promulgating of a necessary rule, to have it enforced; and if you should find from the evidence in this case that the nature of the defendant's business was such as, in the exercise of due care and prudence for the safety of its employees, required the making and promulgating of rules, and should further find that the defendant failed to make and promulgate such rules, or, having made and promulgated the same, failed to use due care and diligence to have them enforced, and should further find that the injuries, if any, received by the plaintiff were caused by such failure, you should find for the plaintiff." The following rule, stated in Barrows on Negligence, p. 102, § 40, is generally sustained by both courts and text writers, to wit: "It is the duty of the master to prescribe and publish such suitable rules as the circumstances may reasonably require for the proper and safe transaction of the business. This duty of the master to protect his servants by making suitable rules for the safe management of the business becomes more imperative in proportion to the danger and complication of the work; but whether any rule at all is required, in the exercise of ordinary care, in a particular case, or whether the one in effect at the time of the injury was reasonably sufficient, are generally questions of fact for the jury. . . . And the master must also exercise ordinary care to see that the rules and regulations are enforced." A failure upon the part of the master to perform this duty is negligence per se. Wood, Mast. & S. § 403. Whether this duty has been performed depends upon the circumstances of each particular case; and when the evidence, as in this case, is such as reasonable men might differ as to whether the duty has been performed, it is a question for the jury. In Eastwood v. Retsch Min. Co. 86 Hun, 91, 96, 34 N. Y. Supp. 196, 198, the court said: "It is quite clear in this case that the question whether or not the case was a proper one for requiring the defendant to establish rules for the government of its employees in drawing salt from this bin when men were engaged inside of it was one as to which reasonable men might differ. . . . In every case its duty is performed by the exercise of reasonable care in deciding in the first place whether rules are necessary, and, in the second place, in making such rules as appear to be sufficient. But the question in either case may be for the jury whether, in the first place, the company took reasonable care to conclude whether rules were necessary, or, in the second place, if they were, whether the rules thus made were proper for the purpose for which they were intended. When the question is whether the case was one in which rules ought to have been made, the fact that other people or corporations engaged in the same business had or had not found it necessary to make rules upon that subject, is one which might well be considered. But the fact that no such rules had been made is not conclusive 67 L. R. A.

against the necessity of making them. It is simply a fact to be considered." Under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence, the instruction under consideration correctly stated the law, and properly submitted to the jury the question as to whether the defendant, in respect to the matter of making, promulgating, and enforcing necessary rules, was negligent.

6. In addition to the instructions hereinbefore mentioned, requested by the defendant, ten others were asked for by it, and the refusal of each is assigned as error. As the instructions given by the court covered the whole case, and properly submitted it to the jury, the other ten requests being of minor importance, it is not necessary to pass upon them. State v. Hairorth, 24 Utah, 398-425, 68 Pac. 155, and cases there cited; Holland v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. 26 Utah, 209, 72 Pac. 940.

7. In the examination in chief of a witness for the plaintiff the following occurred:

Q. Now tell just the movement of that car when it was in operation down that slope?

A. I could not say for that car or that trip at that time.

Q. Other trips?

Defendant's counsel objected to these questions as incompetent in this: That what may have been done at other times was not evidence of what was done on the occasion of the injury. The objection was overruled, and the witness answered: "I was with it at various times and places in that slope during my employment prior to this accident. At times it would run steady, and at other times it kind of jerked." It is, in substance, alleged in the complaint that on the day of the injury, and long prior thereto, by reason of the weight of the rails, the downward slope of the shaft, and the jerking of the cable, the letting down of the rails was very dangerous to the plaintiff, and that the defendant had full notice thereof. These allegations were denied in the defendant's answer. In view of that fact the objection was properly overruled.

8. A witness for the defendant was asked by its counsel the following question: "Mr. Hopkins, after your experience and investigation in these matters, which is the better or safer way of letting down those rails in the mine in question, by placing, as was done formerly, against plank—the end of the rail against plank—raised above the surface of the car behind (that is, the one in vogue at the time of the accident), or the one you now say they adopted by hanging them on an iron rod?" This question was objected to by the plaintiff as incompetent, and calling for an opinion upon a matter which it was the province of the jury to decide. As to which of the methods referred to in the question was the safest was not an issue in the case, and the opinion called for related to a matter which, if it had been in issue, would have been a question exclusively for the jury, and therefore not the subject of expert opinions.

Upon a careful examination of the whole record we fail to discover any reversible error.

The judgment is affirmed with costs.

FLORIDA SUPREME COURT.

HARTFORD FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

Joseph H. REDDING et al.

(.....Fla.....)

*1. Chapter 4173, p. 101, act approved June 3, 1893, which authorizes the recovery of attorneys' fees in certain cases against insurance companies, is constitutional.

2. The attorneys' fees provided for by chap. 4173, p. 101, act approved June 3, 1893, may, under the 2d section of that act, be recovered in the same suit and included in the same judgment as the amount due upon the policy of insurance.

3. Chapter 4173, p. 101, act approved June 3, 1893, which authorizes the recovery of attorneys' fees in certain cases against insurance companies, was not repealed by chap. 4677, p. 33, act approved May 31, 1899.

4. Chapter 4677, p. 33, act approved May 31, 1899, does not deprive the insurer of the right to plead that the fire was caused by the criminal conduct of the insured, or that the insurable value thereby required to be fixed and written in the policy was procured to be so fixed by fraud on the part of the assured.

5. Chapter 4677, p. 33, act approved May 31, 1899, is not repugnant to the Constitution of this state, nor to that of the United States.

6. Leave to amend a pleading may be granted during a term of court without notice to the opposite party of the application therefor, even though the cause has been submitted upon demurrer by brief at such term.

7. Where an amendment of the declaration is permitted pending the hearing of a demurrer thereto the court should permit the defendant to plead or demur to the amended declaration, and it will be error for the court to apply the demurrer on file to the amended declaration without defendant's consent.

8. Errors without injury are not ground for reversal.

9. The requirements in the standard insurance policy that the insured shall give notice of loss and make proofs of loss are conditions precedent to the right to sue; but a failure to give the notice or to make the proofs within the time stipulated will not invalidate the policy, or work a forfeiture of the rights of the insured, in the absence of a stipulation to that effect, but will merely postpone the day of payment, where such notice is given and proofs of loss made within such time as will enable the insured to bring his suit within the time limited by the policy.

10. Where proofs of loss required to be made and served upon the company by the policy are sufficiently full to give the company notice of the loss required by another provision in the policy, the same document will be sufficient as a notice of the loss, as well as proofs of loss.

11. Proofs of loss served upon an insurance company, signed and sworn to by the insured, stating that the fire occurred at a stated hour on a day named; that it originated in the roof or attic of the building, but how it originated, or the cause thereof, was to the insured entirely unknown; that the fire did not originate by any act.

design, or procurement on the part of the insured, or in consequence of any fraud or evil practice done or suffered by the insured; and that any other information required by the company would be furnished on request,—substantially comply with a provision in the policy requiring the proofs of loss to state the knowledge and belief of the insured as to the time and origin of the fire, particularly as the company requested no further information from the insured.

12. Trial courts have power to permit parties to withdraw from written stipulations waiving a jury and submitting the cause upon an agreed statement of facts to the court. The exercise of such power rests in discretion, and it is properly exercised where the application is made before the court has decided the cause under the written submission, and the party applying has discovered other pertinent facts since the submission was entered into, which the other party declines to embrace in the agreed statement. The fact that, by the exercise of due diligence, the omitted facts might have been discovered before the submission was entered into, does not deprive the court of the power to grant the application to withdraw.

13. Under § 1050, Rev. Stat. 1892, a plaintiff may file more than one replication or subsequent pleading to any pleading of the defendant, if he so desires.

14. Where, at the time a policy of insurance is written, other insurance exists upon the same property, and the fact is known to the agent, who communicates it to the company, and the company accepts the premium, and does not deny the validity of its policy on account of such other insurance until after a loss occurs, the company is liable, though its consent for such other insurance was not indorsed upon the policy as required by its terms. Such conduct on its part amounts to a waiver of the provision requiring written consent for other insurance, and the waiver will apply, not only to the other insurance as it existed when its policy was written, but to any policy subsequently issued in lieu or renewal of such other insurance.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Jefferson County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to enforce payment of the amount alleged to be due under a fire insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. T. L. Clarke, for defendants in error:

Notice to the agent is notice to the company, especially when communicated by the agent to the company, and when received and acted on by the company.

If insured was entirely without knowledge as to how the fire occurred or the cause thereof; and if it did not originate from any act, procurement, or evil practice done or suffered by insured,—it can scarcely be presumed that insured had any belief as to the origin of the fire.

If the insurer objects to proofs of loss, he must return them promptly and point out their defects; and they are presumed to be waived if the insurer does not object to defects therein, but bases its refusal to pay on other grounds.

This policy covered a building which was totally destroyed by fire, of which destruction the insurer had immediate notice; and, under our statutes fixing the measure of damages in such cases, and upon the principles of general insurance law, no further proofs of loss were necessary or could be required to perfect a right of action in the insured.

Admitting that this policy has no indorsement permitting the additional insurance, the court, in overruling this demurrer, simply holds that the facts set out in the replication constitute a waiver and estoppel on the part of the defendant.

As waiver and estoppel cannot be abolished by contract, the clause as to written consent does not prevent the operation of the usual rules by which the subsequent waiver of that clause may be established.

Carter, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This writ of error is taken from a judgment in favor of defendants in error rendered by the circuit court of Jefferson county in an action against plaintiff in error upon a fire insurance policy. The policy, in 67 L. R. A.

form, is substantially the same as that set forth in the statement of facts in the case of Indian River State Bank v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. (Fla.) 35 So. 228, except as hereinafter stated. It is dated October 14, 1899, and purports to insure Ida H. Redding, for the term of one year from October 15, 1899, "against all direct loss or damage by fire except as hereinafter provided to an amount not exceeding $1,500" to the building therein specifically described. It contains an indorsement, "The insurable value of the building herein described is fixed at $3,000," purporting to have been made "to comply with the act of the legislature of the state of Florida regulating the issue of policies by fire insurance companies, approved May 31, 1899."

The declaration, as originally drawn, alleges the making of the policy, the payment of the premium, and the ownership of the property by Ida H. Redding at the time the policy was issued and at the time of the fire. It alleges that by the policy the defendant "did insure the plaintiff Ida H. Redding for the term of one year from the said 15th day of October, A. D. 1899, at noon, to the 15th day of October, A. D. 1900, at noon, against all loss or damage by fire, except as therein provided, to an amount not exceeding the sum of $1,500," on a certain building (describing it); that "in and by its said policy the said defendant, the Hartford Fire Insurance Company, did promise and agree to pay to the plaintiff Ida H. Redding all such loss or damage as might occur to said building by fire during the period of such insurance aforesaid, not exceeding the said sum of $1,500, sixty days after notice and proof of such loss or damage furnished to the said defendant company;" that "on the 21st day of August, A. D. 1900, and while the said policy of insurance was in full force and effect, the aforesaid building was totally and entirely lost and destroyed by fire, of which loss and destruction the said defendant had due notice;" and that "the plaintiff Ida H. Redding has rendered to the said defendant company a particular account and proof of said loss more than sixty days prior to the commencement of this action, and has otherwise fully complied on her part with all the conditions of said contract of insurance." It further alleges that the cash value of the building was $4,000 at the time of the loss; that Ida H. Redding actually sustained loss to said amount; that the total insurance on the building was $3,000, consisting of the policy in suit, "and a like policy of insurance for the sum of $1,500 issued to the plaintiff Ida H. Redding on the said building by the Home Insurance Company of New York city, at its Monticello, Florida, agency, numbered 328, dated April 18, 1900, and expiring April 18, A. D. 1901, of all which the defendant had due notice and proof."

There are other allegations in the declaration, which need not be noticed, further than to say that attorneys' fees were claimed under the statute hereafter referred to. The policy was attached to, and made a part of, the declaration.

The defendant filed its motion to strike those allegations of the declaration claiming attorneys' fees upon the grounds:

(1) There is no law authorizing such recovery.

(2) There is no law which required defendant to pay attorneys' fees before suit brought and prosecuted.

(3) There is no law authorizing plaintiff to demand such fees before suit brought and prosecuted. Consequently there can be no failure to pay, on which to predicate a demand and refusal. This motion was overruled, and the ruling is assigned as error.

The court at the trial instructed the jury to find for the plaintiff an additional sum as attorneys' fees, to be fixed at such reasonable amount as was shown by the evidence. This instruction was excepted to, and is also assigned as error.

The recovery of attorneys' fees in cases of this character is authorized by chapter 4173, p. 101, act approved June 3, 1893. It is contended that the statute is unconstitutional, but this court held otherwise in Tillis v. Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. (Fla.) 35 So. 171, and we adhere to that decision. The 2d section of the statute provides that "the amount to be recovered for fees and compensation for attorneys and solicitors against life and fire insurance companies as provided in the foregoing section, shall be ascertained and fixed by the court in chancery causes, or a jury in common law actions, from testimony adduced for that purpose, and shall be included in the judgment or decree rendered against such companies." This language shows very clearly that the legislature intended to authorize the plaintiff in actions upon life and fire insurance policies to recover and have included in one and the same judgment the amount due upon the policy and the attorneys' fees, and there is consequently no impropriety in claiming attorneys' fees by the declaration which seeks to recover upon the policy.

It is further contended that the statute was repealed by chapter 4677, p. 33, act approved May 31, 1899, entitled "An Act to Regulate Contracts of Insurance of Buildings and Structures in This State, to Fix a Measure of Damage in Case of Loss, and to

"Sec. 1. That from and after the passage of this act any individual, firm, corporation, or association insuring any building or structure in this state against loss or damage by fire or lightning, shall cause such building or structure to be examined by an agent of the insurer and full description thereof to be made, and the insurable value thereof to be fixed by such agent and written in the policy; in the absence of any change increasing the risk without the consent of the insurers, in case of total loss the whole amount mentioned in the policy upon which the insurers receive a premium shall be paid, and in case of partial loss the full amount of the partial loss shall be paid; but in no case shall the insurer be required to pay more than the amount upon which a premium is paid.

"Sec. 2. In case of the total loss of the property insured the measure of damage shall be the amount upon which the insured paid a premium, and, in case of partial loss, the measure of damage shall be such part of the amount upon which premiums are paid as the damage sustained is part of the insurable value of the building or structure as fixed by the agent of the insurer, and the insurers shall be estopped from denying that the property insured was worth at the time of insuring the amount of the insurable value as fixed by the agent.

"Sec. 3. Any person who solicits insurance and procures applications therefor shall be held to be the agent of the party issuing a policy upon such application, anything in the application or policy to the contrary notwithstanding.

"Sec. 4. That the defendant in any action brought upon a policy, or contract of insurance, hereafter made, or renewed, insuring any building or structure in this state against loss or damage by fire or lightning, shall not be permitted to defend against such action by setting up any claim, or provision of such policy, or contract of insurance, as avoiding the provisions, or any of them of this act: and it shall be the duty of the court on motion of the plaintiff, or on its own motion, to strike out any plea setting up such defense."

A question very similar to the one here presented was considered in Florida East Coast R. Co. v. Hazel, 43 Fla. 263, 31 So. 272, and it was held that the later statute did not repeal the former. There is no necessary inconsistency between the two statutes we are now considering and, upon the authority of the decision in that case, we hold that the act of 1893 was not repealed by the act of 1899. The motion to strike was properly denied. The instruction complained of is correct.

In this connection we will consider the contention made that the act of 1899 is unconstitutional. It is argued that, properly construed, the statute denies the right of the insurer to plead that the fire was caused by the criminal conduct of the insured; that the insured, by fraud, procured or induced the insurer to fix the insurable value at an excessive amount; and that the property depreciated in value between the date of the policy and the loss. The contention, as we understand it, is that the statute confines the insurer's defenses to four only, viz., that the contract was never, in fact, executed; that the loss set up never, in fact, occurred; that the loss was not due to fire or lightning; that the property insured was not, in fact, a building or structure in the state of Florida.

The statute requires the insurer to fix the insurable value of the building, and to specify such value in the policy; and the measure of damages in case of total loss is fixed at the amount mentioned in the policy upon which a premium is paid. The statute does not undertake to deprive the insurer of any proper defense it may have to an action upon the policy, except in respect to the measure of damages and the authority of certain agents. Its principal object and purpose are to fix the measure of damages in case of loss, total or partial, and, to this end, it requires the insurer to ascertain the insurable value at the time of writing the policy, and to write it therein. Its provisions do affect the three-fourths value and arbitration clauses, as well as other clauses contained in the policy; but there is nothing in its language that will justify us in holding that it deprives the insurer of the right to plead that the fire was caused by the criminal conduct of the assured, or that the insurable value was procured to be fixed by fraud on his part. Whether the statute, properly construed, deprives the insurer of the right to show that the property depreciated in value between the time the policy was issued and the loss, we do not find it necessary to determine in this case, as there is no claim that the property insured by this policy had so depreciated; but, if the statute does deprive the insurer of that right, it will not be unconstitutional for that reason. In fixing the insurable value, the insurer can consider depreciation as an element, and protect itself against ordinary depreciation in that way. Without further discussion of the question it is sufficient to say that the provisions of this statute are not contrary to the Constitution of this state or of the United States. Orient Ins. Co. v. Daggs, 172 67 L. R. A.

The defendant filed its demurrer to the original declaration, and the demurrer came on for hearing during a term of the court. The order on demurrer recites that "this action having been submitted on brief of counsel for the respective parties on the demurrer of defendant to plaintiffs' declaration, and the plaintiffs having, with leave of the court, amended their said declaration by striking out the word 'otherwise,' in line 20 from top of second page of said declaration, and by inserting after the word 'proof,' in line 4 from top of third page of said declaration, the words 'and made no objection to such additional insurance,' thereupon, upon consideration of the same, it is considered and ordered that the said demurrer of the defendant to the complainants' declaration be, and the same is hereby, overruled, and the defendant is granted leave until the first Monday in January, A. D. 1902, to plead over to said declaration." Several assignments of error are based upon this order, which we will now discuss.

It is first insisted that the court erred in permitting the declaration to be amended without notice to the defendant. The rule requiring notice of applications to amend (common-law rule No. 12) has reference to amendments made in vacation, and not to those made in term. It is true that the demurrer in this case was submitted upon briefs, but it was heard and decided and the amendment was permitted in term. The mere fact that the parties chose to submit the demurrer upon briefs during the term did not deprive the court of the power to make any appropriate order in term, without requiring special notice to be given, that it could have made, had the demurrer been submitted orally, or if the case had not been before the court upon demurrer at all. There was therefore no error in permitting the amendment of the declaration without requiring special notice of the application to amend.

It is also contended that the court erred in depriving defendant of the right to demur to the amended declaration, by requiring it to "plead over," and in applying the demurrer to the amended declaration without a request on its part to that effect. This court is of opinion that such contention is correct. When the declaration was amended, the defendant should have had an opportunity to plead to the amended declaration by filing a demurrer, if it deemed the amended pleading bad, or by filing pleas, if it chose to file pleas instead of a demurrer. But the defendant was entitled to have its demurrer applied to the amended declaration, if it desired, and the court did in fact give it the benefit of the demurrer to the same extent as if application had been made to that effect. The court below gave it the same benefit of the demurrer as if it had been filed to the amended declaration, which the defendant knew at the time of filing its pleas; and, with this knowledge, it filed pleas, without offering to file a demurrer, or asking leave to do so. It now asks that the order overruling the demurrer be reviewed and reversed, because, as it insists, the declaration was bad, and therefore the demurrer should have been sustained, instead of overruled. The grounds of demurrer are broad enough to include every objection urged to the declaration as amended, and, if the declaration is valid as against these objections, the judgment should not be reversed for this technical error in a mere matter of practice, which did not and could not injure the defendant.

The principal questions sought to be presented by the objections to the declaration as amended depend upon the correct interpretation of certain provisions in the policy relating to notice of loss and proofs of loss, and upon the effect to be given other provisions requiring the defendant's consent for other insurance to be evidenced by indorsements upon or additions to the policy. These provisions are substantially the same as those contained in the policy in the case of Indian River State Bank v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. (Fla.) 35 So. 228, as already stated, except that the policy in that case provides that "if fire occur the insured shall give immediate notice of any loss," etc., while the policy in the present case omits the word "immediate." Probably the omission of this word is a clerical error in copying the policy in the transcript, but the omitted word is not regarded as material to this case, as without it the proper construction of the provision as it stands would probably require the notice to be given within a reasonable time. So construing it, what effect will the omission to give the notice of loss and to furnish proofs of loss have upon the rights of the insured? In the case referred to above, it was contended that the failure of the assured to make proofs of loss required by the policy within the time thereby provided wrought an absolute forfeiture thereof, and released the insurer from all liability thereon. The court said: "Unfortunately for this contention, it is founded upon a false premise. The provision of the policy sued upon herein requiring the assured to make proofs of loss within sixty days after the fire does not provide that such policy shall become void, forfeited, or annulled upon a failure to furnish such proofs of loss within the prescribed time, and such is not the legal effect of said contract between the parties. Taken in connection with another provision of said contract of insurance, the only effect of a failure to furnish the prescribed proofs of loss within the required time, when such failure has not been excused or waived, is that it postpones the date when the amount of the loss becomes due and payable, and consequently postpones the time within which suit may be brought thereon; another part of the policy providing that the amount due upon the policy shall be payable sixty days after satisfactory proofs of loss have been received by the company." The effect of a failure to give the notice of loss immediately or within a definite time was not considered in that case, but we think it is governed by the same principles. The provision requiring notice of loss is of the same nature as that requiring proofs of loss; the two are used in the same connection in the policy; and, while each constitutes a condition to the right to sue, and must be performed, if not waived, before suit can be instituted, it is nowhere provided that a failure to perform them within the time specified shall release the company from liability, or render the policy void. There are many provisions in the policy requiring the performance by the insured of stipulations relating to the insurance after as well as before the loss, the nonperformance of which, it is expressly stated, will render the policy void or release the company from liability; but no such effect is stipulated for failure to give the notice and make the proofs within the required time. Many authorities can be found which require the notice of loss to be made within the time specified; but the same authorities also hold the same rule with respect to proofs of loss. We think the same principles which uphold the rule announced in Indian River State Bank v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. (Fla.) 35 So. 228, require a like holding with respect to the notice of loss. In Ermentrout v. Girard F. & M. Ins. Co. 63 Minn. 305, 30 L. R. A. 346, 56 Am. St. Rep. 481, 65 N. W. 635, and other Minnesota cases, it was held that the failure to comply with the requirement to give immediate notice was a condition precedent to the company's liability; but in Mason v. St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co. 82 Minn. 336, 83 Am. St. Rep. 433, 85 N. W. 13, the previous cases are referred to, and the doctrine announced that the result stated does not apply to the Minnesota standard policy, because that policy does not provide that a failure to give notice or make the proofs within the time stated shall invalidate the policy or work a forfeiture of the rights of the insured, and that the failure to comply with the requirement within the time stated will simply postpone the day of payment. See also Peninsular Land Transp. & Mfg. Co. v. Franklin Ins. Co. 35 W. Va. 666, 14 S. E. 237; Coventry Mut. Live Stock Ins. Assn. v. Evans, 102 Pa. 281; Hurt v. Employers' Liability Assur. Corp. 122 Fed. 828.

Having ascertained the proper construction of the provisions of the policy respecting notice and proofs of loss, we will consider the objections urged to the amended declaration, with respect to these matters. The declaration attempts to set out the legal effect of the policy, and it also makes the policy itself a part of its averments. It is contended that there is a variance between the alleged legal effect and the instrument itself, properly construed. The variance, it is thought, arises upon a comparison of the language of the declaration that the defendant promised to pay "sixty days after notice and proof of such loss furnished to the said defendant," and the stipulations of the policy, which, it is claimed, when properly construed, require it to pay sixty days after the notice of loss and proofs of loss, rendered in accordance with the terms of the policy; i. e., notice of loss given immediately or within a reasonable time, and proofs of loss rendered within sixty days after the fire. As we have already shown, this is not the proper construction of the contract. The suit was begun February 19, 1901. The fire is alleged to have occurred August 21, 1900. The declaration alleges that proofs of loss were rendered more than sixty days prior to the commencement of the suit, which would show that they were rendered prior to December 19, 1900, or within four months of the fire. Even if no other notice of the loss was given, except the proofs of loss so alleged to have been furnished, the declaration shows that the proofs were of such a nature as to give "notice of the loss," and, as these proofs were furnished long before the contract limitation upon the suit expired, it was sufficient to authorize recovery in this case. The alleged variance between the allegations of the declaration and the terms of the policy made a part thereof does not exist, if the construction we have placed upon the policy is correct.

Another objection to the declaration is that it appears therefrom that, after the issuance of the policy sued on, another policy was obtained from the Home Insurance Company for a like amount; that no permission to take such additional policy was indorsed in writing upon the Hartford policy, as appears from an inspection of the latter, made a part of the declaration; and that, consequently, the policy became void, under that clause which reads: "This entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, shall be void if the insured now has, or shall hereafter make or procure, any other contract of insurance, whether valid or not, on property covered in whole or in part by this policy." The declaration, as amended, alleges that the additional policy was obtained in April, and that defendant had due notice and proof of the additional insurance, and made no objection thereto. If the defendant had notice of the additional insurance, and made no objection thereto, it must be held to have given its consent thereto. By its failure to object after notice of the fact, the insured was led to rely upon the validity of its policy; and it cannot now, after a loss, when it is too late for the insured to obtain other insurance, be permitted to repudiate its liability upon the ground stated. This allegation shows a waiver of the provisions of the policy requiring that the permission for such additional insurance be indorsed on or added thereto,—a proposition which we discuss under another assignment of error: and therefore the objection to the declaration now being considered is not tenable.

The fifth ground of the demurrer complains that the declaration does not aver performance of conditions precedent generally, nor particularly the performance of each and every condition precedent, nor set up excuse for nonperformance. We have shown that the amended declaration does allege the issuance of the policy, the payment of the premium and the loss, and that it sufficiently alleges performance of the provisions requiring notice and proof of loss, and waiver of the requirement that permission for other insurance must be indorsed on the policy, if that can properly be considered a condition precedent. In addition to these special allegations, the declaration alleges generally that plaintiff "has fully complied on her part with all the conditions of said contract of insurance." If there are other conditions precedent not embraced in these averments, they do not now occur to us, and none were pointed out either in the oral argument or briefs.

The defendant, after its demurrer was overruled, filed two pleas, in substance as follows: First. That the policy sued on contains a provision that "if fire occur the insured shall give immediate notice of any loss thereby in writing to this company; and defendant avers that the notice so required was not given in writing or otherwise."

Second. That the policy sued on provides "that the insured within sixty days after the fire, unless such time is extended in writing by the insurance company, shall render a statement to the insurance company, signed and sworn to by the insured, stating the knowledge and belief of the insured as to the time and origin of the fire: and defendant avers that the time was not extended, and the statement so required was not rendered."

After plaintiffs' demurrer to these pleas was overruled, they filed their replication thereto, alleging, substantially, that on December 17, 1900, they sent by mail to defendant a statement in writing signed and sworn to by Ida H. Redding; the insured stating therein, among other things, "that the fire by which the insured building was destroyed occurred about 11 P. M. August 21, 1900, originating in the roof or attic of said building, but how said fire originated, or the cause thereof, was to said insured entirely unknown; that said fire did not originate by any act, design, or procurement on the part of said insured, or in consequence of any fraud or evil practice done or suffered by the insured, and that any other information required by defendant would be furnished on call;" that said written statement so signed and sworn to by insured, was received by defendant, and by it retained until the 24th day of December, A. D. 1900, and then returned to plaintiffs with the objections only that the same had not been furnished within sixty days after the fire occurred, and no other or further information was called for by the defendant. The defendant demurred to this replication, and the order overruling it is assigned as error.

It is beyond question that the written proofs of loss which the replication alleges were delivered to defendant in December after the fire in August were a sufficient "notice of loss." Weed v. Hamburg-Bremen F. Ins. Co. 133 N. Y. 394, text, 407, 31 N. E. 231; Purcell v. St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co. 5 N. D. 100, text, 112, 64 N. W. 943. And, as we have already seen, the failure to give this notice immediately did not invalidate the policy, but merely postponed plaintiffs' right to sue. The replication was, therefore, a complete answer to the first plea.

The objection to the replication, as applied to the second plea, is that the insured did not state in the proofs of loss her belief as to the origin of the fire. It does not appear that the insured had any belief as to the origin of the fire which she could state. She does state the time of the fire, and that it originated in the attic; but how it originated, or the cause thereof, she swears, was entirely unknown to her. She then proceeds to state her knowledge that it did not originate through her procurement, or in consequence of any fraud or evil practice done or suffered by her. There is no intimation anywhere that she had any belief upon the subject, and it affirmatively appears that she had no knowledge of any fact upon which to base a belief. We think the statement rendered substantially complies with the requirements of the policy. McNally v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 137 N. Y. 389, 33 N. E. 475; Hovard Ins. Co. v. Hocking, 115 Pa. 415, 8 Atl. 592; 13 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law. p. 336. An offer to furnish other information, if desired, was made; and, as the company did not avail itself of that offer by asking other information, according to the allegations of the replication, it seems evident that it did not regard the absence of the statement of belief as material at that time.

It is contended that the replication is a departure from the declaration, but we think otherwise. The declaration alleges performance with respect to the notice of loss and proofs of loss, the pleas deny the allegations of performance, and the replication merely reiterates performance, setting forth the facts at length. The replication does not set up waiver, but performance, in accordance with the interpretation we put upon the provisions of the policy.

Nearly a year after the pleas above considered were filed, the defendant filed its third plea, alleging that "it is provided in the contract sued on, 'This entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, shall be void if the insured now has, or shall hereafter make or procure, any other contract of insurance, whether valid or not, on property covered in whole or in part by this policy:' and defendant avers that after said policy was issued, to wit, on the 18th day of April, A. D. 1900, the insured, Ida H. Redding, procured another contract of insurance on the property covered by the policy sued on, issued by the Home Insurance Company, which other insurance was not provided for by agreement indorsed on or added to said policy sued on." The plaintiffs filed their replication to this plea, and defendant its demurrer to the replication; and thereupon, by agreement of parties, a jury was waived, and the cause was submitted to the judge upon an agreed statement of facts, to be decided in vacation. This agreement was made November 20, 1902. On December 2d following, plaintiffs moved the court for leave to withdraw their replication to the third plea, and for leave to withdraw from the written submission and stipulation entered into November 20, 1902; basing the latter application upon the fact that other material testimony on behalf of plaintiffs had been discovered since the making of the agreement for submission, and because the pleadings, evidence, and stipulations then on file did not fully and fairly present to the court the facts as they really existed. At the hearing it was shown that, within five days after the written agreement was entered into, plaintiffs notified defendant that they had discovered the existence of material facts not embraced in the written agreement, and requested that the additional matter be embraced in the agreed statement of facts. Counsel declined to accede to the request, and thereupon the motion to withdraw from the submission was made. The motion was resisted principally because the additional matters could have been known to plaintiffs' counsel before the submission if he had exercised due diligence to ascertain them. The court granted the motion to withdraw plaintiffs' replication to the third plea, and also permitted plaintiffs to withdraw from the written submission, and to file new replications to the third plea, and these rulings are assigned as error.

Under our very liberal statute of amendments the court had ample power to permit plaintiffs to withdraw their replication and to file others. The matter rested very largely in the discretion of the court, and no abuse of discretion is shown.

Nor do we perceive any impropriety in the ruling permitting plaintiffs to withdraw from the written stipulation. As defendant would not consent to amend the agreed statement of facts so as to embrace the additional matters which plaintiffs desired to incorporate therein, and as the court had not rendered its decision in pursuance of the stipulation, it was proper to permit plaintiffs to withdraw from the stipulation, in order that the case might take its regular course before a jury, and the parties thereby have an opportunity to present all pertinent facts. The defendant was not deprived of any substantial right by the order. It had not been misled to its disadvantage, nor put to any trouble or inconvenience, between the date of the submission and the plaintiffs' motion to withdraw. The mere fact that plaintiffs might have discovered the new matter, by the exercise of proper diligence, before they agreed to the submission, does not, as a matter of law, deprive them of the privilege of withdrawing from the submission, for the case had not been decided by the court, and therefore the strict rule of diligence applicable to new trials for newly discovered evidence does not apply. The court had power to make the order, the matter rested in its discretion, and no abuse of discretion is shown. 20 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 670.

The replication to the third plea filed by plaintiffs in pursuance of leave granted alleges, among other things, that on October 15, 1889, plaintiff Ida H. Redding applied to the local agent of the defendant, who was also the local agent of the Etna Fire Insurance Company, for insurance on the building; that the agent had authority, on behalf of the companies, to examine the building, fix its insurable value, write, countersign, and issue policies thereon, and to collect and receive the premium; that he examined the building, fixed the insurable value at $3,000, issued to plaintiff the policy sued on, and a like policy in the Etna Insurance Company, and thereupon, in discharge of his duty, gave defendant immediate notice in writing of the $1,500 additional insurance; that defendant, with full knowledge and notice of the existence of the additional insurance, consented to and accepted the risk, with the purpose and intent that same should be concurrent with additional insurance of $1,500, and not avoided thereby, and with purpose and intent to waive and forego any and all benefit of said provisions and conditions; that, in faith thereof, and with the sole purpose of procuring such insurance to be concurrent with additional insurance on said building to the amount of $1,500, and not otherwise, the plaintiff paid and defendant received the premium, amounting to the sum of $60; that afterwards, on April 18, 1900, the Etna Insurance Company canceled its policy, and, in lieu and place thereof, the same agent, who was also the agent of the Home Insurance Company, wrote, countersigned, issued, and delivered to plaintiff Ida H. Redding the policy of the last-named company, for $1,500, mentioned in defendant's plea; that afterwards, on December 24, 1900, plaintiff Ida H. Redding, in her sworn proofs of loss then furnished defendant, notified and fully advised it of the policy for $1,500 in the Home Insurance Company, and the defendant then and there made no claim that said additional insurance was not provided for by agreement indorsed on its policy, and set up no want of knowledge or consent on its part to the existence of said additional insurance, and claimed no forfeiture of its said policy by reason of said additional insurance, or by reason of any failure to comply with the provisions and conditions set up in its said plea; and that defendant has made no tender of, or offer to return, the premium of $60 so as aforesaid paid by plaintiffs to defendant for its said policy, but still retains the same. The defendant demurred to this replication, but the court overruled it, and this ruling is assigned as error.

It is contended that the replication is a departure from the declaration. The declaration alleges that defendant had notice of the additional insurance, and facts showing a waiver with respect to the provisions relating to indorsement on the policy of permission for such additional insurance. The plea does not traverse this allegation of waiver, nor deny that defendant had notice, but asserts merely that the permission for other insurance was not indorsed upon the policy. The replication reiterates waiver, and alleges specifically the facts which it is claimed constitute such waiver. The plea is not directly responsive to the material allegations of the declaration, and for that reason might, perhaps, have been held bad upon demurrer; but the replication constitutes no departure from the declaration, as both allege waiver.

It is also contended that plaintiffs, having already filed one replication taking issue upon this plea, could not be permitted to file another, the argument being that, while the statute (Rev. Stat. 1892, § 1063) permits more than one plea to be filed to the declaration, the same indulgence was not, and could not with safety be, extended to replications. Rev. Stat. 1892, § 1059, provides that a plaintiff "may file as many replications or subsequent pleadings to any pleading of the defendant as he may desire," and this language fully answers defendant's contention, without further comment.

The principal contention, however, relates to the sufficiency of the allegations of the plea to show a waiver of the provision of the policy requiring the company's permission for additional insurance to be indorsed on or added thereto; and it is strenuously insisted that the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Northern Assur. Co. v. Grand View Bldg. Assn. 183 U. S. 308, 46 L. ed. 213, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 133, conclusively decides that question in favor of defendant. The provisions of the policy construed in that case, so far as the question now being considered is concerned, are very similar to the provisions invoked by defendant, contained in the policy sued on in this case. In that case the jury found that, when the policy was issued, other insurance upon the property was in existence; that the agent who issued the policy was recording agent of the company, having authority to countersign and issue policies, to accept fire insurance risks in its behalf, and to collect and receive premiums therefor; that the agent knew of the other insurance when he issued the policy; and that no consent for such additional insurance was indorsed on the policy. It further appeared that knowledge of the additional insurance was never communicated to the company until proofs of loss were made, and that the company, immediately upon receipt of such information, denied any liability on that ground, and tendered the insured the premium paid by him. The court held that the agent's authority in matters of waiver of conditions was limited to the method designated,—that is, by indorsements on, or written additions to, the policy,—and that, as knowledge of the additional insurance was never acquired by the company until the loss occurred, when it immediately denied liability because of such additional insurance, and tendered the insured the premium, the company was not liable for the loss. This decision is directly in conflict with the opinions of many other courts and text writers, and several courts, since it was rendered, have refused to follow it. Thompson v. Traders' Ins. Co. 169 Mo. 12, 68 S. W. 889; Orient Ins. Co. v. McKnight, 197 Ill. 190, 64 N. E. 339. See also Clement, Fire Insurance as a Valid Contract, p. 413.

We do not think the decision in that case, even if it is correct, controls the present one. Here we have not simply the knowledge of the local agent that the additional insurance existed, but the knowledge of the company itself, which, with such knowledge, accepted the premium, and thereby gave its consent to the additional insurance. Knowing that the additional insurance existed, and that its consent thereto was required by the terms of its policy to be indorsed thereon in order to render its contract valid, it was its duty to so indorse it, or decline to accept the premium which it knew was being paid for a supposed valid policy. The insured had no authority to indorse such consent on the policy; and, if the company intended to act fairly and honestly, and not to perpetrate a deliberate fraud, by accepting the consideration for its contract, known to be void, good faith required it either to indorse the policy, or to waive the provision requiring such indorsement. We cannot suppose that a fraud was intended by the company, and the only reasonable conclusion is that, by accepting and retaining the premium with knowledge of the additional insurance, it intended to waive the provision referred to. Clement, Fire Insurance as a Valid Contract, pp. 418, 428. In Tillis v. Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. (Fla.) 35 So. 171, we held that provisions of this nature might be waived, and the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, above referred to, admits that this is so, provided the waiver is made by an officer having authority. See also, to the same effect, Etna L. Ins. Co. v. Frierson, 51 C. C. A. 424, 114 Fed. 56; Gwaltney v. Prov- ident Sav. Life Assur. Soc. 132 N. C. 925, 44 S. E. 659; note to Wheaton v. North British & M. Ins. Co. 9 Am. St. Rep. 235; Kerr, Ins. p. 238. It is insisted, however, that the replication does not allege that the company knew that the agent had failed to indorse its consent to the additional insurance on the policy when it accepted the premium. We do not regard such knowledge material to the question in hand. Knowledge of the additional insurance was the important thing, and, with such knowledge, the company's plain duty required it to see that the proper indorsement was made on the policy if it elected to retain the premium, and, making no effort to perform that duty, it must be held to have waived the matter of indorsement. This is the reasonable view, and the only one consistent with fair dealing.

We have thus far treated the matter as if the policy mentioned in the plea constituted the additional insurance which existed at the time the policy in suit was issued; but the fact is not precisely that. The insurance in force when the policy was issued consisted of a policy in the Etna, which was afterwards canceled, and another issued in lieu thereof in the Home. The latter policy, however, was merely a substitute for the former, being issued for the same amount. We are of opinion that this substitution of one policy for the other does not constitute a breach of the condition against other insurance, for the defendant, by accepting the premium for the policy in suit with knowledge of the additional insurance then existing, thereby gave its consent for additional insurance to the amount then in existence for the full period of its own policy. The mere substitution of one policy for another of the same amount was permissible under that consent. See Stage v. Home Ins. Co. 76 App. Div. 509, 78 N. Y. Supp. 555. Evidently the defendant did not regard the Home policy as having been taken without its consent, for, according to the allegations of the replication, it made no objection to the proofs of loss on that account, and in its plea there is no denial that it had due notice of the additional insurance.

Several objections to testimony offered at the trial were interposed by defendant, which we will now consider. The proofs of loss were objected to on several grounds which have been disposed of in what has been said in considering other assignments of error.

daily report sent by its agent to the defendant on the day the policy in suit was issued was introduced in evidence by the plaintiffs, over certain objections interposed by defendant. This daily report was made up in pursuance of instructions to the agent to "give full copy of the policy," as well as other information; and it gives the written portions of the policy issued, with the indorsement slips. In answer to questions propounded, the agent stated that the company had no other policies in or on the same building; but in another place he stated there was $1,500 additional insurance on the property; and, being required to name companies, amounts, and rates, he stated, "Hartford," which was evidently a clerical error, in view of his other statement already referred to. It is contended that this report did not advise the company that there was any additional insurance upon the property; and, even if it did, the additional insurance was stated to exist in the same company, which was not the truth. We think the report clearly advises the company that there was $1,500 additional insurance. Besides, the plea does not deny the fact of knowledge. The conflicting statements in the daily report about its being in the same company put the defendant upon notice that some mistake had been made as to this matter, and it could easily ascertain by reference to its own records which statement was true. There was no uncertainty as to the fact that other insurance existed, which was the important matter for the company to know. The name of the company carrying the additional insurance was not required by the policy to be stated in the written consent. There was no error in admitting in evidence the daily report.

The court gave the general charge to find for the plaintiffs, to which an exception was taken. The defendant introduced no testimony, and, without encumbering this opinion with a further statement of the facts, we think it sufficient to say there was no error in giving the charge.

The judgment is affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

William MORRISON, Appt.,
v.
COMMONWEALTH of Kentucky.

(.....Ky.....)

1. Upon prosecution of one for killing the brother of a woman, with whom he was maintaining improper relations, in an altercation about her, evidence is admissible to show such relation for the purpose of explaining the circumstances of the parties, illustrating their motives, and showing interest on the part of the woman, who has testified on behalf of defendant.
2. The aggressor who kills his opponent in an altercation cannot show that decedent was a violent and dangerous man, and had made threats to kill him, which had been communicated to him.

3. A man is not entitled to champion the cause of a woman with whom he is maintaining improper relations, and defend her against the simple assaults of her brother, so as to give him the benefit of the rule of self-defense in case he kills the brother during the altercation.

I. Scope and nature.

The scope and nature of this note are plainly indicated by its name. The questions for consideration are, Was the homicide committed to prevent a criminal or unlawful act? and, If so, was the criminal or unlawful act such as to justify the commission of a homicide to prevent it, and was it necessary, or apparently necessary, in order to prevent it? and it is only necessary to distinguish between these questions and questions with relation to homicide to revenge a past criminal or unlawful act, and with relation to extenuation of homicide by provocation furnished by criminal or unlawful acts.

II. Forcible felonies and crimes.

a. General rules as to.

At common law, as well as under the statutes of most of the states, it is regarded as the duty of everyone seeing any felony attempted by force to prevent it, and, if need be, to extinguish the felon's existence for that purpose. Carpenter v. State, 62 Ark. 286, 36 S. W. 900; Dill v. State, 25 Ala. 15; Pond v. People, 8 Mich. 150.

The rule is that a man may repel force by force in defense of his person, habitation, or property, against one who manifestly endeavors by violence or surprise to commit a known felony such as rape, robbery, arson, burglary, or the like; and in these cases he is not obliged to retreat, but may pursue his adversary until he has freed himself from all danger. Carroll v. State, 23 Ala. 28, 58 Am. Dec. 282; Storey v. State, 71 Ala. 329; Carpenter v. State, 62 Ark. 286, 36 S. W. 900; Mitchell v. State, 43 Fla. 188, 30 So. 808; Richard v. State, 42 Fla. 528, 29 So. 413; State v. Thompson, 9 Iowa, 188, 74 Am. Dec. 342; State v. Kennedy, 20 Iowa, 569; Burton v. Com. 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1915, 66 S. W. 516; State v. Conally, 3 Or. 69; Stoneham v. Com. 86 Va. 523, 10 S. E. 238; United States v. Outerbridge, 5 Sawy. 620, Fed. Cas. No. 15,978; United States v. Wiltberger, 3 Wash. C. C. 515, Fed. Cas. No. 16,738.

And in such case a homicide committed by a person in defense of his person, habitation, or property, where the person killed manifestly intended and endeavored by violence or surprise to commit a forcible or atrocious felony upon either, is justifiable. Parrish v. Com. 81 Va. 1; State v. Dugan, Houst. Crim. Rep. (Del.) 563; State v. Thompson, 9 Iowa, 188, 74 Am. Dec. 342; State v. Kennedy, 20 Iowa, 569; State v. Rutherford, 8 N. C. (1 Hawks) 457, 9 Am. Dec. 658.

And it is likewise justifiable when committed for the prevention of any forcible or atrocious crime. Mitchell v. State, 22 Ga. 211, 68 Am. Dec. 493.

And all reference as to whether or not there was a peace officer on the ground at the time should be omitted from the instructions, in a prosecution against a person who killed another whom he had reasonable grounds to believe was about to commit a felony, in an effort to disarm

Messrs. James Andrew Scott and B. G. Williams for appellant.

Messrs. C. J. Pratt and M. R. Todd for the Commonwealth.

Hobson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant, William Morrison, was indicted for the murder of Alex Dean, and was convicted of manslaughter, and his punishment fixed at confinement in the penitentiary for eleven years. The proof shows that Ida Dean, a sister of the deceased, had borrowed an umbrella on the afternoon of the day of the homicide, she promising to return it that evening. About half past 8 o'clock she came up the street with the umbrella, and, meeting George

Turner, asked him if he had seen Morrison. They went on together, and soon met Alex Dean, who took hold of his sister and told her to go home, upbraiding her for being out looking for Morrison. There is a conflict of evidence as to what followed. The proof for the commonwealth is that Alex Dean went along the street with his sister, pushing her along about 90 feet, when she stopped, declining to go any further, and about this time Morrison, seeing them, ran down to where they were on his tiptoes, and stabbed Dean in the back; that he immediately fell to the ground, uttering no sound except a groan, and died in a few minutes. The proof for the defendant is that Morrison heard someone say that Alex Dean was beating his sister, and ran out to him and prevent its commission. Burton v. Com. 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1915, 66 S. W. 516.

The rule of law justifying homicide to prevent felony extends to statutory felonies as well as to felonies at common law. Storey v. State, 71 Ala. 329; Pond v. People, 8 Mich. 150; State v. Taylor, 143 Mo. 150, 44 S. W. 785.

But it does not extend to secret felonies not accompanied by force or violence. See infra, IV. a, b.

b. Justification limited to necessity.

The common-law doctrine is that to justify homicide for the prevention of any forcible and atrocious crime there must have been absolute necessity for the act. Mitchell v. State, 22 Ga. 211, 68 Am. Dec. 493; Reg. v. Bull, 9 Car. & P. 22.

That killing a man is justifiable homicide only where there was an intention upon his part to rob or murder, or do some serious bodily injury to, the slayer, rendering it necessary to do the act in self-defense. Reg. v. Bull, 9 Car. & P. 22.

And, under the general statutes existing in most of the states, to excuse one person for taking the life of another there must exist a necessity to prevent the commission of a felony, or the infliction of great bodily harm, or a reasonable belief in the mind of the slayer that such necessity exists. Noles v. State, 26 Ala. 31, 62 Am. Dec. 711; Lovett v. State, 30 Fla. 142, 17 L. R. A. 705, 11 So. 550. And see infra, II. c.

And it is at least manslaughter where one unnecessarily kills another while resisting an attempt by such other to commit any felony or do any other unlawful act, or where the killing is after such attempt has failed. Perugi v. State, 104 Wis. 230, 76 Am. St. Rep. 865, 80 N. W. 593.

Within these rules, killing a person to prevent the commission of a felony by him is not justified, when by arresting him, or disabling him, or otherwise, the felony can be prevented. Carpenter v. State, 62 Ark. 286, 36 S. W. 900.

And a person committing a homicide to prevent a felony would not be excusable if he used more force than reasonably appeared to be necessary to so restrain the person killed. Burton v. Com. 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1915, 66 S. W. 516; Blesot v. State, 53 Ind. 408.

So, to justify homicide to prevent the perpetration of any other felony, the danger or felony intended and the necessity of killing must not be problematical or remote, but evident and immediate. Weaver v. State, 19 Tex. App. 547, 53 Am. Rep. 389; Carpenter v. State, 62 Ark. 286, 36 S. W. 900.

The necessity must be great and the situation imminently perilous. State v. Thompson, 9 Iowa, 188, 74 Am. Dec. 342; State v. Kennedy, 20 Iowa, 569.

And the fact that a man had used, and was likely to use, fraudulent means for the purpose of seducing a woman by administering drugs to excite her or overcome her resistance does not justify the woman's brother in killing the man for the purpose of preventing the seduction, since the evil threatened could have been prevented by other means within his reach. People v. Cook, 39 Mich. 236, 33 Am. Rep. 380.

And one who surprises another in the act of placing an obstruction upon the track of a railroad with intent to wreck a train expected to pass a short time later, and thereby endanger the lives of the persons upon said train, and who shoots him, is not justified in the act as one done to prevent a felony, where he has no ground to fear that his own life will be taken, or that he will suffer great bodily harm; since other means may be taken to prevent the derailing of the train, and the endangering of life is too problematical and remote so long as the train is not immediately approaching. Weaver v. State, 19 Tex. App. 547, 53 Am. Rep. 389.

Whether or not killing a person was necessary to prevent the commission of a felony or great bodily harm to the person doing the killing or another is a question for the jury in a prosecution for the homicide, to be determined upon a preponderance of the evidence, the accused being entitled to the benefit of a reasonable doubt. State v. Conally, 3 Or. 69.

And the known character of a person for violence, and his acts and threats personally made, are a proper subject for consideration on the question as to whether or not killing him was necessary to prevent the commission of a felony, or great bodily harm to another. Ibid.

But threats of personal violence, made by one person against another, are not admissible in evidence in a prosecution against the latter for killing the former, alleged to be in prevention of a felony, where such threats were not communicated to the accused. Carroll v. State, 23 Ala. 28, 58 Am. Dec. 282.

where they were, putting his hand on Alex Dean's shoulder, and saying, "You can't beat her where I am;" that Dean immediately drew a pistol, and said with an oath, "I will kill you both;" that Morrison caught the pistol, and they clinched, and, as they fell, he stabbed Dean in the back with his knife. This proof is made by Morrison himself; and also by Ida Dean, who testified in his behalf, and by Turner. No pistol was found on Dean's person, or on the ground where he fell, nor is it shown by any other proof that he had a pistol. The proof shows that Dean was smoking a pipe, and that when he and his sister stopped at the place where the homicide took place, and she declined to go any further, she struck him with the umbrella and knocked the fire out of his pipe. This pipe was found on the ground after the homicide, and it may be that this is what Dean had in his hand when Morrison came up. The point at which the difficulty occurred was near the center of the square, and not well lighted by the street lamps.

The court allowed the commonwealth to prove by both Morrison and Ida Dean, on cross-examination, in effect, that Morrison was, and had been for some time past, living in improper relations with Ida Dean. This evidence was objected to, but was properly admitted, for it explained the circumstances of the parties and illustrated their motives. The evidence also went to the interest of the witness Ida Dean, and to show bias.

The rule that a person killing another, in order to justify himself, must show the necessity for doing so in order to protect himself or his property from a felony, is not rendered inapplicable by the fact that the shot he fired did not result in loss of life, and that the prosecution was for an assault with intent to kill, instead of for homicide. Newman v. State, 60 Ga. 609.

See also Mitchell v. State, 43 Fla. 188, 30 So. 803; Richard v. State, 42 Fla. 528, 29 So. 413, —infra, III. b.

c. Apparent, as distinguished from real, danger as necessity.

At common law the necessity to prevent the commission of a felony, or the danger of great bodily harm which would justify a homicide, must have been real; that it was apparent only was not sufficient. People v. Cole, 4 Park. Crim. Rep. 35; Dyson v. State, 26 Miss. 362.

And if one person kills another to keep the peace and prevent him from killing a third person whom he has attacked, to render the killing justifiable under the New York statute, it must appear that it is actually necessary for him to do it, and not merely that he has reasonable grounds for believing it necessary; and it must appear that there is no other way to prevent the commission of the felony. People v. Cole, 4 Park. Crim. Rep. 35.

Under the general form of statute on this subject, however, the peril which will warrant a person in killing another to prevent the commission of a felony, or the infliction of great bodily harm, need not be real, but it must appear to be so; and this appearance must be the real aspect of affairs presented to the slayer at the time. Harris v. State, 96 Ala. 24, 11 So. 255; Carroll v. State, 23 Ala. 20, 58 Am. Dec. 282; Oliver v. State, 17 Ala. 587; People v. Angeles, 61 Cal. 188; Lovett v. State, 30 Fla. 142, 17 L. R. A. 705, 11 So. 550; Stanley v. Com. 86 Ky. 440, 9 Am. St. Rep. 305, 6 S. W. 155; Weaver v. State, 19 Tex. App. 547, 53 Am. Rep. 389.

The appearance must be such as would excite a reasonable apprehension of such danger. Carroll v. State, 23 Ala. 28, 58 Am. Dec. 282; Noles v. State, 26 Ala. 31, 62 Am. Dec. 711.

And there must have been an actual belief upon the part of the accused that the necessity was real, and not merely apparent. Lovett v. 67 L. R. A.

State, 30 Fla. 142, 17 L. R. A. 705, 11 So. 550; Oliver v. State, 17 Ala. 587.

A bare fear upon the part of one person that another is about to commit a felony will not justify killing him; it must appear that the circumstances are such as to excite the fears of a reasonable man, and that the slayer acts in good faith under the influence of such fears, and not in a spirit of revenge. State v. Conally, 3 Or. 69; Thompson v. State, 55 Ga. 47; Stoneman v. Com. 25 Gratt. 887.

And there must be some overt act indicating imminent danger at the time. Stoneman v. Com. 25 Gratt. 887.

But a reasonable ground to believe that a person intends to destroy the life of, or rob, another, or commit a felony, justifies the latter in killing him for the purpose of arresting such design, though he may be mistaken in the intent. State v. Harris, 46 N. C. (1 Jones, L.) 190; State v. Conally, 3 Or. 69; People v. Walworth, 4 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 355.

And where an officer, interfering in a difficulty between two other persons, drew his pistol, and a third person, believing that the officer was not acting officially to preserve the peace, but was taking part in the fight, shot and killed him to save the life of the person against whom he appeared about to use his pistol, the killing would be excusable, though the officer was in fact attempting to prevent the fight and preserve the peace. Glover v. State, 33 Tex. Crim. Rep. 224, 26 S. W. 204.

So, the right of one person to defend another under Tenn. Code, § 2930, providing that any person in aid or defense of a person about to be injured may make resistance sufficient to prevent the offense, is not confined to the defense of a person in actual danger of injury, but authorizes action upon well-grounded apprehensions of injury, as in case of self-defense. Fisher v. State, 10 Lea, 151.

And Hutch. (Miss.) Code, 957, providing that homicide is justifiable when committed in lawful defense of a person, or his or her husband, wife, parent, child, master, mistress, or servant, when there shall be reasonable ground to apprehend a design to commit a felony, or do some great bodily injury, and there shall be imminent danger of such design being accomplished, does not require actual danger, but distinctly recognizes a just apprehension of immediate danger of the commission of a felony, or of some great

Morrison offered to prove by a number of witnesses that the deceased was by character a violent and dangerous man, who usually carried deadly weapons. He also offered to show by several witnesses that the deceased had threatened to kill him, and that these threats had been communicated to him. This evidence was excluded by the court. In Roberson on Criminal Law, § 240, it is said: "If the deceased was a man of violent and dangerous character, more prompt and decisive measures of defense would be justifiable than if he were of a peaceable disposition. Hence, in cases of homicide, evidence that the deceased was a violent, quarrelsome, turbulent, dangerous, or vindictive man, or was in the habit of carrying concealed weapons, is admissible to show, or as tending to show, that defendant acted in self-defense, or under such circumstances as would have naturally caused a man of ordinary reason to believe that he was, at the time of the killing, in imminent danger of losing his life or of suffering great bodily harm at the hands of deceased. . . . But evidence of the character here spoken of is not admissible where the defendant was the aggressor, nor until a proper foundation is laid by showing an overt act or hostile demonstration toward defendant by deceased before he was killed." See also, to same effect, Payne v. Com. 1 Met. 379; Riley v. Com. 94 Ky. 266, 22 S. W. 222; Com. v. Hoskins, 18 Ky. L. Rep. 59, 35 S. W. 284. In Roberson on Criminal Law, § 223, it is also said:

personal injury, as a justification. Staten v. State, 30 Miss. 619.

But this act modifies the common law only by making the homicide justifiable where there shall be reasonable ground to apprehend a design to commit a felony, or some great bodily injury, as distinguished from actual danger at the time; and does not dispense with the necessity of showing some overt act indicating a present intent to kill or do some great personal injury, and that the danger was imminent at the time. Dyson v. State, 26 Miss. 362.

Where, in a prosecution for homicide, however, the jury is instructed as to the right of the accused to resist a felony actually attempted, failure of the court to charge as to the right of the accused to resist when the facts and circumstances were such as would have induced a reasonable person of ordinary prudence and judgment to believe that the felony was about to be committed is not error, where no request for such charge was made. People v. Angeles, 61 Cal. 188.

And whether the circumstances are such as to create a reasonable belief in the mind of the slayer to prevent a felony that the necessity exists for taking life is a question for the jury in a prosecution for the killing, and not one for the slayer; and in its solution they may consider the condition of both parties. Oliver v. State, 17 Ala. 587; State v. Harris, 46 N. C. (1 Jones, L.) 190; People v. Walworth, 4 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 355.

And an assault made by one person upon another, and threats to kill the latter, are admissible in evidence in a prosecution against the latter for shooting the former about five months afterward to prevent him from entering the latter's house, from which he attempted to keep him with a deadly weapon, as tending to show that he had reasonable grounds to believe that it was necessary for him to go as far as he did in order to protect his own life, or his person from great bodily harm. DeForest v. State, 21 Ind. 23.

Likewise, any fact tending to prove that at the time of the killing the slayer knew that the deceased and his companions did not intend to commit any felony, or do him any great bodily harm, is admissible in evidence in a prosecution for the killing, where the defense is that it was done to prevent the commission of a felony. Noles v. State, 26 Ala. 31, 62 Am. Dec. 711.

a. Attempts to kill or seriously injure.

1. Upon the slayer.

The application of rules with reference to justification of homicide to prevent a felony to acts of violence toward the slayer involves and includes the whole subject of homicide committed in self-defense, which, owing to its extent and its distinct character, has been reserved for future consideration.

2. Upon others.

Where a person is unlawfully, wilfully, and feloniously engaged in an attempt to kill another, or do him great bodily harm with a deadly weapon, and not in his own necessary self-defense, another person may lawfully interfere to prevent the injury, and may even take the life of the person seeking to do the injury in order to prevent it, providing such action is apparently necessary for that purpose. Stanley v. Com. 86 Ky. 440, 9 Am. St. Rep. 305, 6 S. W. 155; Mitchell v. State, 22 Ga. 211, 68 Am. Dec. 493; People v. Cole, 4 Park. Crim. Rep. 35; Weaver v. State, 19 Tex. App. 547, 53 Am. Rep. 389; Glover v. State, 33 Tex. Crim. Rep. 224, 26 S. W. 204; Garcia v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 57 S. W. 650.

This is the rule of MORRISON v. COM.

Thus, where it appears to a person in the exercise of a reasonable judgment that others intend to use an ax in committing a felonious assault upon persons present, he has the right to interpose to prevent such assault, and to do for the persons against whom it is attempted what such persons might do for themselves, even to the killing of the assailant if necessary. Fletcher v. Com. 26 Ky. L. Rep. 1157, 83 S. W. 588.

And the killing of a person sought to be arrested by an assistant of the officer seeking to make the arrest is justified where the circumstances are such as to excite the fears of a reasonable man that it is the purpose of the person sought to be arrested to perpetrate a felony upon the officer, and his assistant acts under the

"Upon the issue of self-defense, or where there is a doubt concerning the defendant's motive in committing the homicide,—whether he was actuated by malice or believed that he was in danger from deceased,—he may prove that deceased had made threats against his person or life, as tending to show that he was in peril at the time of the homicide, or that he had reasonable grounds upon which to believe that he was in such peril, provided such threats were communicated to defendant before the killing. . . . But where there is no evidence of an overt act or hostile demonstration on the part of the deceased, evincing a present purpose to carry the threats into execution, nor any doubt that defendant was the aggressor, evidence of previous influence of such fears, and not in a spirit of revenge. Adams v. State, 72 Ga. 85.

And a deputy marshal of the United States, charged with the duty of protecting and guarding a judge of the United States court while in the discharge of his official duties against assault, being present at the critical moment when prompt action is necessary, is justified in killing the person making the assault if necessary, to protect the life of the judge; and in so doing he is acting under the laws of the United States, and is not answerable for the act in the courts of the state. Re Neagle (Cunningham v. Neagle) 135 U. S. 1, 34 L. ed. 55, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 658, Affirming 5 L. R. A. 78, 14 Sawy. 232, 39 Fed. 833.

So, it is the right of the father of a married daughter to go to the premises of her husband to rescue the daughter from, and prevent infliction upon her by her husband of, cruel, inhuman blows; and where he does so he has the right to defend his own person against the husband, even to the extent of killing him if necessary. Campbell v. Com. 88 Ky. 402, 21 Am. St. Rep. 348, 11 S. W. 290.

And where a woman is assaulted in her own house with a rock, by another woman, and her husband believes, or has reasonable grounds to believe, that she is in imminent danger of losing her life or suffering great bodily harm, he has the right to interfere to protect his wife; and, if the husband of the other woman attempts to prevent his interference, he is justified in taking whatever means are necessary, or appear to him to be necessary, to rescue and defend his wife, even to taking the life of his assailant. Estep v. Com. 86 Ky. 39, 9 Am. St. Rep. 260, 4 S. W. 820.

And a person is using a pistol, within the meaning of Tex. Penal Code, art. 571, providing that, when a homicide takes place, to prevent murder, maiming, etc., if the weapon used by the party attempting to commit such crime is such as would have been calculated to produce death, it shall be presumed that the person using such weapon designed to kill, where he says to another, "I have got you now," and at the same time throws his hand to his breast, thrusts it into his pocket, and seizes his pistol and draws it partially out of his pocket, and is only prevented by bystanders from further use of it. Ward v. State, 30 Tex. App. 687, 18 S. W. 793.

threats by deceased against the defendant, although they were communicated to defendant, is not admissible." See also, to same effect, 3 Rice, Ev. 362; Wharton, Crim. Ev. § 757; 9 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 673.

It will thus be seen that the admissibility of the evidence in question depends upon whether the defendant was the aggressor in the difficulty; for if he knew that deceased had threatened his life, and was a violent and dangerous man, so much the more reason would there be that the defendant should not be the aggressor in the difficulty. The court, after giving the usual instructions on murder, manslaughter, and reasonable doubt, instructed the jury as follows on self-defense: "If the jury believe and then flees, and the other follows him with a knife, the person fleeing is reinstated to his right of self-defense; and another person, in his behalf, would have the same right to kill the pursuer to prevent his killing the pursued as the pursued himself would have. Stanton v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 29 S. W. 476.

And where, in a prosecution for homicide, it appears that four persons were chasing some insolent boys with threats of chastising them, and that the boys took refuge in a house, and that one of the men demanded of the occupant that the boys be turned over to them, and in the altercation which followed the occupant and one of the attacking party struggled for the possession of an ax, and that the occupant killed the person struggling to gain possession of the ax, an instruction should be given as to his right to interpose to prevent a felonious assault, and to do for the person against whom the assault was attempted what such person might do for himself. Fletcher v. Com. 26 Ky. L. Rep. 1157, 83 S. W. 588.

And where one person interposed in a fight between two others, and shot one of them, it is for the jury, in a prosecution for homicide, to say whether or not in shooting he intended to interfere to prevent the murder of the other combatant, and nothing else. People v. Cole, 4 Park. Crim. Rep. 35.

The right to slay in defense of another, however, where the person slaying is not himself assaulted, depends, both at common law and under the statutes, upon necessity; and the homicide is justifiable only when necessarily committed. Richard v. State, 42 Fla. 528, 29 So. 413.

The slayer must act in good faith, and use all reasonable means in his power otherwise to prevent the perpetration of the crime. Mitchell v. State, 22 Ga. 211, 68 Am. Dec. 493.

And the homicide must be in necessary resistance to aggression apparently violent, immediate, and imminent toward the person about to be injured. Weaver v. State, 19 Tex. App. 547, 53 Am. Rep. 389. And see MORRISON v. Com.

The provisions in 3 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 7th ed. § 3, subsecs. 1, 2, with reference to homicide justifiable because committed in defense of another, relate to transactions occurring in respect to parties present at the time and place of its occurrence, and have no application to a case in which the danger is to an absent from the evidence that the defendant, at the time he cut and killed the said Alex Dean, if he did cut and kill him, believed, and had reasonable grounds to believe, that the said Alex Dean was then and there about to take his life or inflict on him great bodily harm, and there appeared to him, in the exercise of a reasonable judgment, no other safe means to avert the real, or to him apparent, danger, if any, but to cut the said Dean, then he had the right to do so, and they ought to acquit him on the ground of self-defense." The commonwealth complains of this instruction as too favorable to the accused, in that it allows him to rely on self-defense, although he was the aggressor in the difficulty. He, however, insists that the instruction was not as favorable to him as it should have been, and that the court erred in refusing the following instruction which he asked: "The court instructs the jury that if they shall believe from the evidence that, just before he was cut and killed, the deceased, Alexander Dean, was, without any fault on her part, engaged in an assault upon Ida Dean, within the sight and hearing of the defendant, William Morrison, and that said Morrison had a right to believe, and did in good faith believe, that said Dean was then and there about to inflict upon said Ida Dean either loss of life or great bodily harm, then said Morrison had a right to interfere for her protection and stop said assault by all such reasonable means as appeared to him to be necessary to that end, person. People v. Walworth, 4 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 355.

And where a person does not stand in the relation of husband or wife, parent or child, or master or servant of another, he cannot justify an interference on his behalf, or the killing of a third person for his protection, upon the ground that he came into the difficulty for the purpose of taking the place of the person assailed. He can justify, if at all, merely as an indifferent person seeking to preserve the peace. Morrison v. Com.

Nor is a person who sees another about, to attack a third person justified in killing him to prevent the attack, where his acts and conduct are such as to render it uncertain whether he intends to kill the other under circumstances which would amount to murder, until he has resorted to all other means to prevent the injury; and the killing must be done while the other is in the very act of making an unlawful and violent attack. Glover v. State, 33 Tex. Crim. Rep. 224, 26 S. W. 204.

And a burglar, who, with others, was discovered in the act of robbing a store, who killed one of the discoverers, cannot claim that the killing was necessary in order to prevent the person killed from unnecessarily killing one of his companions, where the two discoverers had left the companion before he returned to the rescue, and neither of them was then harming, or attempting to harm, him. Ruloff v. People, 45 N. Y. 213.

And, in determining whether persons catching robbers in the act of robbery inflicted unnecessary or wanton violence upon them so as to become wrongdoers, the courts will not be astute in searching for such a line of demarcation as will take an innocent citizen, whose property and person are in danger, from the protection of the law, and place his life at the mercy and discretion of an admitted felon. Ibid.

So, it has been held that, where a man interposes when another is attacked, it must be to keep the peace, and the protection of the other must be incidental to that purpose. People v. Cole, 4 Park. Crim. Rep. 35.

And no matter how heinous an offense committed against a person, or against another whom he desires to defend, he is not justified in taking vengeance in his own hands, and deliberately slaying the wrongdoer. Perry v. State, 102 Ga. 365, 30 S. E. 903.

And if the person defended is in fault, the 67 L. R. A. person killing another, in his defense, acts at his peril. Stanley v. Com. 86 Ky. 440, 9 Am. St. Rep. 305, 6 S. W. 155.

b. Robbery or burglary.

Robbery is a forcible felony, and a person has a legal right to prevent the attempted commission of a robbery to the extent of inflicting death upon the person attempting it. People v. Grimes, 132 Cal. 30, 64 Pac. 101; Smith v. State, 31 Tex. Crim. Rep. 14, 19 S. W. 252.

And where one person wrongfully takes money belonging to another from his possession, whether forcibly or through fraud, the right to protect one's possession is regarded as an extension of the right to protect one's person, and goes to the same extent. Com. v. Donahue, 148 Mass. 529, 2 L. R. A. 623, 12 Am. St. Rep. 591, 20 N. E. 171.

And where a strong man threatened to take by force from the person of a weaker one a watch, falsely claiming it to be his, pressing upon him while he retreated until the larger man neared him, and raised his hand to seize or strike him, when he fired his pistol and killed the former, an instruction with reference to the right to repel force by force in defense of one's person or property is proper and necessary in a prosecution for the killing. Stoneham v. Com. 86 Va. 523, 10 S. E. 238.

And where one person raises a crop upon the land of another under a contract by which he is entitled to a share of the crop for his services, they are not joint tenants or tenants in common in the crop produced; it is exclusively the property of the landowner, so that a forcible taking of the crop by the tenant would be robbery which might justify killing him to prevent it. Parrish v. Com. 81 Va. 1.

So, if a man intending to kill a thief or a house breaker in his own house happens, by mistake, to kill one of his own family, it cannot be imputed to him as a criminal action. Levett's Case, Cro. Car. 538.

And where a burglar seizes the gun of the owner of the premises he is attempting to burglarize to prevent himself from being shot, and in the struggle for the gun it goes off and kills a third person, the owner, having a right to kill the burglar to prevent the burglary, would not be guilty of murder or manslaughter in the commission of an unlawful act in killing the third person. McPherson v. State, 22 Ga. 478.

and if, in doing so, it became necessary, or apparently necessary, for him to take the life of said Dean, he had the right to do so, and the jury should acquit him; for what a man may do for himself, he may do for another."

The defendant Morrison's testimony as to how the difficulty came up is in these words: "I ran down that way. I did not go very fast, and I went down. Why, he had her up against the house beating her, and I caught him on one shoulder and shoved them apart, and told him, 'You can't beat her where I am,' and he drew a pistol, and said, 'I will kill both of you.' . . . My intention was to keep him from hitting her. . . . He was striking her in the face with his fist when I got to him.

These rules apply to prevention of the consummation of a robbery by getting away with the proceeds, as well as to the robbery itself.

Thus, where a robbery has been committed, and an attempt to escape with the proceeds is made, another has the legal right to prevent such escape by any means within his power, even to that of inflicting death. People v. Grimes, 132 Cal. 30, 64 Pac. 101.

And one whose money is fraudulently taken from him by another may thereupon retake it from him; but in retaking he should use only such force as is necessary for retaking, the amount of force which may be used being a question of fact for the jury. Com. v. Donahue, 148 Mass. 529, 2 L. R. A. 623, 12 Am. St. Rep. 591, 20 N. E. 171.

And a person discovering others in the commission of a robbery may, under 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 661, § 11, providing that every person who shall unnecessarily kill another while resisting an attempt of such other person to commit any felony, or do any other unlawful act, shall be deemed guilty of manslaughter in the second degree, use all the force necessary to oppose and prevent the consummation of the robbery, and properly resist all attempts to inflict bodily injury upon himself, and may lawfully detain the robbers and hand them over to the officers of the law; and it would only be by the use of unnecessary or wanton violence, or the infliction of unnecessary or wanton injury to the criminals, that the person discovering them could become a wrongdoer. Ruloff v. People, 45 N. Y. 213.

If goods are taken either by violence or by putting the owner in fear, the taking is robbery within the rule justifying homicide to prevent a felony, McDaniel v. State, 8 Smedes & M. 401, 47 Am. Dec. 93.

And to constitute robbery, to prevent which a killing may be justified, it is not necessary that the taking of the property shall be directly from one's person; it is sufficient if it is taken while in his possession and immediate presence. Crawford v. State, 90 Ga. 701, 35 Am. St. Rep. 242, 17 S. E. 628.

And where violence is used to obtain possession of property with a felonious intent, it is none the less robbery, which may justify a homicide to prevent it, because the thief has recourse to some colorable or specious claim of right to effect his purpose. Parrish v. Com. 81 Va. 1.

. . . It seemed to very near knock her to the ground. The last one knocked her up against the house. She would have fallen if it had not been for the house. . . . He drew his pistol, and I grabbed his hand, and he struggled. . . . We both went to the ground. . . . I cut him while I was in the fall." Turner and Ida Dean make in substance the same statement. On the other hand, the commonwealth's witnesses all say that Dean was simply pushing his sister along the side of the street. They all agree that Morrison ran at least 90 feet on tiptoe before he came up to them. We do not see anything in the evidence to warrant the belief that Alex Dean was about to kill his sister or do her some great bodily harm. It is true, he wanted her to go

But to constitute robbery, to prevent which a killing may be justified, there must have been force or intimidation, asportation without the consent of the owner, and the intent to steal; the act of a person taking property from another under a bona fide claim of right, with the purpose of applying it to a claim of debt from another to himself, is not such robbery. Crawford v. State, 90 Ga. 701, 35 Am. St. Rep. 242, 17 S. E. 628.

And a killing to prevent a taking of slight moment and importance cannot be justified, though it technically amounted to a robbery; and the fact that one person took from another by violence a nickle with intent to appropriate it does not justify the latter in killing him while retreating with the money. Bowman v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 21 S. W. 48.

c. Breaches of the peace.

It is as much every man's duty to interfere to prevent a breach of the peace as it is to prevent a felony, for a breach of the peace, whether in itself felonious or not, is liable to lead to felony; and the general common-law rule seems to be that felonious rioters, resisting the lawful authorities, may be slain with impunity when necessary for the purpose of maintaining or restoring the public peace. Re Riots of 1844, 2 Clark (Pa.) 275, dictum.

And when engaged in the suppression of dangerous riots a sheriff and his assistant are authorized to resort to every necessary means to restore peace and prevent criminal outrages against person or property, and they may arrest the rioters and detain and imprison them; and, if they resist and continue their riotous actions, killing them becomes justifiable. Com. v. Daley, 2 Clark (Pa.) 361.

So, private persons may forcibly interfere to suppress a riot or resist rioters, although a riot is not necessarily a felony in itself; and, where they cannot otherwise suppress them or defend themselves, they are justified in killing them, as it is their right and duty to aid in preserving the peace. Pond v. People, 8 Mich. 150.

And a person who sees another in a drunken condition attempting to shoot into a house where a large number of persons are assembled has a right to disarm him, and, if need be, restrain him, in order to prevent the commission of the act, and may use such force as is neces-home, and she declined to go. She struck him with the umbrella, and, whether he then struck her or pushed her against the house, it is reasonably clear that no harm would have come of the quarrel between brother and sister if Morrison had not intervened. The proof shows that she was a small, frail woman, and that Alex Dean only wanted her to get off the street.

So, the case comes to this: Did Morrison, when he saw Alex Dean committing an assault on his sister, and pushing or striking her against the house, have a right to intervene between the brother and sister for her protection from a simple battery? In 1 Bishop on Criminal Law, § 877, it is said: "The doctrine here is that whatever one may do for himself he may do for another.

The common case, indeed, is where a father, son, brother, husband, servant, or the like, protects by the stronger arm the feeble. But a guest in a house may defend the house, or the neighbors of the occupant may assemble for its defense; and, on the whole, though distinctions have been taken and doubts expressed, the better view plainly is that one may do for another whatever the other may do for himself." The statement of the law, as applied to simple batteries and breaches of the peace, is broader than it is usually put in the authorities. Thus, in 3 Bl. Com. 3, it is said: "The defense of one's self or the mutual and reciprocal defense of such as stand in relations of husband and wife, parent and child, master and servant. In sary; but he would not be excusable in killing him if he should use more force than reasonably appeared to be necessary to restrain him. Burton v. Com. 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1915, 66 S. W. 516.

And an attack upon the net house of a fisherman for the purpose of destroying it is a violent, forcible felony, justifying him in killing one of the persons attacking when necessary to prevent the destruction, without reference to whether or not it is a part of his dwelling. Pond v. People, 8 Mich. 150.

And one who peaceably goes to the house of another solely to stop a disturbance there, and to require an apology for previous insults to his wife, and who is attacked by the other with a deadly weapon, upon which he kills his assailant, is not guilty of murder. Watson v. Com. 87 Va. 608, 13 S. E. 22.

So, the various statutes on the subject seem, substantially at least, to be a re-enactment of the common-law rule.

Thus, homicide is justifiable under the New York statutes when committed necessarily in the lawful keeping and preserving of the peace. People v. Cole, 4 Park. Crim. Rep. 35.

And one who interposes in a fight between two others, whose design is to prevent the commission of a crime by one upon the other, and unnecessarily kills the one he seeks to restrain, is guilty of manslaughter in the second degree only. Ibid.

And Fla. Rev. Stat. § 2398, div. 2, subdv. 3, making homicide justifiable when committed in lawfully suppressing any riot, or lawfully keeping and preserving the peace, authorizes the killing, by a brother, of two or more persons assaulting and attempting to kill his brother or sister; such killing being one to prevent a violent breach of the peace. Mitchell v. State, 48 Fla. 188, 30 So. 803; Richard v. State, 42 Fla. 528, 29 So. 413.

But the justification of a homicide under that statute depends upon actual necessity, and not upon reasonable belief arising from appearance. Richard v. State, 42 Fla. 528, 29 So. 413.

So, where two or more persons manifestly intended and endeavored in a riotous and tumultuous manner to enter the habitation of another for the purpose of assaulting or offering personal violence to anyone being therein, and one of them, to prevent such injury, was killed by the occupant of the house, if the circumstances were sufficient to excite the fears of a 67 L. R. A.

reasonable man that such entry was intended, and the killing was done under the influence of such fears, such homicide is justifiable under Ga. Penal Code, § 90, though the assault or personal violence intended was less than a felony. Smith v. State, 106 Ga. 673, 71 Am. St. Rep. 286, 82 S. E. 851.

The rule that a person has the right to kill to prevent the commission of an atrocious crime, where he acted in good faith and such a killing was necessary for the purpose, however, does not apply where the slayer acted in concert with another in bringing about a difficulty with the person slain, and made himself a party to it, and aided and assisted in bringing about the fatal encounter. Mitchell v. State, 22 Ga. 211, 68 Am. Dec. 493.

And an unlawful, or even a riotous, assembly of persons cannot be shot down without any previous effort being made to suppress it by other means. Com. v. Daley, 2 Clark (Pa.) 361.

And it cannot be said that to keep the peace in a mere fist fight it can be necessary to resort to firearms, or to take life in any case. People v. Cole, 4 Park. Crim. Rep. 35; Johnston's Case, 5 Gratt. 660.

And one who finds two men fighting, one of whom is a friend, and inflicts a dangerous stab upon the other without provocation, is no more excusable than he would have been for the same act committed on one who was fighting with a stranger, or who was not fighting at all. Conner v. State, 4 Yerg. 137, 26 Am. Dec. 217.

IV. Misdemeanors, crimes without force, and trespasses.

a. General rules as to misdemeanors and secret crimes.

One can only kill to save life or limb, or prevent a great crime, or to accomplish a necessary public duty. State v. Morgan, 25 N. C. (3 Ired. L.) 186, 38 Am. Dec. 714.

And a homicide committed in endeavoring to restrain the commission of a mere misdemeanor is not justifiable. People v. Grimes, 132 Cal. 64, 64 Pac. 101; Crawford v. State, 90 Ga. 701, 35 Am. St. Rep. 242, 17 S. E. 628; Carmouche v. Bouis, 6 La. Ann. 95, 54 Am. Dec. 558.

And the general rule justifying homicide to prevent felony does not authorize the killing of persons attempting secret felonies not accompanied by force, such as a mere larceny or pick-these cases, if the party himself, or any of these, his relations, be forcibly attacked in his person or property, it is lawful for him to repel force by force; and the breach of the peace which happens is chargeable upon him only who began the affray." In a note to this it is added: "When a person does not stand in either of these relations, he cannot justify an interference on behalf of the party injured, but merely as an indifferent person to preserve the peace." See, to the same effect, 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 981; 2 Roberson, Criminal Law, § 543.

When a felony is apparently about to be committed, as where there is apparent danger of loss of life by the person assailed or of great bodily harm to him, a different rule prevails, and there any third person may lawfully intervene for his protection, using such means for his defense as the person assailed himself may lawfully use. But where the assault is not felonious, and the person intervening does not stand in any of the relations to the one assailed excepted out of the common-law rule, then he who intervenes can only act for the preservation of the peace. He cannot come into the difficulty for the purpose of taking the place of the person assailed, and continuing the fight. This is the common-law rule, as we understand the authorities, and we cannot depart from it or extend it.

It is conceded on all hands that Morrison ran down on tiptoe to where Alex Dean and his sister were, some 90 feet away. If, when he got there, he at once stabbed Dean ing pockets. Storey v. State, 71 Ala. 329; Carmouche v. Bouls, 6 La. Ann. 95, 54 Am. Dec. 558; Weaver v. State, 19 Tex. App. 547, 53 Am. Rep. 389.

So, where a felonious act is not of a violent or forcible character, as in the case of crime partaking of fraud rather than force, there is no necessity to prevent it, and, therefore, no justification for homicide. Pond v. People, 8 Mich. 150.

b. Larceny.

Larceny is a secret crime not attended with force, and, especially when the goods taken are of small value, furnishes no warrant to one person for killing another to prevent its consummation.

Thus the killing of one person by another to prevent the crime of petit larceny is not justified. Bloom v. State, 155 Ind. 292, 58 N. E. 81.

And feloniously carrying away fallen timber from the premises of another does not warrant the owner in shooting the thief, though the shooting is done to prevent the act, since that would amount to punishing with death an offense for which the law has provided a milder penalty. Reg. v. Murphy, 2 Craw. & D. (Ir.) 20.

So, one person has no right to shoot and kill another to prevent him from taking a dog, which both claim, away from his premises. Trusty v. Com. 19 Ky. L. Rep. 706, 41 S. W. 766.

And, while boys have no right to enter the melon patch of another and help themselves to the melons without his consent, he would not be justified in shooting them for so doing. State v. Vance, 17 Iowa, 138.

And an instruction, in a prosecution for manslaughter, that boys have no right to enter a melon patch of another and help themselves to his melons without his consent, but it would be a reproach to the laws to hold that for such an act the owner has a right, without notice or warning, to shoot them, tends to show a proper comprehension of the sacredness of human life, and is not objectionable as tending unjustly to prejudice the minds of the jury. Ibid.

So, one who killed a slave while in the act of committing a larceny within his inclosure is liable therefor, where the act was not necessary for the defense of his person, his family, or his property. Bibb v. Hebert, 3 La. Ann. 132; Priester v. Augley, 5 Rich. L. 44. 67 L. R. A.

And the act of a band of negroes in going upon the premises of a planter and taking a small quantity of sugar cane, without attempting to put the owner in fear, is a mere misdemeanor, and not a crime, and does not justify shooting one of the number. Carmouche v. Bouls, 6 La. Ann. 95, 54 Am. Dec. 558.

Nor may an owner of poultry protect his property from larceny by shooting and killing the thief in the absence of any effort to arrest the thief, or of any showing that he could not have been arrested, or that the poultry could not have been protected by other means. Marks v. Borum, 1 Baxt. 87, 25 Am. Rep. 764; Gardiner v. Thibodeau, 14 La. Ann. 742.

And a person set to watch a yard or garden is not justified in shooting anyone who comes into it, though in the night, and though the person coming into it goes into the master's henroost, unless from the conduct of such person he has fair grounds for believing his own life to be in actual and immediate danger. Rex v. Scully, 1 Car. & P. 819.

Nor does a mere larceny justify an intentional killing under a statute justifying a homicide when committed by a person in resisting an attempt to commit a felony on him. McDaniel v. State, 8 Smedes & M. 401, 47 Am. Dec. 93.

When the owner of stolen property tries to prevent the theft, or recover the property, however, and is resisted, he may repel force with force and not retreat; and, if the thief is unavoidably killed, the homicide is justifiable. Storey v. State, 71 Ala. 329.

And where a person attempts to take hogs in legal possession of another, and, while attempting to do so, the latter strikes him with a board, not being able to prevent him from doing so otherwise, and having resorted to all other means at hand to prevent the taking of the hogs, and such person retreats and afterwards advances upon him with deadly weapons, he is not bound to retreat; and, if it reasonably appears to him that his life is in imminent danger, or that he is in danger of serious bodily harm, he is justified in striking the other in his own self-defense. Lilly v. State, 20 Tex. App. 1.

And if a slave, though the property of another, be found in the nighttime engaged in stealing the property of a citizen upon his premises under such circumstances that he cannot be identified or apprehended with safety, the citizen may lawfully shoot at him with a dein the back, as stated by the witnesses for the commonwealth, he was the aggressor. The instruction of the court, which submitted to the jury the question whether Morrison believed, or had reasonable grounds to believe, himself in danger of death or great bodily harm at the hands of Dean, when he stabbed him, was more favorable to Morrison than the law warranted, as the court did not submit to the jury the question whether Morrison was the aggressor. Morrison knew that the illicit relations between him and Ida Dean were the foundation of the animosity of Alex Dean to him. He also knew that this was the cause of the quarrel between the brother and sister. With this knowledge he ran on tiptoe down to where they were, armed with a dirk, and if, as he says, he caught Alex Dean by the shoulder and shoved them apart, saying to him, "You can't beat her where I am," his interference was not as an indifferent person to preserve the peace, for his first act was to commit a battery on Alex Dean by taking him by the shoulder, and this was followed up by a declaration which he could but know, under all the circumstances, would make Alex Dean regard him as an assailant. To hold that he intervened, under the evidence, as an indifferent person to preserve the peace, would be to give no real effect to the common-law rule allowing greater rights to parent and child, husband and wife, master and slave to wound him, but without intent to produce death, without incurring criminal responsibility, even though death ensues. McClelland v. Kay, 14 B. Mon. 103.

Under the Texas statute making homicide justifiable when inflicted for the purpose of preventing certain offenses therein enumerated, including theft at night and burglary, and providing that, in case of burglary and theft by night, the homicide is justifiable at any time while the offender is in the building, or at the place where the theft is committed, or within reach of a gun shot from such place or building, it makes no difference whether the party has abandoned the property stolen or taken and is fleeing from the place of the theft, or whether he still retains it; if he is still within the reach of a gun shot from the place, the homicide is justifiable. Whitten v. State, 29 Tex. App. 504, 16 S. W. 206.

And a theft by night within the meaning of that act means, in analogy with statutes with reference to burglary, a theft committed at any time between thirty minutes after sunset and thirty minutes before sunrise. Laws v. State, 26 Tex. App. 643, 10 S. W. 220.

The taking of partnership property by a partner is neither a larceny nor a trespass against the other partner, within the meaning of rules of law with reference to the use of force to prevent a trespass or a felony. Jones v. State, 76 Ala. 8.

c. Trespass on property.

1. General rules.

The law justifies the taking of life when necessary to prevent the commission of a felony, but not to prevent the commission of a mere trespass on the property of another. Oliver v. State, 17 Ala. 587; Storey v. State, 71 Ala. 329; State v. Becker, 6 Houst. (Del.) 411, 33 Atl. 17; Davison v. People, 90 Ill. 221.

A person should not in defense of his property, as distinguished from the defense of his person, resort to means reasonably calculated to endanger life. State v. Dooley, 121 Mo. 591, 28 S. W. 558; State v. Forsythe, 89 Mo. 607, 1 S. W. 834; Meade's Case, 1 Lewin, C. C. 184.

And if one man deliberately kills another to prevent a mere trespass upon property, whether such trespass can or cannot otherwise be prevented, it is murder. Harrison v. State, 24 Ala. 67, 60 Am. Dec. 450; State v. Morgan, 25 N. C. (3 Ired. L.) 186, 38 Am. Dec. 714; State v. 67 L. R. A.

Brandon, 53 N. C. (8 Jones, L.) 463; State v. McDonald, 19 N. C. (4 Jones, L.) 19.

And Minn. Gen. Stat. § 13, p. 598, providing that whoever unnecessarily kills another, except by accident or misfortune, and in certain other designated cases, either while resisting an attempt by such other person to commit any felony, or to do any other unlawful act, or after such attempt has failed, shall be guilty of manslaughter in the second degree, has no application to a case of a killing with an ax by inflicting blows therewith upon the head and neck of the deceased, claimed to be in resistance of a civil trespass upon lands or cattle, or both, of the person using the ax, there being no pretense of the absence of design to effect death. State v. Hoyt, 13 Minn. 132, Gil. 125.

Where property is attacked, but not in such a way as to endanger the life of the owner or person in charge, or to render him liable to serious bodily harm, every effort must be made to repel the aggression before resorting to homicide in order to prevent it. Ledbetter v. State, 26 Tex. App. 22, 9 S. W. 60.

A man may use force to defend his real or personal property in his actual possession against one who endeavors to dispossess him without right, taking care that the force used does not exceed what reasonably appears to be necessary for the purpose of defense and prevention; but, in the absence of an attempt to commit a felony, he cannot defend his property, except his habitation, to the extent of killing the aggressor for the purpose of preventing the trespass; rather than slay an aggressor to prevent a mere trespass, he should yield, and appeal to the courts for redress. Carpenter v. State, 62 Ark. 286, 36 S. W. 900; Davison v. People, 90 Ill. 221.

So, Ga. Code, § 4332, providing that if, after persuasion, remonstrance, or other gentle measures, a forcible attack or invasion of the property or habitation of another cannot be prevented, it shall be justifiable homicide to kill the person so forcibly attacking and invading, has no application where the property attacked or invaded is so inconsiderable that the injury intended is slight and trifling, and not in fact a felony. Crawford v. State, 90 Ga. 701, 35 Am. St. Rep. 242, 17 S. E. 628.

If a trespass on the person or property of another amounts to a felony, however, the killing of the trespasser is justified, if necessary, to prevent it. Ibid.

And a man may lawfully defend his property and servant, or the like, than to other persons in cases of simple batteries or breaches of the peace. According to his own testimony, the manner of his approach, his conduct on reaching Alex Dean, and his declaration to him, under the circumstances, were not those of one bent on peace, but of one proposing to champion the woman and fight her battles for her. He was therefore the aggressor, and the court did not err in refusing to admit the proof as to the bad character of Alex Dean or his previous threats; and this evidence, if admitted, could not have been of material service to the defendant under the view of the law which we have indicated, for the jury might have inferred that when he interfered with knowledge of the previous threats and the character of Dean he anticipated the result that ensued. The verdict of the jury finding him guilty of manslaughter, and fixing his punishment at eleven years in the penitentiary, seems to have been due to their accepting the version of the transaction as given by the witnesses for the commonwealth, and their believing that Morrison acted in sudden heat on seeing the woman assailed by her brother.

Judgment affirmed.

in his possession by any degree of force short of taking life necessary to make the defense effectual. State v. Forsythe, 89 Mo. 667, 1 S. W. 834; Richardson v. State, 7 Tex. App. 486.

And if any forcible attempt is made with a felonious intent against the person or property, the owner is not obliged to retreat, but may pursue his adversary, if necessary, till he find himself out of danger; and, while life may not properly be taken when the evil may be prevented by other means within reach, reasonable apprehension of danger is sufficient to justify the taking of life. Pond v. People, 8 Mich. 150; Ledbetter v. State, 26 Tex. App. 22, 9 S. W. 60.

And, in case of a reasonable apprehension or fear of death or serious bodily harm, he may act at once to defend himself by taking the life of the other without resorting to other means to prevent the attack or protect the property. Ledbetter v. State, 26 Tex. App. 22, 9 S. W. 60.

So, Tex. Penal Code, arts. 572, 575, providing that homicide is only justifiable in the protection of property after all other means have been resorted to for the prevention of the injury, and the killing must take place while the person killed is in the very act of making an unlawful attack; and such homicide, to be justifiable, must be committed to protect the possession of corporeal property, and not of a mere right; and the possession must be actual, and not merely constructive; and the possession must be legal though the right of property may not be in the possessor; and every other effort must be made by the possessor before he will be justified in killing,—gives one who has property lawfully in his possession which is sought to be carried away by another the right to take the life of the other in defense against a forcible taking. Lilly v. State, 20 Tex. App. 1.

And under that act one's right to defend property is not dependent upon the fact that the injury to it is not accompanied by violence to himself; it is only where a third person interferes in behalf of one whose person or property is assailed that the killing of the aggressor by such third person will not be justifiable under art. 752 thereof, unless the life or person of the injured party is in peril by reason of the attack upon his property. Ibid.

2. Personality.

The above general rules are particularly applicable to the appropriation by one person of 67 L. R. A.

another's personal property; and, where one person attempts to remove personal property belonging to another from his possession and appropriate it to his own use, and the other kills him, the killing is not justified if the person removing the property is not armed, and simply attempts the trespass without force of arms, neither intending nor endeavoring to commit a felony against the other. People v. Payne, 8 Cal. 341.

And an open taking of property in the presence of the owner, or of other persons, is only a trespass, and not a felony, to prevent which the taking of life may be justified. McDaniel v. State, 8 Smedes & M. 401, 47 Am. Dec. 93.

Where property was merely converted or taken possession of in such a manner as to constitute a civil trespass without any criminal intent, it would not be lawful to recapture it by any exercise of force which would amount even to a breach of the peace, much less felonious homicide. Storey v. State, 71 Ala. 329.

No trespass upon personal property of another will authorize the killing of the trespasser, and any such killing is murder if committed with a deadly weapon, the kind of weapon used in such case determining the intent. McDaniel v. State, 8 Smedes & M. 401, 47 Am. Dec. 93; Hayes v. State, 58 Ga. 35.

And evidence that one person informed another that he was going to take property upon which the latter had a claim and which was in his possession, but that he had not proceeded to take it when he was shot, does not raise an issue as to the right of the other to kill in defense of the property, and does not require a charge as to that issue. Dean v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 83 S. W. 816.

And where a person claiming that another owed him met him on the road having a large piece of meat in his possession, and proceeded with his pocket knife to cut off enough of the meat to pay the debt, whereupon a difficulty arose and the owner of the meat killed him, the killing is not justifiable if the claim of debt was made in good faith and there was no intent to steal, but would be manslaughter. Crawford v. State, 90 Ga. 701, 35 Am. St. Rep. 242, 17 S. E. 628.

In the above case it was said that what was said in Keener v. State, 18 Ga. 194, 63 Am. Dec. 209, to the effect that a trespass amounting to a misdemeanor will reduce a killing to manslaughter, refers to trespass affecting the person, and not to trespass affecting the goods only; and the same comment was made in Hayes v. State, 58 Ga. 35, supra.

And in Crawford v. State, 90 Ga. 701, 35 Am. St. Rep. 242, 17 S. E. 628, supra, it was said that the ruling in Pound v. State, 43 Ga. 88, infra, V. b, that Ga. Code, § 4332, does not apply to the defense of property which is not at the habitation, is dictum only.

So, where a person borrowed money and deposited a gun as security, and then carried away the gun, and the lender seized the gun and attempted to dispossess him, and in the struggle which ensued the gun went off and accidentally killed the borrower, the act of the lender, though he had a right to the possession of the gun, in attempting to take it away by force, was unlawful, and the killing, being the result of an unlawful act, is manslaughter. Reg. v. Archer, 1 Fost. & F. 351.

And the killing of a constable who comes to make an unlawful distress is manslaughter though his act is illegal. United States v. Williams, 2 Cranch, C. C. 439, Fed. Cas. No. 16,710.

But a constable in levying a distress warrant for rent is not acting in the discharge of his official duty within the rule of law which makes killing an officer murder when it would not have been murder if he had not been an officer, since he can only justify his acts when those of the owner or landlord would have been justified had he personally distrained. Ibid.

And where a broker had made a distress for rent of goods of a lodger in a room, and left a man in charge, who was turned out by the lodger, and upon the broker and his assistants breaking open the outer door to re-enter the lodger struck one of the assistants with an ax on the forehead, he is guilty of an assault at least, and he might be found guilty of wounding with intent to murder or do grievous bodily harm. Reg. v. Sullivan, Car. & M. 209.

So, when there is a fair, bona fide claim of property, or right, or title in the taker, the taking amounts to a trespass only, and not to a felony, to prevent which the taking of life might be justifiable; but it is not enough to do away with the criminal intent that there is a mere false claim of property in the article taken. McDaniel v. State, 8 Smedes & M. 401, 47 Am. Dec. 93.

And the act of a person engaged in gambling with another, of reaching over and appropriating the stakes, which have apparently been won by another, on a claim that the other holds an improper number of cards, is not robbery, and therefore a felony to prevent which a killing would be justified. People v. Grimes, 132 Cal. 30, 64 Pac. 101.

And where two persons engage in playing a game of craps, and one of them wins $10, or a part thereof, from the other, and the latter retains possession and refuses to deliver it, and an altercation ensues, and the winner arms himself with a club to make the loser surrender the $10, and a difficulty ensues, and the loser assaults the winner with his fists, or with an unopened knife, and the winner kills the loser, his passion having been aroused by the attack upon him, an issue of manslaughter is presented. Greer v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 45 S. W. 12.

Where one person, without right, attempts to remove and appropriate personal property belonging to another, however, and the latter kills him, the killing is justifiable if the person removing the property intends to kill the owner if necessary to effect the removal. People v. Payne, 8 Cal. 341.

And a man has a right, on his own premises near his own dwelling, to go to the aid of his wife, who is in dispute with others as to a cow claimed by him, and which one of the others has threatened to take away from the premises, or kill him, and use such force as is necessary to prevent their driving the cow away. Beard v. United States, 158 U. S. 550, 39 L. ed. 1086, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 962.

And where premises are held under a verbal lease by which each party is to have half of the potatoes raised upon them, and the right to use and dig therefrom for family use during the season, the owner and landlord has the right to go upon the premises and request a division of the crop, to the end that each may not encroach upon the other's rights; and, in case he does so, and the tenant attempts to drive him away by an assault, he may use such force as is necessary to protect himself. State v. Forsythe, 89 Mo. 667, 1 S. W. 834.

So, in the recapture of property taken from the owner he is authorized to use such force as is reasonably necessary to effect his purpose, provided it does not extend to the use of deadly weapons, or an assault likely to produce death, or great bodily harm. State v. Dooley, 121 Mo. 591, 26 S. W. 558.

And the right of an owner to use force in recapturing his property which has been taken from him is not confined to the immediate time and place of the taking, but continues though the property is taken temporarily out of his sight where the pursuit is immediate. Ibid.

But persons whose horses have been taken, who go after the persons taking them with a settled and determined purpose to shoot them unless they comply with their demands for the return of the horses, and who, upon overtaking them, assume a position for shooting before demand is made, and omit to shoot only because the demand is complied with, use force in procuring a return of their property in excess of that authorized by law, and the fact that the original taking of the horses was unlawful is no justification for such force. Ibid.

3. Realty.

A bare trespass against the real property of another, not his dwelling, does not warrant the owner in using a deadly weapon in its defense; and if he kills the trespasser, it is murder, though the killing is actually necessary to prevent the trespass. State v. Vance, 17 Iowa, 138; Carpenter v. State, 62 Ark. 286, 36 S. W. 900; Com. v. Drew, 4 Mass. 391; State v. Shippey, 10 Minn. 223, 88 Am. Dec. 70, Gil. 178; State v. Zellers, 7 N. J. L. 220; Hull v. State, 6 Lea, 250.

And that the person killed was going to commit a trespass upon land of the slayer at the time of the killing is not competent to justify or excuse the homicide. State v. Zellers, 7 N. J. L. 220.

While an owner or tenant of land is justified in using all necessary force to eject a trespasser thereon, his purpose must be to put the trespasser off, and not do him great bodily harm; and he can only use such force as is necessary under the circumstances to effect that purpose, and cannot take his life, except to save his own, or to escape great bodily harm. State v. Warren, 1 Marv. (Del.) 487, 41 Atl. 190; Tiffany v.

Com. 121 Pa. 165, 6 Am. St. Rep. 775, 15 Atl. 462.

To kill in defense of one's own property or the property of another, except in case of habitation or castle, is never justifiable until every other means has been resorted to to prevent the injury or felony attempted. Weaver v. State, 19 Tex. App. 547, 53 Am. Rep. 389.

Thus, a homicide committed with a deadly weapon in order to prevent a trespass in the removal of a line fence in dispute is murder in the absence of proof that would tend to rebut the presumption of malice arising from the use of a deadly weapon, the guilt or innocence of the accused being in no degree dependent upon the title to the land or fence in dispute. Lambeth v. State, 23 Miss. 322.

And a person occupying land as a lessee, over which another has no right, is not justified in killing him to prevent him from traveling over it. People v. Conkling, 111 Cal. 616, 44 Pac. 314.

And where a person in possession of land as a lessee obstructs a road crossing it, and another person claiming the right to travel over such road kills the other to prevent such obstruction, there is no question of defense of property or habitation which would justify the killing. Ibid.

So, where evidence in a prosecution for homicide tends to show that the killing was effected with an ax, a deadly weapon, by inflicting blows therewith upon the head and neck of the deceased, claimed to have been given in resistance of a civil trespass upon land or other property, Minn. Gen. Stat. § 13, p. 598, providing that whoever unnecessarily kills another, except in certain named cases, either when resisting an attempt by such other person to commit any felony or to do any other unlawful act, or after such attempt has failed, shall be guilty of manslaughter in the second degree, has no application, and instructions based thereon are properly refused. State v. Hoyt, 13 Minn. 132, Gil. 125.

A person assaulted on his own premises, however, though outside of his own dwelling house, is not obliged to retreat, nor consider whether he can retreat, but may stand his ground, and meet any unprovoked attack made upon him with a deadly weapon in such a way and with such force as to lead him honestly to believe, and give him grounds to believe, it necessary to kill his assailant to protect himself from death or great bodily injury; and in such case the killing would be justifiable. Beard v. United States, 158 U. S. 550, 39 L. ed. 1086, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 902.

And he is justified in using all necessary force to defend his possession. Corey v. People, 45 Barb. 262.

And where two adjoining owners differ as to the ownership of a tract of land, the one rightfully in possession of the disputed tract is not obliged, when the other seeks to move the fence so as to include the disputed tract with his property, to permit him to do it and proceed against him by injunction, in order to comply with a statutory provision requiring him, in order to justify homicide, first to resort to every other means of protecting himself. Sims v. State, 36 Tex. Crim. Rep. 154, 36 S. W. 256.

And in such case, where the one not in possession threatens to remove the fence, and refuses to appeal to the law, and proceeds in his purpose, taking the matter into his own hands, 67 L. R. A.

and sends men to dig holes on the line to which he proposes to remove the fence, and, upon the men being driven away, goes himself with a shot gun, manifesting in unmistakable terms his determination to remove the fence, having with him four assistants, and being better armed than the other, the latter is not required to leave the field and seek re-enforcement to prevent the removal of the fence, but is justified, where the other attacks him, or keeps his arms within easy reach, in shooting him to prevent such removal. Sims v. State, 36 Tex. Crim. Rep. 637, 44 S. W. 522, 36 Tex. Crim. Rep. 154, 36 S. W. 256.

Nor will the court inquire into the title where a homicide results from a dispute over the ownership of land. State v. Zellers, 7 N. J. L. 220.

And surveys, maps, and testimony with reference to the claim and title of a claimant of a disputed strip of land are not admissible in a prosecution against another claimant in lawful possession for killing the former in an alleged effort to prevent him from removing the line fence. Sims v. State, 36 Tex. Crim. Rep. 637, 44 S. W. 522.

And a letter written by a former owner of land of which the title was in dispute, to one of the claimants, recognizing his right to the disputed strip, is inadmissible in evidence in such case, where the slayer was not aware of such letter, the question of possession, and not of ownership, being the one at issue; and an argument by counsel, based thereon, that the possession of the accused, not being a legal possession, did not warrant him in defending an encroachment, is improper. Ibid.

So, where a person entitled to the joint use and occupation of a well went there to draw water for his family, and there killed the other joint owner in consequence of a sudden violent attack upon him by the latter, the question at issue with reference to the justification of the act is whether it was necessary to save his own life from such a serious assault as would create a reasonable apprehension that his life was in imminent peril, and he did the act to avert the threatened danger, and not whether the act was done to protect his property in the well. Haynes v. State, 17 Ga. 465.

And the professional license to practise law of a joint owner of property, who had been expelled therefrom, is not admissible in a prosecution against him for killing the other joint owner in an effort to regain possession, for the purpose of raising a presumption of good character, where it bore date long prior to the killing; but it is admissible for the purpose of showing that he intended to manage his own case in reoccupying the premises in dispute. Ibid.

And a charge as to rightful possession is improper in a prosecution for homicide committed by a person in the legal possession of land to prevent another from fencing such land with his own, under Tex. Penal Code, art. 680, sub-div. 2, with reference to self-defense predicated upon the possession of property, providing that the possession must be legal, though the right of property may not be in the possessor. Sims v. State, 36 Tex. Crim. Rep. 154, 36 S. W. 256.

V. Attack in, or trespass or assault on, dwelling.

a. Personal attack in.

When a person is attacked in his own house he is not required to retreat, but may stand at bay and turn on and kill his assailant if this is apparently necessary to save his own life. Jones v. State, 76 Ala. 8; Storey v. State, 71 Ala. 329; Brinkley v. State, 89 Ala. 34, 18 Am. St. Rep. 87, 8 So. 22; People v. Newcomer, 118 Cal. 263, 50 Pac. 405; Haynes v. State, 17 Ga. 465; State v. Middleham, 62 Iowa, 150, 17 N. W. 446; Bledsoe v. Com. 9 Ky. L. Rep. 1002, 7 S. W. 884; Tingle v. Com. 11 Ky. L. Rep. 224, 11 S. W. 812; Wright v. Com. 85 Ky. 123, 2 S. W. 904; Pond v. People, 8 Mich. 150; State v. Taylor, 143 Mo. 150, 44 S. W. 785; Willis v. State, 43 Neb. 102, 61 N. W. 254; State v. Harman, 78 N. C. 515.

And this is so even though a retreat could be safely made. Brinkley v. State, 89 Ala. 34, 18 Am. St. Rep. 87, 8 So. 22.

And an instruction in a prosecution for killing his assailant, making his justification depend upon the existence of no other safe, or apparently safe, means of avoiding the danger, is improper. Bledsoe v. Com. 9 Ky. L. Rep. 1002, 7 S. W. 884; Tingle v. Com. 11 Ky. L. Rep. 224, 11 S. W. 812; Wright v. Com. 85 Ky. 123, 2 S. W. 904.

And the right of a person to defend himself when assaulted in his own dwelling house does not depend upon the assailant having sought him out for the purpose and with the intent to kill him or inflict great bodily harm upon him. Estep v. Com. 86 Ky. 39, 9 Am. St. Rep. 260, 4 S. W. 820.

And to justify a person assaulted in his own dwelling in shooting his assailant, it is immaterial whether the assailant intended to make a forcible attack upon him or not, where he was following him up in such a manner as to frighten him, and lead him to believe that a violent attack was imminent. Hurd v. People, 25 Mich. 405.

Thus, a person against whom another had made threats, who is attacked by the latter at night at his own door with the apparent purpose of executing such threats, is not bound to fly from his habitation, where his wife and children are, to escape danger, instead of resisting the aggressor; and, if he kills the other, his act is excusable if he has reason to believe, and does believe, from the other's previous and present language and actions, that it is necessary to do so to save his own life, or protect himself from danger or great bodily harm. People v. Lilly, 38 Mich. 270.

And one who was attacked by another, a larger and stronger man than himself, and sought to shut himself in a house for protection, but who, upon being followed by the larger man, inflicted wounds upon the other believing that his life was in danger, or that he was in danger of receiving great bodily harm, and that such danger was so urgent and pressing that to save his own life or prevent such harm it was absolutely necessary for him to inflict such wounds, is entitled, in a prosecution for the wounding and resulting death, to an instruction as to justifiable homicide in defense of habitation, property, or person against one who manifestly intends, or endeavors, by violence or surprise to commit a known felony. Reins v. People, 30 Ill. 256.

So, if several armed men go to a dwelling house in the nighttime for the purpose of seizing the owner without lawful authority, and one of them is killed by him to prevent the execution of their purpose, the killing is not murder; at most it is but manslaughter. State v. Medlin, 60 N. C. (2 Winst. L.) 99.

And in DeForest v. State, 21 Ind. 23, it was said that where a man, upon going home, found the door locked and himself locked out of his own house, those within refusing to open it, and he got an ax and beat the door down, upon which he encountered a man inside armed with an ax handle, who attacked him, and whom he killed, it cannot be said that the homicide was not committed under circumstances excusable as a matter of self-defense; but the case was decided upon other grounds.

And Rex v. Longden, Russ. & R. C. C. 228, holds that where a person stands with an offensive weapon in the doorway of a room to prevent a person from leaving it, and others from entering it, and a person entitled to enter attempts to get his weapon away from him, upon which his comrade stabs such person causing his death, it is murder on the part of the comrade.

A person, though attacked in his own house, however, has no right to kill, unless it becomes necessary to save his own life, or prevent a felonious destruction of his property, or the commission of a felony therein; he is not justified in killing to prevent a mere trespass upon the property, even in his own dwelling. State v. Taylor, 143 Mo. 150, 44 S. W. 785.

He must not take life if he can otherwise arrest or repel the assailant; he is not justified in killing unless the killing is to all reasonable appearances necessary to preserve his own life, or prevent great bodily harm. State v. Middleham, 62 Iowa, 150, 17 N. W. 446.

And where one went to the house of another rightfully to get his property which he had left there, and demeaned himself properly while there, and left peaceably, and, irritated by a remark of the owner, returned on his invitation, upon which the owner seized a deadly weapon and killed him, his return under the circumstances did not render him a trespasser so as to furnish any justification for the assault upon him; and a sufficient showing of malice appears to warrant a conviction of murder in the first degree. Greschia v. People, 53 Ill. 295.

So, while one in his own domicile may defend himself without retreating therefrom, if he has retreated from his domicile and enclosure, and attempts afterward to defend himself, the principle which excuses one from retreating from his own domicile is no longer applicable, and he may not then strike with a deadly weapon unless it reasonably appears to be necessary to save himself from grievous bodily harm. Martin v. State, 90 Ala. 602, 24 Am. St. Rep. 844, 8 So. 358.

But evidence that after a conflict between two persons one of them entered his own house and procured a revolver and returned to the door, and that the other was then in a position from which he might have left the premises by another way, but that he came to the door and attempted to open it, when he was shot by the owner, does not warrant an instruction as to the law in case the person shot attacked the owner, and afterwards abandoned the attack and retreated, when the owner became the aggressor, and pursued and killed him. Hayner v. People, 213 Ill. 142, 72 N. E. 792.

b. Defense against entrance.

A man's house is his castle, and he has the right to resort to any means to prevent another entering it, even to the extreme means of taking life, if the entrance cannot otherwise be prevented. State v. Dugan, Houst. Crim. Rep. (Del.) 563; Davison v. People, 90 Ill. 221; Pond v. People, 8 Mich. 150; State v. Patterson, 45 Vt. 308, 12 Am. Rep. 200; Semayne's Case, 5 Coke, 91a.

And an inmate of a dwelling which is attacked need not flee therefrom to escape being injured, but may meet the assailant at the threshold, and prevent him from breaking in by any means rendered necessary by the exigency. State v. Patterson, 45 Vt. 308, 12 Am. Rep. 200; Carroll v. State, 23 Ala. 28, 58 Am. Dec. 282; State v. Conally, 3 Or. 60.

The law regards an attack on a person's dwelling in the night as equivalent to an assault on the man's person on the question of the amount of force which may be used to repel the attack. Meade's Case, 1 Lewin, C. C. 184; Richardson v. State, 7 Tex. App. 486; Weaver v. State, 19 Tex. App. 547, 53 Am. Rep. 389.

And where the purpose of an assailant of a dwelling is to take life or inflict great bodily harm, and the object of the attack is to gain access to the inmates, the same means may lawfully be used to prevent him as might have been used to prevent him from making a harmful assault upon the person in case the parties had met at another place. State v. Patterson, 45 Vt. 308, 12 Am. Rep. 200.

And where an assault on a house is made with the intent, either of taking the life of the owner, or of doing him great bodily harm, the owner is justified in using a deadly weapon if it is necessary to prevent the perpetration of the crime, or if he believes and is warranted in believing that it is so necessary. Ibid.

Nor does the law require that there shall be actual danger to one's habitation to justify killing in defense of it; but it does require that there shall be reasonable ground for apprehending a design to commit a felony upon such habitation, and that there shall also be reasonable ground for believing the danger imminent that such design will be accomplished. Stoneman v. Com. 25 Gratt. 887.

And where an assault is made upon the house of a person under circumstances which would create a just and reasonable apprehension in the mind of a reasonable man of a design to commit a felony with force, or to inflict a personal injury which might result in the loss of life or some great bodily harm, the danger of the design being carried into execution being imminent and present, the person in whose mind such an apprehension is induced, or over whose person or property the danger is pending, may lawfully act upon the apprehension and kill the assailant. Richardson v. State, 7 Tex. App. 486.

Thus, where a large and strong man attacked a smaller and weaker one, first outside his dwelling, and then followed him up with apparent intention of attacking him again inside his dwelling, where he had retired or fled, he was justified in shooting his assailant if the acts of the other were such, and the circumstances as they appeared to him such, as to render it necessary. In his opinion, for the protection of his life, or to avoid grievous or dangerous bodily harm, to kill the other. Hurd v. People, 25 Mich. 405.

And where several persons go to the house of another for the purpose of arresting the latter without authority, and depriving him of his liberty, and carrying him away in the nighttime, the attempt constitutes an assault which he and the inmates of his house have a right to resist with such force as may be necessary to protect themselves, even to the taking the life of those present aiding and assisting, as well as those breaking and entering. Wright v. Com. 85 Ky. 123, 2 S. W. 904.

And where in such case they break in, and, upon being resisted, retreat a short distance and prepare to shoot into the house, the owner is not required to retreat from his house, or to remain in it, but has the right, outside or inside, to use such force as may be, or reasonably appears to him to be, necessary to protect himself, even after the other party has fallen back, to prevent any further assault upon his person or dwelling; and is not rendered more responsible for the killing of one of the attacking party because he comes out of his dwelling to do the shooting. Ibid.

So, where a wife, having reasonable grounds to apprehend personal violence at the hands of her husband, seeks a temporary refuge in the house of another person, and the husband attempts to enter, and, after being induced by force or artifice to leave, goes away and procures a pistol with the apparent intention or design of effecting an entrance by force, or by intimidating the owner or his family, the owner has the right to shoot him in order to prevent the felony, if he has reasonable cause to apprehend that it is necessary in order to prevent him from doing great bodily harm to him or a member of his family. State v. Conally, 3 Or. 69.

The idea embodied in the expression that a man's house is his castle, however, is not that it is his property, and as such he has the right to defend and protect it by other and more extreme means than he might lawfully use to defend and protect his shop, his office, or his barn; the sense in which the house has a special immunity is that it is sacred for the protection of his person and of his family. State v. Patterson, 45 Vt. 308, 12 Am. Rep. 200.

And an assault on one's house can be regarded as an assault on the person, within the meaning of a law with reference to self-defense, only where the purpose of the assault is an injury to the person of the occupant or members of his family, to accomplish which the assailant attacks the castle in order to reach the inmates. Ibid.

And to justify a homicide in protection of a dwelling the means used must have been necessary to the effectual protection of the occupant or his family. Ibid.; Carroll v. State, 23 Ala. 28, 58 Am. Dec. 282; Pond v. People, 8 Mich. 150; State v. Conally, 3 Or. 69.

A man is not authorized to fire a pistol at one who forcibly breaks his close or invades his dwelling, unless less violent means will not avert the danger. Meade's Case, 1 Lewin, C. C. 184.

And a person who, in defending his house against an unlawful entry for the purpose of executing a lawful warrant, and thus securing his unlawful arrest, though having the right to resist, would be guilty of manslaughter if he made an unreasonable defense and killed the officer, though unintentionally. State v. Scheele, 57 Conn. 307, 14 Am. St. Rep. 106, 18 Atl. 256.

A man in his own habitation may resist force with force, however, and oppose an unlawful entry against his will by one who, in a violent manner, attempts to enter with the purpose of assaulting or offering violence to him, even to the extent of taking life, under Ill. Crim. Code, § 148, div. 1, declaring homicide justifiable in defense of habitation, person, or property against any person who manifestly intends or endeavors in a violent, riotous, or tumultuous manner to enter the habitation of another for the purpose of assaulting or offering personal violence to any person dwelling or being therein, though the circumstances may not be such as to justify a belief that there is actual peril of life, or great bodily harm, or that the act is necessary to prevent the commission of a felony. Hayner v. People, 213 Ill. 142, 72 N. E. 792.

But a mere demonstration toward, or even an effort to break into, a dwelling house will not excuse a homicide by the owner or an inmate to prevent the breaking in. Wright v. Com. 85 Ky. 123, 2 S. W. 904.

And entering a house after warning has been given not to enter is an aggravated trespass; but, if done without force, it is not a breach of the peace, so that a killing to prevent such entry would be justifiable; and the fact that threats were made does not convert the trespass into one with force. Carroll v. State, 23 Ala. 28, 58 Am. Dec. 282.

And a mere civil trespass upon a man's house, unaccompanied with such force as to make it a breach of the peace, will not reduce the killing of the trespasser to manslaughter if it was done under circumstances from which the law would imply malice, as with a deadly weapon. Ibid.

And while the assembling of rioters before a person's house for the purpose of annoying him and his family by blowing horns, ringing bells, firing guns loaded only with powder and wads, and by other noises, without any actual attack on the house, or forcible attempt to enter it, justifies the owner in attempting to drive them off even with blows, not calculated to endanger life, it would not justify or excuse him in attacking any of the rioters with an ax or other dangerous weapon for the purpose of compelling them to desist or leave, and would not relieve him from criminal liability if in so doing he killed one of them. Patten v. People, 18 Mich. 314, 100 Am. Dec. 173.

And the fact that the mother of the owner was in feeble health, and that fear and excitement caused by such conduct produced upon her alarming effects from which he might have apprehended her speedy death, is not available as an excuse for his attack upon them with a deadly weapon, and the killing of one of them, unless the rioters were informed of the mother's condition, and the effect produced by their conduct, or unless every reasonable and practical effort had been made to inform them of the facts. Ibid.

So, Ga. Code, § 4266, providing that if, after persuasion, remonstrance, or other gentle measures used to prevent a forcible attack and invasion on the property and habitation of another, it cannot be prevented, the party attacked may kill the person so forcibly attacking, if it appears that the killing is absolutely necessary to prevent such attack and invasion, and that a serious injury is intended or might accrue to the person, property, or family of the slayer,—contemplates an attack upon the property or habitation of another, or upon his person or his family, by an invasion of his rights of property, and applies only to the right of defense given to a citizen in protecting his habitation, or 67 L. R. A. property, or family, or himself, while in such place, from forcible attack. Pound v. State, 43 Ga. 88.

But it is not qualified in its application by § 4267 thereof, so as to make it necessary to the justification that the danger was so urgent and pressing that, in order to save his own life, the killing of the other was absolutely necessary, and that the person killed should have been the assailant, or that the slayer had in good faith declined any further struggle before the mortal blow was given. Ibid.

And Ga. Penal Code, § 12, div. 4, providing that homicide is justifiable in self-defense against any persons who manifestly intend and endeavor in a riotous and tumultuous manner to enter the habitation of another for the purpose of assaulting or offering personal violence to any person dwelling or being therein, contemplates the joint action of two or more persons, and does not apply to a single individual. Hudgins v. State, 2 Ga. 173.

c. Expulsion.

A man's house is regarded as his castle, affording him and his family a city of refuge with reference to expulsion of intruders, as well as with reference to the prevention of intrusion; and, if a person unlawfully intrudes, the house holder, after having warned him to depart, and after his refusal to obey within a reasonable time, may employ sufficient force to expel him. State v. Battmess, 33 Or. 110, 54 Pac. 167; State v. Dugan, Houst. Crim. Rep. (Del.) 563; Pennsylvania v. Robertson, Addison (Pa.) 246.

And where one person indulges in profanity and indecent behavior in the house of another, the latter is justified in ordering or expelling him from his premises, and upon doing so, and upon refusal to go, he is under no legal necessity to avoid the altercation by yielding the right in question as a mode of avoiding apprehended violence. Brinkley v. State, 89 Ala. 34, 18 Am. St. Rep. 87, 8 So. 22.

And an instruction in a prosecution against the owner of a dwelling house for the killing of a person who had entered in a lawless manner and with what was equivalent to a threat of violence to the inmates, making his justification depend upon there being no other safe, or apparently safe, means of escape from impending danger, is improper and misleading, since he had a right to stand his ground and defend himself as well as the inmates of his house. Estep v. Com. 86 Ky. 39, 9 Am. St. Rep. 260, 4 S. W. 820.

So, evidence in a criminal prosecution that a man was seen at the door of the house of another, cutting or reaching into the door with a razor, when the owner came out striking at him with a whip staff while the trespasser was cutting at him, and that the trespasser walked backward cutting with his razor some 12 or 15 feet, while the owner continued to advance, warrants and requires an instruction to the jury as to the amount of force which might lawfully be used by the owner to expel the intruder. State v. Taylor, 82 N. C. 554.

But, while a man has the right to order another to leave his house, and to lay his hands upon him softly, and, if he then resists, use force, he has no right to put him out by force until all other means have failed, or to use violence at the outset. McCoy v. State, 8 Ark. 451; State v. Dugan, Houst. Crim. Rep. (Del.) 563.

Homicide in defense of one's possession, to be justifiable, must have been committed in defense of one's dwelling house after all means of expulsion of the intruder had failed. State v. Becker, 9 Houst. (Del.) 411, 33 Atl. 17.

And while it is the duty, as well as the right, of every householder to prevent breaches of the peace in his dwelling; and, for the accomplishment of such purpose, such householder has the clear and legal right to expel from his house any person guilty of an attempt to commit a breach of the peace therein, and may use all the force necessary to such expulsion,—it is not his right or duty to kill such person to prevent a breach of the peace or a simple assault on himself or another. State v. Conally, 3 Or. 69.

When a trespasser or unwelcome visitor invades the premises of another, the latter has the right to remove him; but the law requires that he shall first request him to leave, and, if he does not do so, that he shall lay hands gently upon him, and if he then resists, he may use sufficient force to remove him, taking care to use no more force than is necessary to accomplish that object; but, if the intruder defiantly stands his ground, armed with a deadly weapon, the owner may at once resort to force; and it is a question for the jury to decide whether or not he uses more than is necessary. State v. Taylor, 82 N. C. 554.

And though a man who killed another in the former's house had reason to believe that the latter was there for the purpose of debauching the former's wife, he is not entitled to an instruction, in a prosecution for the killing, as to his right to eject the latter, where he was not asked to leave until after the blow was struck. Pence v. Com. 21 Ky. L. Rep. 500, 51 S. W. 801.

d. Who may defend, and against whom.

Either a master of, or lodger or sojourner in, a house, who necessarily kills a person breaking into it with intent to commit burglary or homicide therein, is exempt from criminal responsibility. Cooper's Case, Cro. Car. 544.

And one who rents a house of the owner, who is entitled to possession, and enters under him, has the same right to use force in keeping the possession that the owner had. Corey v. People, 45 Barb. 262.

So, a person in his own house has the same right of defense, and the same right to stand his ground and to kill in self-defense when assaulted by a partner or cotenant, as when assaulted by a stranger. Jones v. State, 76 Ala. 8.

And the moral character of a person, or of her doings or transactions in her domicile, does not affect her right to take life, if necessary, in its defense against an armed and deliberate intruder; and evidence as to her business, in a prosecution for a homicide committed in such defense, is inadmissible. State v. Kennade, 121 Mo. 405, 26 S. W. 347.

e. What constitutes dwelling or castle.

A house cannot be said to be the owner's castle, within the meaning of rules of law with reference to the right to use force in defense of one's castle, where it is not used as a dwelling, but merely as a storehouse. Corey v. People, 45 Barb. 262.

And the right to employ force in defense of one's habitation does not extend beyond the 67 L. R. A.

limits of the dwelling and the customary out-buildings. State v. Bartmess, 33 Or. 110, 54 Pac. 167.

But a tobacco house which is in the owner's curtilage is entitled to all the privileges and protection, with reference to felonious acts committed against it, of the capital or dwelling house. Parrish v. Com. 81 Va. 1.

And a net house belonging to a fisherman, which is near his dwelling, and is used, not only for preserving his nets, which are the tools of his ordinary occupation, but also as a permanent dormitory for his servants, is a part of his dwelling, within the meaning of the rule authorizing a person to kill if necessary in defense of his dwelling. Pond v. People, 8 Mich. 150.

And one who shot and killed one of a number of persons who had followed and threatened him, and who had attempted to forcibly enter his dwelling, and who was in the act of seizing and choking his servants, and had commenced to tear down boards from a building in which the servants were found, is entitled to defend on the ground that the act was done in defense of his property. Ibid.

So, a man's place of business may be regarded as his dwelling, under rules of law authorizing him, in case of necessity, to take life in defense of his dwelling. Jones v. State, 76 Ala. 8; Willis v. State, 43 Neb. 102, 61 N. W. 254.

And a man's office, for the transaction of business, is as much his dwelling as the house in which he resides; and he has an equal right to act in defense of his office as he has in defense of his dwelling, and may use like force against a person attacking it. Morgan v. Duffee, 69 Mo. 469, 33 Am. Rep. 508.

And a lawyer in his office, who is abused by a person therein, who is his physical superior, and who refuses to go when told to do so, and who threatens his life and attacks him, has the right to defend his office from ruthless intrusion and his person against a battery, as well as to defend himself against threatened death, and may employ all the means within his reach and all the energies under his control apparently necessary for such defense; and his act in defending himself from such attack, while the other has him by the throat, of striking him upon the head with a notarial seal and killing him, is justifiable. Ibid.

So, a man in the home of his mother has the right to protect it and himself and everyone in it against all intruders; and, if he should slay a person standing outside, firing a pistol into the midst of the assembled family, his act would be justifiable. State v. Pollard, 139 Mo. 220, 40 S. W. 949.

And killing in defense of one's room in a tavern is justifiable where the intruders attempt forcibly to put the lawful occupant out. Ford's Case, J. Kelyng, 51.

And a room rented by a person and occupied as a bedroom is his castle, from which no duty to retreat rests on him, and, in case of an attack therein, he has the right to stand his ground and defend himself, even to the death of his assailant, who is, or reasonably appears to be, about to kill or inflict grievous bodily harm on him. Harris v. State, 96 Ala. 24, 11 So. 255.

And he should not be convicted of murder on evidence that he fired the first shot, after the door was opened, which killed the person attacking him, if the jury from all the evidence entertain a reasonable doubt on the question whether or not he acted upon a well-grounded and reasonable belief that it was necessary to shoot the trespasser to save himself from death or great bodily harm. Ibid.

VI. Defense of family and relations.

A person is always justified in acting for the defense of his family according to the circumstances as they appear to him. Richardson v. State, 7 Tex. App. 486. And see MORRISON v. Com.

Persons connected by the relation of the family, guardian and child, or master and servant, may defend each other against an assailant, even to the necessity of taking life. Waybright v. State, 56 Ind. 122; Dukes v. State, 11 Ind. 557, 71 Am. Dec. 370.

And a man who finds another violating, or attempting to violate, his wife, and kills him, is justified in the act, as the woman herself would be. State v. Neville, 51 N. C. (6 Jones, L.) 432.

And evidence in a prosecution for homicide that the deceased entered the bedchamber in which the wife and sister of the accused were asleep after midnight, and that he aroused the sister by putting his hand upon her, and that, upon being told to go away, he went under the wife's bed in the same room, and that the sister awoke the accused and told him the circumstances, and that he immediately went in and the killing followed, warrants and requires an instruction to the jury with reference to the rule justifying homicide when committed in the just apprehension of immediate danger of the commission of a felony, or of great personal injury or bodily harm. Staten v. State, 30 Miss. 619.

So, a husband has the right to use force, if necessary, to enable him to regain possession of his wife from one in whose society he finds her, where he has reason to believe that they have committed, or are about to commit, a criminal act. State v. Craton, 28 N. C. (6 Ired. L.) 164.

And if a man takes the life of another who attempts the seduction of his wife under circumstances of gross and direct aggravation, it is for the jury, in a prosecution for the killing, to find whether the case stands upon the same footing of reason and justice as other instances of justifiable homicide enumerated in the Georgia Penal Code, within the meaning of a provision of law making cases of homicide so standing also justifiable. Biggs v. State, 29 Ga. 723, 76 Am. Dec. 630.

And where the character of a wife for chastity is impeached in a prosecution against her husband for making a violent assault upon one who attempted her seduction, it is competent for the husband to give evidence in support of his wife's general character for chastity, since, if her character was bad, he would be less justifiable in resorting to violent means to rescue and protect her. Ibid.

And one who shoots at another in defense of his wife, whom the latter had attempted to seduce, and who would be justified in his act had he killed the other, cannot be held criminally liable for shooting where death does not result, under a statute imposing a penalty upon any person who should be guilty of the offense of shooting at another. Ibid.

Also, one who sees his brother assaulted by 67 L. R. A.

another has the same right to resist the assault, and is entitled to the same defenses, or partial defenses, reducing the grade of the crime, as the person assaulted. Palmer v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 83 S. W. 202; Snell v. State, 29 Tex. App. 236, 25 Am. St. Rep. 723, 15 S. W. 722.

And shooting and killing a person who is about to shoot the slayer's brother, for the purpose of saving his life, is justifiable, when such action appears to be reasonably necessary for that purpose, though it fails to save the brother's life. Guffee v. State, 8 Tex. App. 187.

And the brother of a man, who has been taken by force in the nighttime, under threats against his life, from his place of business, by a father and mother for the purpose of compelling him to marry their daughter, has the right to pursue the carriage in which they went in order to rescue his brother, and use such force as is reasonably necessary for that purpose; but he has no right to commence firing into the carriage, or to make hostile demonstration before demanding his brother's release, and, in case he does so and causes the death of one of the party, he is guilty of manslaughter. Dalaney v. Com. 18 Ky. L. Rep. 212, 35 S. W. 1037.

So, the question in a prosecution against a father who killed a person to prevent an attempt to take away his children is whether the circumstances were such as to produce a reasonable belief in his mind of a pressing necessity to take the life of the assailant; and it is wholly immaterial to inquire whether the father was in a state of fear or alarm, or whether he was a man of firmness and character, or of a weak and cowardly disposition. Oliver v. State, 17 Ala. 587.

And whether or not the taking or decoying a child away from its parents would be a felony, to prevent which the taking of life would be justifiable, under a statutory provision punishing by imprisonment in the penitentiary every person who shall maliciously, forcibly, or fraudulently lead or take away, or decoy, or entice away, any child under a designated age with intent to detain or conceal such child from its parents, guardian, or other person having lawful charge, and making all offenses punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary, depends upon the intent with which the child is taken; to render the offense a felony the criminal intent and the act must both concur. Ibid.

Likewise, if one person shot another under a reasonable apprehension that his own life or that of some other member of his family was in imminent danger, or under a reasonable apprehension that the person intended to burn the dwelling house of his mother, or commit some other known felony, and that there was imminent danger of such design being carried into effect, his act is justifiable; and this is the rule though the danger was unreal. Parrish v. Com. 81 Va. 1.

And a person who is called in to protect the family of his uncle from the assaults of another, and to prevent the other from committing a rape upon the little daughter of the uncle, who believes, and has reasonable grounds to believe, that such other is about to commit a rape upon the child, has the right to use such means as are necessary to prevent the felony, or the infliction of great bodily harm, and is justified in killing such person if he acts in good faith for the purpose of preventing the injury. Roe v. Com. 6 Ky. L. Rep. 364.

And an uncle, who is justified by the facts in striking a person in defense of his nephew, has the right to use such force as is apparently necessary to avert the impending peril to the nephew in the exercise of a reasonable judgment, and is not required to measure the exact force necessary to avert such danger. Carroll v. Com. 26 Ky. L. Rep. 1083, 83 S. W. 552.

One who kills another in the assumed right to act in defense of relatives, and is prosecuted therefor, may give in evidence any facts tending to show the character of the attack which he resisted, the intention with which it was made, and that he had reasonable grounds to believe that it was necessary, as a measure of prevention, to go to the extent he did in resisting it. Dukes v. State, 11 Ind. 557, 71 Am. Dec. 370.

And a decree in a divorce case rendered in favor of a wife against her husband is admissible in evidence in a prosecution against the wife's brother for killing the husband, alleged to have been done in defense of his family, for the purpose of showing that the person killed was no longer the husband of the accused's sister, but was a mere intruder upon the premises of the family of accused having no pretense of right to go there, and properly subject to be regarded as a trespasser. Stoneman v. Com. 25 Gratt. 887.

An agent of a husband for the purpose of hunting out the adultery of his wife, however, is not justified or excused in shooting her paramour, though he catches the parties in the very act. People v. Horton, 4 Mich. 67.

And whether a husband or his wife was in possession of the premises constituting their residence, and whether or not a trespasser entered the house with or without permission of the wife, is immaterial in a prosecution against an agent of the husband employed to hunt out the adultery of his wife for killing a trespasser on such premises, since in any event the killing is not justified. Ibid.

And a brother or other person assisting another in resisting a trespass or other wrongful act directed against the latter can use no more force than the person he assists would be entitled to use. Carpenter v. State, 62 Ark. 286, 36 S. W. 000.

Nor has a son, against whose mother threats of death are made, a right to shoot the person making the threats because he thinks they may at some future day be executed, the mother not being present at the time they are made. People v. Walworth, 4 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 355.

And where a prosecution for homicide is defended upon the theory that a difficulty occurred between the accused and the deceased, in which the deceased was using a poker and had made an assault upon the accused with it at the time accused stabbed and killed her, a charge upon the theory that the accused was defending against an attack made by deceased upon her sisters is not called for, though her two sisters were present at the time. Johnson v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 84 S. W. 824.

So, Fla. Rev. Stat. § 2378, div. 2, subdiv. 2, providing that a homicide is justifiable when committed in defense of the slayer's husband, wife, parent, child, master, mistress, or servant, when there shall be reasonable grounds to apprehend a design to commit a felony, or do some great personal injury, and there shall be 67 L. imminent danger of such design being accomplished, includes neither a brother nor sister of the person doing the killing. Mitchell v. State, 43 Fla. 188, 30 So. 803; Richard v. State, 42 Fla. 528, 29 So. 413.

And the principle of relationship has no application on the question of the right of a man to take life in defense of a woman where the two were co-slaves and lived together while such, and subsequently occupied the same bed in a room with other freed people. Parker v. State, 31 Tex. 132.

The amenability to the law of one who, finding another engaged in an affray, goes to his aid and takes part in the conflict, depends upon his own acts and intent, and not upon the intent which actuates the person to whose aid he goes, he having no knowledge thereof. Guffee v. State, 8 Tex. App. 187; Snell v. State, 29 Tex. App. 236, 25 Am. St. Rep. 723, 15 S. W. 722.

VII. Prevention as distinguished from punishment.

Homicide is justified when committed for the purpose of preventing felony, but not when committed as a punishment for one already committed. State v. Roane, 13 N. C. (2 Dev. L.) 58.

The act of deliberately seeking another and slaying him for past wrongs, however heinous they may be, is broadly separated on the question of justification from slaying another to prevent his doing a present or future wrong immediately pending. Whatever is done to avenge a past wrong is not justifiable. Hill v. State, 64 Ga. 453.

A well-grounded belief that a felony is about to be committed will extenuate a homicide committed to prevent the commission of a felony; but a homicide committed by an individual of his own accord after the commission of a felony, on pursuit of the person committing it, is not so extenuated. State v. Rutherford, 8 N. C. (1 Hawks) 457, 9 Am. Dec. 658.

Thus, to justify the killing by a husband of his wife's paramour, it must have been done to prevent him from attempting or consummating an impending adultery, and not to avenge a past one. Hill v. State, 64 Ga. 453; Farmer v. State, 91 Ga. 720, 18 S. E. 987; Cloud v. State, 81 Ga. 444, 7 S. E. 641.

And a husband is not justified in going into a field where a man is at work and killing him because he had committed adultery with the slayer's wife, upon the theory that it was done in the reasonable fear that the offense would be again committed. Jackson v. State, 91 Ga. 271, 44 Am. St. Rep. 22, 18 S. E. 298.

Nor can a killing be justified on the theory that it was done by the slayer to protect the virtue of his affianced wife, where she was in a place of safety at the time of the killing, and was in no danger at that time from being interfered with by deceased; to be justified the killing must have been necessary to protect her. Futch v. State, 90 Ga. 472, 16 S. E. 102.

And evidence in a prosecution for homicide that on the night of the killing the deceased had visited the slayer's daughter, and the slayer threatened to kill him, and procured a pistol, and, after deceased had left his house and proceeded some distance therefrom, shot and killed him, does not show a killing of deceased to prevent his having further illicit relations with the daughter; and a charge as to homicide to prevent the commission of crime is properly refused. Bone v. State, 86 Ga. 108, 12 S. E. 205.

And to justify a defense against homicide that the killing was done in protection of the slayer's property, or property in his possession, it must appear that he killed while the other was in the very act of making a violent attack on his property, and that he resorted to all other means to prevent the injury. Woodring v. State, 33 Tex. Crim. Rep. 26, 24 S. W. 293.

Nor does the right of self-defense, or defense of one's family or habitation, justify pursuing and killing an intruder or aggressor after he has retreated. State v. Conally, 3 Or. 69.

Where a supposed felon flees and thereby abandons his supposed design a killing in pursuit is not extenuated however well grounded the belief may be that he intended to commit a felony. State v. Rutherford, 8 N. C. (1 Hawks) 457, 9 Am. Lec. 658.

And where a woman, having reasonable grounds to apprehend personal violence at the hands of her husband, seeks a temporary refuge in the house of another, and the husband seeks to enter against the command of the owner, either the owner or the wife has the right to use all necessary force to prevent him from entering; but they have no right to pursue and shoot at him after he has given up his attempt to enter, the attempt in such case furnishing no justification for the shooting. State v. Conally, 3 Or. 69.

And the occupant of a house has no right to shoot a person trespassing in his dooryard in the night when he is not approaching the house or disturbing anything, but going toward the gate and about to pass through it to the street at the time of the shooting. State v. Roane, 18 N. C. (2 Dev. L.) 58.

So, though an attack upon an unlawful assembly by a body of men by which it was dispersed, was unjustifiable and unlawful, a killing of one of the attacking party by one of the assembly is not justifiable where it occurred after the friends of the assembled party had rallied and commenced returning the assault, though the assailants were guilty of the first illegal assault, since the law permits no man to be his own avenger. Com. v. Daley, 2 Clark (Pa.) 361.

But a husband who looked through a crack of his house and saw a man whom he had suspected with his arm around his wife's neck, and saw acts which satisfied him that a criminal act was about to be committed, and ran into the house, when the man inside attacked him with a knife, upon which he killed the intruder, is clearly not guilty of murder, but manslaughter. State v. Harman, 78 N. C. 515.

And evidence, in a prosecution for homicide, of criminal intimacy between the person killed and the slayer's wife, and that the slayer had frequently appealed to the deceased to let his wife alone, and that he had persistently followed her up, and that on the occasion of the shooting he was seen a short time before he was killed with the wife of the slayer on his arm going up a dark alley, is sufficient to go to the jury, under a statute providing that homicide shall be justifiable to prevent a felony, and in defense of one's family under certain circumstances, and in all other instances standing on a like footing of reason and justice; and a charge as to justifiable homicide in such case is properly given. Cloud v. State, 81 Ga. 444, 7 S. E. 641.

And whether or not homicide to protect the affianced wife of a man is within statutory provisions making homicide in self-defense, or in defense of habitation, person, or property against one who manifestly intends or endeavors by surprise to commit a felony on either, or against any person who manifestly intends and endeavors in a riotous and tumultuous manner to enter the habitation of another for the purpose of assaulting or offering personal violence to any person dwelling or being therein, and also in all other instances that stand on the same footing of reason and justice as those enumerated,—a charge in a prosecution for homicide, authorizing the jury to acquit if the deceased did the killing to protect the virtue of a woman who had engaged to marry him, is not subject to objection on his part, since, if erroneous, it is favorable to him. Futch v. State, 90 Ga. 472, 16 S. E. 102.

A killing with malice is murder, usually in the first degree, irrespective of any question of defense, property, home, or family.

Thus, one who kills another with malice, express or implied, is guilty of murder, though there is reasonable ground for apprehension of imminent danger to his property or person. Carroll v. State, 23 Ala. 28, 58 Am. Dec. 282.

And one who is about to be arrested for a misdemeanor, who has a desire to kill the officer, cannot fortify himself in his dwelling house, and on the approach of the officer shoot him without notice or warning, without being criminally responsible for murder. State v. Scheele, 57 Conn. 607, 14 Am. St. Rep. 106, 18 Atl. 256.

And one who kills another with actual malice cannot shelter himself, on a charge of murder, behind Miss. Rev. Code, § 2638, providing that every person who unnecessarily kills another, either while resisting an attempt by such other to commit a felony, or to do any other unlawful act, or after such attempt shall have failed, shall be guilty of manslaughter. Long v. State, 52 Miss. 23.

So, when one kills a trespasser knowing that a trespass only is intended is guilty of murder. State v. Medlin, 80 N. C. (2 Winst. L.) 99; Hull v. State, 6 Lea, 250.

And a bare trespass against the property of another, consisting of stealing melons from a melon patch, is not a sufficient provocation to warrant the owner in using a deadly weapon in its defense; and, if he uses such weapon, though without intent to kill anyone, it is an unlawful act, and if he kills the trespasser it is at least manslaughter; though if the injury is inflicted with a weapon and in a manner not likely to produce death, and the trespasser happens to be killed, it can be no more. State v. Vance, 17 Iowa, 138.

One who kills in defense of his property, however, when there is reasonable ground for apprehension of imminent danger to his property or his person, is guilty of manslaughter only, if it is done without malice. Carroll v. State, 23 Ala. 28, 58 Am. Dec. 282.

And to reduce a homicide from murder to manslaughter the slayer is not obliged, before the mortal wound is given, to retreat from his domicile or his family. Haynes v. State, 17 Ga. 465.

Though the mere fact that the element of defense of property or person is involved in an act of homicide does not make it, as matter of law, nothing more than manslaughter, it is for the jury to say in all such cases whether or not there was malice which would make it murder. State v. Scheele, 57 Conn. 307, 14 Am. St. Rep. 106, 18 Atl. 256.

So, where a person unlawfully breaks into a house for the purpose of executing civil process, and the owner kills him, it is manslaughter only and not murder, since every man has the right to defend his own house. Cook Case, Cro. Car. 537.

But where an officer is about to enter a house unlawfully and in the day time for the purpose of arresting the occupant for a misdemeanor, and the occupant or owner kills him with express malice, the crime is not, as matter of law, manslaughter only because of the unlawful act of the officer. State v. Scheele, 57 Conn. 307, 14 Am. St. Rep. 106, 18 Atl. 256.

So, a father of a married daughter who learns that she had been assaulted and beaten by her husband so as to endanger her life, and believes that the assault and beating will be renewed, and goes to the premises of her husband to prevent it, and finds his daughter and her children expelled from their home by the husband, and in the street, and in sudden heat caused by the beating and ill-treatment shoots and kills him, is guilty of manslaughter only. Campbell v. Com. 88 Ky. 402, 21 Am. St. Rep. 348, 11 S. W. 290.

The rule of the preceding cases would seem to be that the act of killing is manslaughter, and not murder, when there was no malice and the act was done to prevent a felony, or in defense of home, property, or another, but was unnecessary, or done with improper force, or for some other reason was not justifiable; and this rule has been substantially adopted by statute in some of the states.

Thus, under Miss. Rev. Code, § 2638, providing that every person who unnecessarily kills another, either while resisting an attempt by such other to commit a felony, or do any other unlawful act, or after such attempt shall have failed, shall be guilty of manslaughter, one who sees another engaged in the commission of an offense against the criminal laws, and resists the accomplishment of such purpose, and in such resistance slays the person so engaged, is guilty of manslaughter and not murder, though the act of killing is not necessary to the defeat of the criminal act, and though the killing ensues directly after the abandonment of the attempt. Long v. State, 52 Miss. 23.

IX. Summary.

It is the duty of each and every person to support government by preventing breaches of law so far as he is able. So strenuous is this duty as to justify a man even in the commission of a homicide when necessary to prevent the commission of a forcible felony, or a breach of the peace from which a homicide or other felony is liable to result. The felonies falling within this rule are such as murder, rape, robbery, arson, burglary, assaults with deadly weapons, etc., and the breaches of the peace falling within it are such as riots, mobs, etc., as distinguished from such as brawling or fighting without weapons. The right to kill, however, even to prevent such crimes, is limited to absolute, or apparently absolute, necessity for the purpose of accomplishing such prevention. If the commission of the crime can be prevented in any other way, then homicide is not justifiable; and the necessity must have been evident and immediate, and not problematical or remote, and at common law and under some of the statutes, it must have been actual and real; though the prevailing rule under most systems of jurisprudence now is, that it need be apparent only, the appearance being such as to excite a reasonable apprehension of danger that the act in question will be committed.

With reference to misdemeanors, crimes without force, and trespass on ordinary property, death or serious bodily harm is not liable to result, and they are usually punished by penalties far less severe than death. It is not regarded as justifiable, therefore, to take life to prevent such acts, though they cannot be otherwise prevented. But the owner of property may try to prevent a theft or other taking of his property, or to recover it after it is taken, and, if he is resisted he may repel force by force, and if the taker is unavoidably killed, the homicide is justifiable. And a man may lawfully defend property in his possession, whether real or personal, by any degree of force, short of taking life, necessary to the defense; and he may stand his ground and resist his adversary until he is out of danger, and, in case of reasonable apprehension of death or great bodily harm, he may defend himself, if necessary, by taking the life of his assailant.

An attack in or upon one's dwelling, however, stands upon somewhat different grounds. A man's dwelling is his castle, and when attacked in it he has all the rights of self-defense which he would have if attacked elsewhere, without being obliged to flee to the wall before slaying his opponent in order to justify himself; and if his dwelling is attacked he has the right to resort to any means to prevent the assailant from entering it, even to taking life, and that without retreating or fleeing from his adversary. And a man may, likewise, employ such force as may be necessary to expel one who has unlawfully intruded into his dwelling, or behaved improperly in it and refused to go. But in each case the rule of necessity applies, and to justify a homicide either in the protection of a dwelling, or in expelling a wrongdoer from a dwelling, or in self-defense within one's dwelling, it must have been necessary to the effectual protection of the occupant or his family, and killing to prevent a slight breach of the peace, even in one's dwelling, would not be justified.

One is also justified in acting in defense of his family and relations according to the circumstances as they appear to him, having the right to use such force, and such force only, as the person defended would have if acting in self-defense, without perhaps being under the same necessity to flee to the wall, unless the person defended was in a situation to flee; and this rule would appear to apply to force by a husband to prevent criminal acts directed against his wife, though she was a consenting party, though an agent of a husband would not be justified in shooting the paramour of his principal's wife though employed to discover or prevent the criminal act.

In all the above-considered cases, however, there is no justification unless the homicidal act was preventive as distinguished from punitive; punishment for criminal acts must be left to the law; though when the act is a continuing one like robbery, involving a taking and asportation, a forcible interference after the taking, to prevent the consummated act, is justifiable. And the act, if not justifiable, is either murder or manslaughter according to the circumstances of the case; it is murder if done with malice irrespective of any question as to preventing crime, and it is manslaughter if done without malice and in a proper case for the use of force in resistance of aggression, but without necessity, or with improper or unnecessary force.

WARE NATIONAL BANK.

(132 Fed. 444.)

- *1. The issue of a policy of life insurance to one who has no interest as a relative, dependent, creditor, or otherwise, in the life of the insured, and who pays the premiums for the chance of recovering upon the policy, is against public policy, and the contract is void, because the interest of the holder is to shorten, rather than to lengthen, the life of the insured, and his maintenance of the policy is of the nature of a wager.
2. A creditor has an insurable interest in the life of his debtor, and the issue or pledge of a policy upon his life as collateral security for the payment of his debt is valid.
3. The question whether or not an insurable interest in an assignee is requisite to the validity of the assignment of a policy of life insurance, which was originally issued to one who had an insurable interest, is a question of general law, upon which the decisions of the courts of the state in which the assignment was made are not controlling in the Federal courts.
4. An insurable interest in the assignee is not requisite to the validity of the assignment of a policy of life insurance which was lawfully issued to one who had such an interest, unless the assignment was made in bad faith as a cover for the issue of a wager policy. But the use of an assignment immediately upon the issue of a policy to evade the rule that the issue of a policy to one without an insurable interest renders it void avoids the assignment.

5. The pledgee of a policy of life insurance has the right and power to sell the policy to the highest bidder for the purpose of realizing money to pay the debt which it secures, and both immediate and remote assignees under such a sale take good title to the policy and to its proceeds, although they have no insurable interest in the life insured by the policy.
6. In an action between the same parties or between those in privity with them, a prior judgment on the merits upon the same claim or demand by a court which had jurisdiction, is conclusive, whether right or wrong, not only of every matter offered, but of every admissible matter which might have been offered to sustain or defeat the claim or demand.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kansas to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to establish title to the proceeds of a life-insurance policy. Affirmed.

Statement by Sanborn, Circuit Judge:

This action involves a controversy over the ownership of the proceeds of a policy of insurance between the administrator of the estate of Melissa A. Gordon, the plaintiff, and the Ware National Bank, the defendant. The insurance company admitted its liability, and paid into the court below the amount owing upon the policy, which insured the life of William Gordon for $5,000. All the premiums required to be paid by this policy had been paid by Gordon before the year 1879. The amount promised by the policy was payable upon the death of William Gordon to his wife, Melissa A. Gordon, if living; otherwise to the children of William Gordon. Gordon died on March 6, 1902, leaving his wife and two children surviving. Melissa A. Gordon died on March 14, 1902, so that, if Melissa Gordon was not deprived of all interest in the policy by the facts which are about to be stated, her administrator, the plaintiff, is entitled to recover its proceeds. On June 11, 1879, William Gordon and Melissa A. Gordon, his wife, assigned the policy to the German Bank of Leavenworth, Kansas, as collateral security for the payment of loans made by it to William Gordon. On May 8, 1882, the German Bank brought an action in the district court of Leavenworth county, in the state of Kansas, against William Gordon and Melissa A. Gordon to foreclose the pledge of the policy by a sale of it and the application of the proceeds to the payment of a debt of $8,217.01, which was then owing by William Gordon to the bank. The Gordons appeared in that action, admitted that the indebtedness of William Gordon to the bank was $8,217.01, and that they had pledged the policy to secure the payment of this debt, and they consented to an immediate trial of the action without making any farther defense. Thereupon the court tried the case, and rendered a decree that the bank should recover of William Gordon $8,217.01; that the policy of insurance should be advertised and sold; that the proceeds of the sale should be applied to the payment of the debt of William Gordon to the bank; and that the defendants William Gordon and Melissa A. Gordon were "forever barred of and from having or claiming any lien upon or interest in or to" the policy after its sale. Under an execution issued upon this judgment the policy was sold by the sheriff to the German Bank for $150, and it was subsequently assigned for value by the German Bank, through several mesne conveyances, to the defendant, the Ware National Bank. Neither the Ware National Bank nor any of the assignees through whom the policy passed from the German Bank to it was a creditor of William Gordon, or had any interest in his life. The Ware National Bank claimed the proceeds of the policy as the remote assignee of the German Bank. The plaintiff, the administrator of the estate of Melissa A. Gordon, demanded these proceeds upon the ground that the assignees of the German Bank had no insurable interest in the life of Gordon, and that for this reason the assignments to them were void, and the policy remained the property of Melissa A. Gordon when she died. The court below sustained the claim of the Ware National Bank, and rendered a judgment in its favor.

Argued before Sunborn and Van Devanter, Circuit Judges, and Amidon, District Judge.

Messrs. Atwood & Hooper, for plaintiff in error:

The assignment of the policy to the German Bank was made in Kansas and therefore, since nothing appears to the contrary, should be governed by the laws of that state.

Messrs. Baker & Baker and James H. Cravens, for defendant in error:

Every wager is a bilateral affair. In a wager policy the one paying the premiums risks them in the hope of a handsome recovery by the early death of the insured. But ours was entirely a unilateral affair. All the elements of wager were wanting. Mr. Gordon was certain to die and the insurance company was bound to pay. The whole transaction amounted to an equitable assignment of a fixed fund.

There is a distinction between paid-up policies and those still demanding premiums.

Hunter v. Hamilton, 52 Kan. 195, 34 Pac. 782.

The holder paid no premiums, and cared not how long Mr. Gordon should live, because the policy was accumulating dividends at a rate that made it a good investment. The Ware bank would not have more motive to kill than any remainder-man would have to kill the holder of the antecedent estate; and remainders are not against public policy.

The beneficiary is not obliged to have insurable interest, if he or his assignor once acquired insurable interest in good faith, as part of a legitimate business transaction, and not as a wager; and even the subsequent entire extinguishment of insurable interests does not forbid the beneficiary to recover.

Sanborn, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The issue of a policy of insurance to one who has no interest as a relative, dependent, creditor, or otherwise, in the life insured, and who pays the premiums for the chance of recovering upon the policy, is against the public policy of this nation, and void, because the interest of the holder of the policy is to shorten, rather than to lengthen, the life insured, and his maintenance of the policy is of the nature of a wager. Evasions of this rule by the issue of a policy to one who has an insurable interest, and its immediate assignment, pursuant to a pre-conceived intent, to one without such an interest, who undertakes to pay the premiums for his chance of profit upon his investment, are equally ineffective, and such assignments are void. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Schaefer, 94 U. S. 457, 461, 24 L. ed. 251, 253; Cammack v. Lewis, 15 Wall. 643, 21 L. ed. 244; Warnock v. Davis, 104 U. S. 775, 782, 26 L. ed. 924, 927. A creditor has an insurable interest in the life of his debtor, and a policy on the latter's life issued to him, or issued to one who has an insurable interest in the life of the debtor and subsequently assigned to him, is valid and enforceable in his hands. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Schaefer, 94 U. S. 457, 461, 24 L. ed. 251, 253; Warnock v. Davis, 104 U. S. 775, 778, 26 L. ed. 924, 926.

Counsel for the plaintiff insist that the supreme court of the state of Kansas has determined that every assignment of an insurance policy is void unless the assignee has an insurable interest in the life protected, and that this decision is controlling in the Federal courts, because the assignments here in question were executed in the state of Kansas. But the question whether or not an insurable interest in an assignee of a policy issued to one who had such an interest is indispensable to the validity of the assignment of it is a question of general law, which it would be a dereliction of duty for a Federal court to decline to consider and determine for itself. The opinion of the court of the state in which the assignment is executed upon this question is not controlling in a national court. Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 30 L. R. A. 193, 17 C. C. A. 62, 65, 36 U. S. App. 152, 70 Fed. 201, 203; Speer v. Kearney County, 32 C. C. A. 101, 114, 60 U. S. App. 38, 88 Fed. 749, 762; Clapp v. Otoe County, 45 C. C. A. 579, 582, 104 Fed. 473, 477.

There is some conflict of authority among the courts of the states upon the question whether or not the assignment of a policy for value in good faith by one who has an insurable interest to one who has not such an interest is valid. The supreme court of Indiana, in the case of Franklin L. Ins. Co. v. Hazzard, 41 Ind. 116, 13 Am. Rep. 313, declared that such an assignment was as obnoxious to the rule against wager policies as the issue of a policy to one without interest, and that it was void. The courts of the states of Alabama, Kansas, Kentucky, Missouri, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, Texas, and Virginia have followed this declaration. Alabama Gold L. Ins. Co. v. Mobile Mut. Ins. Co. 81 Ala. 329, 1 So. 561; Helmetag v. Miller, 76 Ala. 183, 52 Am. Rep. 316; Missouri Valley L. Ins. Co. v. Sturges, 18 Kan. 93, 26 Am. Rep. 761; Missouri Valley L. Ins. Co. v. Moose, 104 Pa. 74, 40 Am. Rep. 570; Oheeves v. Anders, 87 Tex. 287, 47 Am. St. Rep. 107, 28 S. W. 274; Schonfield v. Turner, 75 Tex. 324, 7 L. R. A. 189, 12 S. W. 626; Long v. Meriden Britannia Co. 94 Va. 594, 27 S. E. 499. The reason for this view that the assignee who pays the premium practically wagers it upon the early close of the life insured has much less force where, as in the case at bar, the premiums have been paid before the assignment is made. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Schaefer, 94 U. S. 457, 462, 24 L. ed. 251, 254; Bursinger v. Bank of Watertown, 67 Wis. 75, 83, 58 Am. Rep. 848, 30 N. W. 290. The rule adopted by these states greatly detracts from the value of life insurance policies, and restricts their commercial value; for, if their possible purchasers are limited to those who have insurable interests in the lives they insure, it is obvious that buyers will be few, and their commercial value and the traffic in them must be much less than if all men may become their lawful purchasers. In view of this fact the Supreme Court of the United States and the courts of the great commercial communities of this country—of New York, Ohio, Massachusetts, Illinois, Michigan, New Jersey, California, Minnesota, Connecticut, Louisiana, Rhode Island, Wisconsin, Nebraska, Tennessee, South Carolina, Mississippi, and Maryland—have repudiated the old declaration of the supreme court of Indiana, and have adopted the more modern and rational rule that "any person has a right to procure an insurance on his own life, and to assign it to another, provided it be not done by way of cover for a wager policy." Ætna L. Ins. Co. v. France, 94 U. S. 561, 564, 24 L. ed. 287, 289; Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Armstrong, 117 U. S. 591, 597, 29 L. ed. 997, 999, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 877; *Chamberlain v. The provision of the bankruptcy law of 1898 that an insurance policy held by a bankrupt shall pass to his trustee as assets of his estate unless he pays to the trustee the surrender value of the policy demonstrates the fact that the national Congress deemed the rule adopted by the Supreme Court and by the courts of these states the established law of the nation. Act July 1, 1898, chap. 541. § 70, 30 Stat. at L. 565. U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3451. The courts of Indiana themselves, the courts in which the opposite rule seems to have taken its rise, have lately repudiated it, have followed the trend of the more modern decisions, have adopted the more liberal rule, and have declared that, "when the person himself in good faith makes the contract, procures the insurance on his own life, and pays the premiums, it is immaterial whether the beneficiary designated by him, or the assignee of the policy, has any insurable interest in the life of the insured or not. This doctrine is settled by this court, and is in accordance with the decided weight of authority." Milner v. Bowman, 119 Ind. 448, 454, 5 L. R. A. 95, 21 N. E. 1094. This is a great commercial nation. The policy of the nation, the business habits and acts of its citizens and the tendency of the decisions of its courts are to depart more and more from the old rule that choses in action are not assignable, to make them more and more the subjects of traffic and of commerce, and to sustain their transfers in the ordinary course of business. The stronger reasons, the decided trend of the decisions of the courts, and the great weight of authority, concur to establish the rule that an insurable interest in the assignee of a policy of life insurance is not essential to the validity of the assignment if the party to whom it was originally issued had such an interest, and the assignment is not made as a cover for the issue of a wager policy.

In the case at bar, however, there are still other reasons why the plaintiff in this action cannot recover the proceeds of the policy which lies at the basis of this controversy against the title of the Ware National Bank or of any of the immediate or remote assignees of the German Bank upon the ground that these assignees had no insurable interest in the life of Gordon. In the first place, the administrator of the estate of Melissa Gordon is conclusively estopped from enforcing any such claim by the judgment of foreclosure and sale of the pledge in the action of the German Bank against Melissa A. Gordon and William

Gordon. After all the premiums upon this policy had been paid, the Gordons pledged it to the German Bank to secure the payment of the indebtedness of William Gordon to that bank. That indebtedness has never been paid. The German Bank brought an action against Melissa A. Gordon and her husband in a court of general jurisdiction to foreclose the pledge, sell the policy, and apply the proceeds of the sale to the payment of the debt. Melissa A. Gordon and her husband appeared in that action, admitted the indebtedness and the pledge, and consented to the trial of the case. The court adjudged the amount due upon the debt, that the policy should be advertised and sold, that the proceeds of the sale should be applied to the payment of the indebtedness, and that "said defendants and each of them be and they are forever barred of and from having or claiming any lien upon or interest in or to said policies of insurance from and after such sale." On May 29, 1882, the sheriff of the county sold this policy at public vendue under an execution issued upon this judgment, pursuant to an advertisement which he had published, to the highest bidder at the sale, the German Bank; and that judgment and the sale under it stand unassailed and without modification to the present day. Now, the claim of the plaintiff is not that the sale and the assignment to the German Bank were not valid and lawful, but that the subsequent assignments were void because the immediate and remote assignees of the bank had no insurable interest in the life secured by the policy. The answer is that Melissa A. Gordon was conclusively estopped by the judgment from claiming any interest in the policy or in its proceeds, and the plaintiff, the administrator of her estate, stands in her shoes. He is estopped from presenting or litigating this question.

It is not material to this estoppel that the judgment which works it may have been erroneous; that the court may have been mistaken in the facts, may have misconceived the law, or may have disregarded the public policy of the nation when it rendered it. It is sufficient that it had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action and of the parties to it, and in this state of the case the established rule of law is that its judgment upon the merits in an action between the same parties, or between those in privity with them, upon the same claim or demand, is conclusive, whether right or wrong, not only as to every matter offered, but as to every admissible matter which might have been offered, to sustain or defeat the claim presented. Cromwell v. Sac County, 94 U. S. 351, 352, 24

L. ed. 195, 197; Lake County v. Platt, 25 C. C. A. 87, 91, 49 U. S. App. 216, 79 Fed. 567, 571. The plaintiff stands in privity with Melissa A. Gordon. He is the administrator of her estate, and has no rights which he did not possess at her death. The Ware National Bank is in privity with the German Bank, and the judgment in the case of the German Bank against Melissa A. Gordon and her husband conclusively estops the administrator of her estate from claiming any interest in or lien upon the policy, or the proceeds of the policy, which was the subject of that litigation.

In the second place, the German Bank was a creditor of Gordon, and therefore had an insurable interest in his life. The assignment by Gordon and his wife of the policy on his life to the bank as collateral security for the payment of his debt to it was a lawful pledge of the policy. One of the inherent and indispensable elements of a pledge is the right and the power to sell the subject of it to the highest bidder for cash, in order to realize the moneys to pay the debt. The restriction of this power to sell policies of life insurance to those purchasers who may have insurable interests in the lives insured thereby would greatly diminish, if it would not practically destroy, the value of such policies as security for loans or debts. They are now articles of commerce, the frequent subjects of purchase and of sale, and ready and valuable means of obtaining loans and securing obligations. The policy of the nation is to enlarge, not to restrict, commerce in choses in action. The conceded proposition that a pledge of a policy of life insurance to a creditor as security for a debt is lawful and valid carries with it the inevitable corollary that such a pledge vests in the pledgee the right and the power to sell and to assign the policy to the highest bidder to obtain money to satisfy the debt, whether that bidder has an insurable interest in the life secured by the policy or not. Our conclusion is that the lawful pledgee of a policy of life insurance has the right and the power to sell the policy to the highest bidder for the purpose of realizing money to satisfy the debt, and that the immediate and remote assignees under such a sale take good title to the policy and to its proceeds, although they may have no insurable interest in the life protected by the policy.

Because the assignments in this case were not made as covers for wager policies, but in good faith in the ordinary course of business, and no insurable interest in the assignees was essential to their validity; because the administrator of the estate of Melissa A. Gordon was conclusively estopped by the judgment in the case of the German Bank against her from claiming any interest in or lien upon the policy or its proceeds; and because the lawful pledgee of the policy had the right and the power to sell and to assign it to one who had no insurable interest in the life protected by it for the purpose of raising money to satisfy the debt it secured,—the Ware National Bank was entitled to the proceeds of the policy in controversy, and the judgment below is affirmed.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

ST. LOUIS, IRON MOUNTAIN, & SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY, App't.,

v.

Henry E. COOLIDGE.

(.....Ark.....)

1. Delay by the initial carrier in the transportation of goods at a season when weather conditions would naturally produce deterioration in their quality, which may have aided in causing the damaged condition in which they were delivered to the consignee, will render it liable for the loss, unless it shows that its delay did not produce the injury in whole or in part, although delay by a connecting carrier is also shown, which might have caused or contributed to the injury.

2. A clause inserted without consideration in a carriage contract, fixing the damage, in case of loss of the goods, at their value at the place of shipment rather than of destination, is invalid.

County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to property while in defendant's possession for transportation. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Dodge & Johnson, for appellant:

At common law the carrier could not be held for such loss as the result of nature, vice, or defect inherent in the goods carried, and in no sense the result of his own negligence.

Where goods passed over the lines of several connecting carriers, with absence of proof showing upon what line the damage occurred, the presumption is that it occurred while the goods were in the hands of the last or final carrier.

Hill, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The evidence fairly establishes these facts: On the evening of June 10, 1896, Coolidge delivered at Lexa, Arkansas, a car of potatoes, in good order, to appellant railroad, for shipment over its line to St. Louis, and thence by connecting carriers to the consignee in Chicago. The time which should have been consumed in the trip was two days, of which eight hours should be allowed the Chicago & Alton Railway, the connecting carrier at St. Louis, to deliver in Chicago. The time actually consumed was about sixty-five hours, instead of forty, from Lexa to St. Louis, and about fifteen, instead of eight, from St. Louis to Chicago, and then about a day lost in Chicago in delivery after arrival. The car while in appellant's control took a side trip from Wynne to Memphis and return, which the evidence shows contributed to the delay, although contended otherwise by the appellant. The potatoes were heated and rotten when delivered to the consignee, who lost a sale at 75 cents per bushel on account of this condition. That price was the fair market price at Chicago at the time they should have arrived. The consignee put men into the car, and saved what he could from the lot, and peddled out the salable potatoes, realizing $97 for the car load. This suit is for what they would have brought, had it not been for this damage to them. They cost at Lexa 30 cents per bushel, and were then properly packed into the car. There was no evidence of the condition of the potatoes from the time they left Lexa in good order till they reached the consignee rotten and heated. There is evidence that delay in transportation of potatoes at that season of the year causes them to heat and rot, and that the weather was very warm, and that the time consumed in the unnecessary trip from Wynne to Memphis and return would increase the likelihood of damage to the potatoes.

1. In the absence of evidence locating the damage to goods in transit over several connecting lines, a prima facie presumption arises that the last carrier is the negligent one. St. Louis, S. W. R. Co. v. Birdwell (Ark.) 82 S. W. 835; Moore v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 173 Mass. 335, 73 Am. St. Rep. 298, 53 N. When the initial carrier receives the goods in good order, the law presumes each successive carrier intermediate between the initial and last carrier receives them in good order; and this presumption working through to the last carrier, who delivers them in bad order, leaves the responsibility upon him, unless he can show as evidence that the damage occurred prior to his receiving them. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Jones, 100 Ala. 263, 14 So. 114; Savannah, F. & W. R. Co. v. Harris, 26 Fla. 148, 23 Am. St. Rep. 551, 7 So. 544; Hutchinson, Carr. § 761; 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 752. All of these authorities declare this presumption only arises in the absence of evidence, and its purpose is to cast the burden of proof upon the party having the knowledge, or means of knowledge, to ascertain the truth. The appellant invokes the presumption as a defense here. If the evidence is sufficient to show negligence in the appellant, as the initial carrier, which caused the injury, then the presumption is overcome. The difficulty in this case is in determining whether the injury was caused by the delay of the initial or the last carrier, or both. The Georgia court announced this rule in regard to perishable goods: "Unreasonable delay in forwarding fruit would be negligence, because prolonging the time within which, by the operation of natural laws, decay would be produced, and therefore such negligence would contribute to causing the damage." Forrester v. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. 92 Ga. 699, 19 S. E. 811. In a Massachusetts case where a carrier contracted to deliver apples to a connecting carrier by a fixed time, and negligently delayed delivering them, and they froze in the possession of the connecting carrier, the court said: "If the freezing had occurred on the defendant's line, it cannot be doubted that the law would regard the delay as the proximate cause of the damage. It is none the less so because it happened on a connecting line. The damage was not caused by any extraordinary event subsequently occurring, but was caused by an event which was, according to the common experience, naturally and reasonably to be expected,—a change of temperature." Fox v. Boston & M. R. Co. 148 Mass. 220, 1 L. R. A. 702, 19 N. E. 222. In the absence of a contract fixing the time for delivery to the connecting carrier, the law fixes a reasonable time; and what is a reasonable time must be determined from the length of the journey, the usual time, the weather, the nature of goods transported, etc. Hutchinson, Carr. § 329.

Under these authorities, which are consonant to reason and justice, the evidence is sufficient to hold the initial carrier was guilty of a negligent act,—the delay in transportation of this class of goods in the season when weather conditions naturally produce delay,—which caused, in whole or in part, the condition in which they reached the consignee. It is evident that the last carrier was equally or more negligent than the initial carrier, but that does not change the rule, and merely renders each or both liable, when the act of either is an efficient and proximate cause of the injury. "This rule obtains, although it is impossible to determine in what proportion each of the wrongdoers contributed to the injury, although the act alone of the party sued might have caused the entire injury, and although, if his acts had not concurred in producing the wrong, the same damages would have resulted from the act of the other." 1 Thomp. Neg. § 76. This court, in City Electric Street R. Co. v. Conery, 61 Ark. 381, 31 L. R. A. 570, 54 Am. St. Rep. 262, 33 S. W. 426, announced this rule, as stated in the syllabus: "The concurring negligence of two parties makes both liable to a third party injured thereby, if the injury would not have occurred from the negligence of one of them only." It is impossible from this evidence, and likely from any evidence, to ascertain that the injury was caused solely by one of the carriers; and, finding both guilty of an efficient and proximate cause therefor, either or both must be held, unless the party guilty of such negligence can show, and does show, that its negligence did not produce, in whole or in part, that result which follows naturally and proximately from the negligent act.

2. The appellant claims the verdict is excessive. That depends on the measure of damages. Shall it be taken to be at Chicago at the time the goods were due there, or shall it be controlled by the bill of lading, which stipulates that the value of the same at point of shipment shall determine the measure in the event of loss of the goods? Conceding, without deciding, that loss of goods includes loss in value, does the contract control? It cannot be disputed that, in the absence of this contract, the legal liability would be for the price at Chicago at the time the potatoes were due there. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Mudford, 48 Ark. 502, 3 S. W. 814; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Phelps, 46 Ark. 485; East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Johnson, 85 Ga. 497, 11 S. E. 809; Fox v. Boston & M. R. Co. 148 Mass. 220, 1 L. R. A. 702, 19 N. E. 222; Hutchinson, Carr. § 767; Ray, Negligence of Imposed Duties, p. 1036. Contracts restricting the liabilities imposed on carriers by law are only valid where fair and reasonable, and upon a consideration,—usually a reduced rate of freight in consideration of the release from given legal liabilities. Little Rock & Ft.

S. R. Co. v. Cravens, 57 Ark. 112, 18 L. R. A. 527, 38 Am. St. Rep. 230, 20 S. W. 803; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Spann, 57 Ark. 127, 20 S. W. 914. This rule is applied to contracts fixing a given value in case of loss. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Lesser, 46 Ark. 236; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Weakly, 50 Ark. 397, 7 Am. St. Rep. 104, 8 S. W. 134; Zouch v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 36 W. Va. 524, 17 L. R. A. 116, 15 S. E. 185; Ray, Negligence of Imposed Duties, § 13.

These principles and authorities control, and without a consideration this clause of the contract is void. Applying the Chicago price as the measure, deducting the $97 for the damaged goods, allowing 6 per cent interest from date of due delivery, and the verdict is a trifle less than it might be.

The judgment is affirmed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT.

Charles L. LAMB, Plff. in Err.,
v.

POWDER RIVER LIVE STOCK COMPANY.

1. The re-enactment of a statute of limitations with a shortened limitation period applicable to judgments rendered without the state applies to actions upon judgments existing at the time of its passage, where, if not made so applicable, it would operate as a repeal of all limitation periods as to existing causes of action not barred at the time of its passage.
2. A period of three months within which to bring an action upon a judgment rendered in another state, against a bona fide resident of the state establishing such period, upon a cause of action which accrued more than six years before the action upon the judgment is brought, is unreasonably short, and renders the statute providing it invalid.

(September 5, 1904.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Colorado to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to enforce a judgment which had been recovered in a state court. Reversed.

Statement by Van Devanter, Circuit Judge:

Lamb, a citizen and resident of Nebraska, commenced an action against the live stock company, a Colorado corporation, in the circuit court of the United States for the District of Colorado, on February 14, 1901, upon a judgment for the payment of money recovered by him against the company in a court of Nebraska. Defendant answered that it was a bona fide resident of Colorado; that the judgment sued upon was recovered March 4, 1895, more than three months prior to the commencement of the action, and was based upon a cause of action upon an express contract for the sale and delivery of merchandise, which accrued February 1, 1888—more than six years before the present action was commenced. The court sustained this answer under the acts of April 29, 1895, and April 6, 1899 (Colo. Sess. Laws 1895, chap. 106, p. 239; Id. 1899, chap. 113, p. 248), overruled plaintiff's demurrer thereto, and, plaintiff declining to plead further, rendered judgment for defendant. The act of April 29, 1895, is as follows:

"An Act to Limit the Time in Which Suits may be Brought upon Causes of Action Accrued or Judgments or Decrees Rendered without This State, and to Repeal Various Acts in Conflict or Inconsistent Therewith.

Be it enacted by the general assembly of the state of Colorado.

"Section 1. It shall be lawful for any person against whom an action shall be commenced in any court of this state, wherein the cause of action accrued without this state, upon a contract or agreement expressed or implied, or upon a sealed instrument in writing, or upon a judgment or decree rendered in any court without this state, more than six years before the commencement of the action in this state, to plead the same in bar of the action in this state: Provided, that if said judgment or decree rendered without this state be based upon a cause of action which had accrued more than six years prior to the commencement of the action on such judgment or decree in this state, and the said judgment or decree had been rendered without this state more than three months prior to the bringing of such action thereon in this state, it shall be lawful for any person against whom any action or such judgment or decree shall be brought, to plead the same in bar thereof; and

"Provided further, that no defendant shall be allowed to plead the fact that the cause of action on which such judgment or decree was based accrued more than six (6) years, and that such judgment or decree was rendered without this state more than three (3) months, before the commencement of said action thereon in this state, unless the defendant shall be a bona fide resident of this state.

"Sec. 2. Section 16 of chapter 60 of the General Laws of 1877, concerning limitations; also, § 1 of an act entitled 'An Act Concerning Limitations of Actions in the Courts of Justice,' approved February 14, 1879; also, § No. 2178 of the General Statutes of the state of Colorado, the same being § 16 of chapter 66, and all other acts or parts of acts in conflict with this act, be and the same are hereby repealed."

"Approved April 29, 1895."

The act of April 6, 1899, adds a third or additional proviso to the 1st section of the prior act, and is styled an amendatory act in both its title and its body.

The statutes expressly repealed by the act of 1895 had theretofore prescribed the time within which the actions named in that act could be commenced. For sixteen years the period for suing upon a judgment or decree of any kind rendered without the state had been six years. The judgment sued upon was rendered less than two months before the act of 1895 was passed, and the cause of action upon which it is based accrued more than six years before the judgment was rendered. When the action in which the judgment was recovered was brought does not appear. The present action was commenced more than three months after the act of 1895 took effect, and within six years after the judgment was rendered.

Messrs. E. E. Edmonds and J. C. Helm for defendant in error.

Van Devanter, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

No change in the statute law of Colorado was made by the act of April 6, 1899 (Sess. Laws 1899, chap. 113, p. 248). In form and in purpose it was an amendatory act conforming to the requirement of the state Constitution (art. 5, § 24) that when a law is amended it shall be re-enacted and published at full length. It re-enacted the act of April 29, 1895 (Sess. Laws 1895, chap. 106, p. 239), without other change than to add a third proviso at the end of the 1st section. For reasons not material to the present inquiry, the added proviso is void, as held by this court in Keyser v. Lowell, 54 C. C. A. 574, 117 Fed. 400. The other provisions continued in force without interruption from the time when the earlier act took effect, and are to be considered as speaking from that date, instead of from the time of their re-enactment.

Was the shortened limitation in the act of 1895 intended to apply to actions upon judgments theretofore rendered? One contention of the plaintiff in error is that it must be given a prospective operation, and that to apply it to causes of action which accrued before it became effective is to permit it to operate retrospectively. The rule that statutes are to be given a prospective, rather than a retrospective, operation, is well recognized; but, like other rules of interpretation, it is resorted to to give effect to the presumed and reasonably probable intention of the legislature, when the terms of the statute do not of themselves make the intention certain or clear, and cannot be invoked to change or defeat the intention when it is made obvious or manifest by the terms of the statute. Sohn v. Water-son, 17 Wall. 596, 21 L. ed. 737; Stephens v. Cherokee Nation, 174 U. S. 445, 477, 43 L. ed. 1041, 1052, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 722; Webster v. Cooper, 14 How. 488, 501, 14 L. ed. 510, 516. The act of 1895 contains internal and convincing evidence of the intention with which it was enacted. It is identical in its provisions with one of the statutes which it in terms repealed (Gen. Stat. 1883, § 2178), save that by two provisos it reduces, in some instances to three months, the period within which an action may be commenced upon a judgment rendered without the state upon a cause of action accruing more than six years before the commencement of the action upon the judgment. This repeal and re-enactment of all of the provisions of the existing statute by a single act, and with no other change than the addition of the two provisos, should be given the same effect that would be given to an amendatory act accomplishing the same purpose. The re-enactment neutralized the repeal, and the new act should be construed as continuing in force the prior statute with such modification as was effected by the addition of the provisos. Bear Lake & River Waterworks & Irrig. Co. v. Garland, 164 U. S. 1, 11, 41 L. ed. 327, 331, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 7; Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 134. The causes of action named in the prior statute, other than upon a judgment rendered without the state upon a cause of action accruing more than six years before the commencement within the state of an action upon the judgment, were no more affected by the act of 1895 than if it had not been enacted. The modification or change is limited to actions upon a specified class of judgments. The provisos are broad enough in their language to readily embrace every subsequent action upon a judgment of this class, no matter when rendered, and the act expressly repeals the existing statute regulating the time for commencing such actions. It is hardly conceivable that when the legislature was thus materially shortening the period of limitation it would have removed existing judgments from all limitation. Nor did the adoption of a new period of limitation in respect of future judgments require the complete abrogation of the old limitation, unless it was intended that the new one should apply to existing judgments.

Not infrequently in adopting new statutes of limitation special provision is expressly made for enforcing existing rights of action, but a provision of that character was not needed in this instance. Under the Constitution of the state (art. 5, § 19) the act of 1895, which contained no emergency clause, would not take effect for ninety days after its passage; a period which is practically the equivalent of the shortest limitation prescribed in the act. According to the decisions of many courts, a statute of limitation, the operation of which is postponed to an appointed time in the future, is effectual from the date of its enactment as public notice of its provisions and prospective operation, and, if it be not otherwise provided, operates to fix or designate the time which will elapse between its passage and its taking effect as the period within which to begin proceedings for the enforcement of such existing rights of action as will fall within the bar of the statute when it takes effect. Stine v. Bennett, 13 Minn. 153, Gil. 138; Russell v. H. C. Akeley Lumber Co. 45 Minn. 376, 48 N. W. 3; Duncan v. Cobb, 32 Minn. 460, 21 N. W. 714; Holcombe v. Tracy, 2 Minn. 241, Gil. 201; Smith v. Morrison, 22 Pick. 430; Peirce v. Tobey, 5 Met. 168; Bigelow v. Bemis, 2 Allen, 496; Korn v. Browne, 64 Pa.

55; Clay v. Iseminger, 187 Pa. 108, 41 Atl. 38, Affirmed in 185 U. S. 55, 46 L. ed. 804, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 573; Hedger v. Rennaker, 3 Met. (Ky.) 255; Lockhart v. Yeiser, 2 Bush, 231; Eaton v. Manitowoc County, 40 Wis. 668; Horbach v. Miller, 4 Neb. 31; Wrightman v. Boone County, 82 Fed. 412; Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Braithwaite, 7 N. D. 358, 372, 66 Am. St. Rep. 653, 75 N. W. 244; Osborne v. Lindstrom, 9 N. D. 1, 8, 46 L. R. A. 715, 81 Am. St. Rep. 516, 81 N. W. 72. In the opinion of other courts such a statute does not effectually charge any person with notice of its provisions, or have effect in any other way, until the time appointed for it to go into full operation. Price v. Hopkin, 13 Mich. 318; Gilbert v. Ackerman, 159 N. Y. 118, 45 L. R. A. 118, 53 N. E. 753; Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 107. The supreme court of Colorado does not seem to have spoken upon the question, and we do not deem it necessary to consider which of the opposing views is the better one, because both lead to the same ultimate conclusion in this case. If the act of 1895 was not effectual as notice to holders of existing judgments in advance of the time appointed for it to take effect, then the new period of limitation did not commence to run against proceedings to enforce such judgments prior to that time. Lewis v. Lewis, 7 How. 776, 12 L. ed. 909; Sohn v. Waterson, 17 Wall. 596, 21 L. ed. 737. Thus, one of two things resulted from that act: Either the plaintiff was charged on the day of its enactment with notice of its prospective operation, and was restricted to the ninety days which would elapse before it would take effect in commencing an action upon his judgment, or he was charged on the day the act took effect with notice of its provisions, and was restricted to a period of three months thereafter in exercising his right of action. It is plain that in point of the length of the period limited for commencing actions thereon no discrimination was made between existing and future judgments. If it was reasonable to limit the right to sue upon a future judgment to a period of three months after its rendition, it was equally reasonable to limit the right to sue upon an existing judgment to a period of ninety days or three months after the time when its holder became charged with notice of the provisions of the act, and was thereby put to his remedy. We think the shortened limitation was intended to apply to actions upon existing judgments, and that, if that limitation is valid, plaintiff's right of action was barred ninety days after the passage of the act of 1895, or three months after it took effect, depending upon when he was put to his remedy by the act.

In what has been said the validity of the shortened limitation has been assumed. It is now necessary to inquire whether or not a state may thus restrict the right to sue in her courts upon a judgment for the payment of money rendered in a court of a sister state upon a cause of action founded upon contract. It is elementary that statutes of limitation are part of the law of the forum. State statutes of that character may embrace causes of action upon contracts made or judgments rendered in other states, may prescribe a period of limitation in respect of them that is different from that prescribed in respect of similar rights of action arising within the state, and may subject existing rights of action to a limitation where none existed before, or to a shorter limitation than existed when they accrued (M'Elmoyle v. Cohen, 13 Pet. 312, 327, 10 L. ed. 177, 184; Bank of Alabama v. Dalton, 9 How. 522, 13 L. ed. 242; Terry v. Anderson, 95 U. S. 628, 633, 24 L. ed. 365, 366; Hawse v. Burgmire, 4 Colo. 313); but the power to enact such statutes is subject to the fundamental condition that a reasonable time must be given for the exercise of the right of action, whether existing or prospective, after it comes within the prospective or present operation of the statute, and before the bar becomes effective (Keyser v. Lowell, 54 C. C. A. 574, 578, 580, 117 Fed. 400, 404, 406; Jackson ex dem. Hart v. Lamphire, 3 Pet. 280, 290, 7 L. ed. 679, 683; Hawkins v. Ransdall, 4 Met. (Ky.) 292; Small v. Foley, 8 Colo. App. 435, 450, 47 Pac. 64, 70).

In the case last cited Judge Thomson, speaking for the court of appeals of Colorado, said: "The legislature may shorten the time by which actions on existing contracts will be barred, provided it does not fix the limitation so as to cut off the right of action on demands against which the former statute had not run, or does not unreasonably shorten the time within which suit may be brought on such demands. With these limitations such legislation, although retroactive, will be sustained."

Perhaps no better rule as to what is a reasonable time can be laid down than that it must be of sufficient duration to afford full opportunity for resort to the courts for the enforcement of the rights upon which the limitation is intended to operate. In the words of Mr. Justice Shiras in Wilson v. Iseninger, 185 U. S. 55, 62, 46 L. ed. 804, 807, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 573: "A statute could not bar the existing rights of claimants without affording this opportunity. If it should attempt to do so, it would not be a statute of limitations, but an unlawful attempt to extinguish rights arbitrarily, whatever might be the purport of its provisions." To the same effect is Price v. Hopkin, 13 Mich. 318, 324, where it was said by Judge Cooley: "It is of the essence of a law of limitation that it shall afford a reasonable time within which suit may be brought; . . . and a statute that fails to do this cannot possibly be sustained as a law of limitation, but would be a palpable violation of the constitutional provision that no person shall be deprived of property without due process of law."

Not only is a right of action which springs from contract property within the protection of the 14th Amendment to the national Constitution, but any state statute which denies, unreasonably restricts, or oppressively burdens, the exercise of a right of action springing from a prior contract, impairs its obligation within the prohibition of the Constitution. Art. 1, § 10. The obligation of a contract consists in the binding force of its stipulations upon those who make them, and depends upon the continued existence of a means of enforcing its stipulations; otherwise a contract would be without obligation, and would have only such effect as the parties should choose to give it. Every lawful contract gives rise to a right in one party to require performance of the stipulations of the other, and to a corresponding duty of the other to perform them. A subsequent law of a state which denies or diminishes the right of the one, or excuses or discharges the other from the performance of his duty impairs the obligation of the contract, although professing to act only upon the remedy. Sturges v. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat. 122, 197, 4 L. ed. 67 L. R. A.

A judgment of a state court cannot be enforced out of the state by execution issued within the state, nor can execution be issued thereon without the state; but this does not mean that there is no means of enforcing a judgment out of the state in which it is obtained. It can be enforced in another state by action brought in a court of that state. M'Elmoyle v. Cohen, 13 Pet. 312, 325, 10 L. ed. 177, 183. While the original cause of action is merged in the judgment, and cannot be made the basis of another action, a right of action arises upon the judgment which can be exercised in other states as a means of obtaining payment of the debt. If the judgment is obtained as a means of enforcing a contract, the subsequent proceedings in another state are equally a means of its enforcement, although their apparent and more immediate purpose is to compel satisfaction of the judgment. When the contract upon which the Nebraska judgment is founded was entered into, this right to enforce a judgment obtained in a court of one state in the courts of the several states was part of the law of the land. It was expressly recognized by the law of Colorado, which limited the time for commencing an action in the exercise of the right to a period of six years. The law establishing this right became part of the obligation of the contract in the enforcement of which the judgment sued upon was obtained. While continuing the recognition of this right, the act of 1895 shortened the period for commencing actions upon a class of judgments, including that of plaintiff, to a period of three months. Of the application of the contract clause of the Constitution to a statute of limitation Mr. Justice Swayne said, in speaking for the court in Edwards v. Kearsey, 96 U. S. 595, 603, 24 L. ed. 793, 797: "Statutes of limitation are statutes of repose. They are necessary to the welfare of society. The lapse of time constantly carries with it the means of proof. The public as well as individuals are interested in the principle upon which they proceed. They do not impair the remedy, but only require its application within the time specified. If the period limited be unreasonably short, and designed to defeat the remedy upon pre-existing contracts, which was part of their obligation, we should pronounce the statute void. Otherwise we should abdicate the performance of one of our most important duties."

The Constitution declares that "full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state" (U. S. Const. art. 4, § 1), and the act of Congress of May 26, 1790, provides that the records and judicial proceedings of each state "shall have such faith and credit given to them in every court within the United States as they have by law or usage in the courts of the state from whence . . . [they have been] taken." 1 Stat. at L. 122, chap. 11; Rev. Stat. § 905, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 677. The effect of these provisions is that in the courts of other states the judgment of a court of one state is not impeachable except for fraud or want of jurisdiction (neither of which is here suggested), is indisputable proof that it rests upon an unanswerable cause of action, is conclusive evidence that the right to its enforcement is wholly unaffected by any laches or lapse of time which preceded its rendition, and gives a right of action for its enforcement subject to limitation and other laws of the forum which regulate, but do not deny, unreasonably restrict, or oppressively burden, the exercise of that right. Keyser v. Lowell, 54 C. C. A. 574, 117 Fed. 400; Christmas v. Russell, 5 Wall. 290, 18 L. ed. 475.

Thus, from whatever point the shortened limitation in the act of 1895 is considered, the question arises whether it is reasonable. No reported decision has come under our observation which sustains a like limitation. The following cases sustain limitations of approximately the periods named. Terry v. Anderson, 95 U. S. 625, 24 L. ed. 365, nine and one-half months; Vance v. Vance, 108 U. S. 514, 27 L. ed. 808, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 854, eight and one-half months; Wheeler v. Jackson, 137 U. S. 245, 34 L. ed. 659, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 76, six months; Turner v. New York, 168 U. S. 90, 42 L. ed. 392, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 38, six months; Stine v. Bennett, 13 Minn. 153, Gil. 138, four and one-half months; Russell v. H. C. Akeley Lumber Co. 45 Minn. 376, 48 N. W. 3, six months; Bigelow v. Bemis, 2 Allen, 496, five months; Smith v. Paokard, 12 Wis. 371, eight and one-half months; Cameron v. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. 69 Miss. 78, 10 So. 554, one year; Horbach v. Miller, 4 Neb. 31, four and one-half months; Myers v. Wheelock, 60 Kan. 747, 57 Pac. 956, six months; Power v. Kitching, 10 N. D. 254, 88 Am. St. Rep. 691, 86 N. W. 737, seven months. In McGahey v. Virginia, 135 U. S. 662, 708, 34 L. ed. 304, 318, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 972, a limitation of one year was declared unreasonable, and in Berry v. Randall, 4 Met. (Ky.) 292, the same was said of a limitation of thirty days. In Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Braithwaite, 7 N. D. 358, 372, 66 Am. St. Rep. 653, 75 N. W. 244, it was doubted whether three and one-half months was a reasonable time, but thirteen months was pronounced reasonable. No useful purpose would be served by referring more particularly to the limitations which were sustained or rejected in these cases. It is sufficient to say that all of them recognize the true rule to be that a limitation is unreasonable which does not, before the bar takes effect, afford full opportunity for resort to the courts for the enforcement of the rights upon which the limitation is intended to operate, and that this opportunity must be afforded in respect of existing rights of action after they come within the present or prospective operation of the statute and in respect of prospective rights after they accrue.

It is usual in prescribing periods of limitation to adjust the time to the special nature of the rights of action to be affected, the situation of the parties, and other surrounding circumstances. A single period cannot be fixed for all cases, because what would be reasonable in one class of cases would be entirely unreasonable in another. Each limitation must, therefore, be separately judged in the light of the circumstances surrounding the class of cases to which it applies, and, if the time is reasonable in respect of the class, it will not be adjudged unreasonable merely because it is deemed to operate harshly in some particular or exceptional instance; as where the person against whose right the limitation runs is under some disability, out of the state, or unavoidably prevented from suing within the time prescribed. Vance v. Vance, 108 U. S. 514, 521, 27 L. ed. 808, 811, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 854; Bank of Alabama v. Dalton, 9 How. 522, 528, 13 L. ed. 242, 244; Amy v. Watertown, 130 U. S. 320, 32 L. ed. 953, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 537. An examination of the act of 1895, which is copied at length in the statement preceding this opinion, shows that it first prescribes a general limitation of six years upon all actions upon judgments rendered without the state, and then, by two provisos or excepting clauses, declares that, if the judgment be based upon a cause of action which accrued more than six years prior to the commencement of the action upon the judgment, and if the judgment shall have been rendered more than three months prior to the bringing of the action, the defendant, if a bona fide resident of the state, may plead these facts in bar of the action. The concurrence of three things makes the bar effective: (1) Defendant's bona fide residence in the state; (2) the lapse of six years after the accrual of the cause of action upon which the judgment is based; (3) the lapse of three months after the rendition of the judgment. The purpose and effect of this special limitation would be more easily appreciated, but not altered, if the provision had been: "No action shall be maintained against a bona fide resident of this state upon a judgment rendered without the state unless the action thereon be commenced within six years after the accrual of the cause of action upon which the judgment is based, save that in no case shall the right of action be barred until three months after the rendition of the judgment." The result would also be the same if it had been declared: "No action shall be maintained against a bona fide resident of this state upon a judgment rendered without the state unless the action be commenced within three months after the judgment is rendered, save that in no case shall the right of action be barred until after six years from the accrual of the cause of action upon which the judgment is based." A right of action does not accrue upon a judgment until it is rendered, and, of course, the right cannot be exercised until it accrues. The purpose of statutes of limitation is to compel the exercise of rights of action within a reasonable time after they accrue and before the evidence upon which their enforcement or resistance depends is lost, rendered difficult of production, or impaired by lapse of time. Nothing could be more unreasonable or more certainly violative of constitutional prohibitions than to bar rights of action because of the lapse of time prior to their accrual, when they could not have been exercised. Yet the bar of this special limitation is in all cases rested partly, and in some almost entirely, upon the lapse of time prior to the rendition of the judgment, when the right of action had not accrued. This portion of the act of 1895 is a law of limitation only as it attempts to interpose a bar because of inaction or laches in enforcing a judgment after it is obtained. It is unique in that it does not prescribe a fixed or definite time for commencing the actions to which it applies. Where the limitation begins to run more than five years and nine months after the accrual of the cause of action upon which the judgment is based, the action is barred if not brought in three months. Where the judgment is obtained upon the day when the original cause of action accrues, as it may be by confession or consent, the action upon the judgment is not barred for six years. Thus the period within which the bar becomes effective ranges all the way from three months to six years, and this is equally true of judgments existing at the time and of those subsequently rendered. At what time within these limits any particular action is barred depends upon the special facts of the case. The longest period is reasonable, and the shortest is altogether unreasonable. In these circumstances it may become a serious question whether the entire provision falls as wanting in the requisites of a law of limitation, or whether, as respects the various intermediate periods, every man must determine for himself and at his peril whether the time allowed for exercising his right of action is reasonable (Ludwig v. Stewart, 32 Mich. 27; Osborne v. Lindstrom, 9 N. D. 1, 9, 46 L. R. A. 715, 81 Am. St. Rep. 516, 81 N. W. 72), but the consideration of that question is not essential to the decision of the present case.

Our reasons for pronouncing the three-months limitation unreasonable are these: It is not founded upon any proper regard for the interests of the community or of judgment debtors, or for the nature of the actions affected, and it does not afford judgment creditors full or sufficient opportunity for recourse to the courts for the enforcement of their judgments. Before an action upon a judgment recovered in one state can be brought in a court of another state, it is necessary to ascertain that the debtor, or property of his, is there, to discover in what county or court the action must be brought, and to obtain the assistance of counsel. This is usually accomplished through letter correspondence, and that requires time. A creditor cannot be expected or required, immediately upon obtaining a judgment against his debtor, or immediately upon a change in the existing statute of limitations, to devote his entire time and attention to the enforcement of the judgment, to the exclusion of his other affairs and duties. Nor does a just regard for the interests of the debtor require it. The latter's interests will be better served if he has a reasonable opportunity to satisfy the judgment without further proceedings or expense. No presumption necessarily or immediately arises that he will not do so. There is little danger that the evidence to sustain the enforcement or resistance of a judgment will be lost, rendered difficult of production, or impaired within so brief a period as three months. A judgment does not become a stale demand within that time, and there is no laches in so short a postponement of its enforcement.

The judgment is reversed, with a direction to sustain the demurrer to the answer.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

Roy CRABTREE, by Next Friend, Appt.,
v.

John T. DAWSON.

(.....Ky.....)

1. A property owner, who, having removed from his premises an intoxicated person, strikes and injures a stranger who is attempting to enter the premises, under the belief, after exercising the highest care practicable under the circumstances to ascertain the facts, that it is the person whom he has just ejected returning, is excused from liability for the assault on the ground of self-defense and apparent necessity, if belief in the identity of the person is based on reasonable grounds, and, if, in the exercise of a reasonable judgment, he further believes that it is necessary to strike the ejected person to defend himself, and uses no more force than is, or appears to be, necessary for the purpose.

2. To excuse a person for assaulting another under the belief that he is a third person, upon whom an assault would be justified, he must exercise the highest degree of care practicable under the circumstances to ascertain whether or not the person whom he is about to strike is in fact the one whom he believes him to be.

3. One who recklessly and wantonly strikes a stranger upon the pretext of defending himself against one with whom he has had an altercation is liable for exemplary, as well as compensatory, damages.

(November 29, 1904.)

NOTE.—Mistaken identity as justification for assault.

Circumstances not unlike those in CRABTREE v. Dawson appear in Courvoisier v. Raymond, 28 Colo. 113, 47 Pac. 284. Raymond, the defendant, being awakened by rowdies who had entered his house, apparently for the purpose of burglary, expelled them and followed them to the street, where he fired several shots to frighten them away. They were joined by others, however, who threw stones and brickbats at defendant. Several special police, attracted by the shots, came up together, two stopping to arrest the men in the street, while one advanced toward the defendant. The latter, mistaking him for one of the gang of rowdies, deliberately fired upon him, inflicting the injury complained of. In the trial the jury were instructed that, "If you believe from the evidence that at the time the defendant shot the plaintiff the plaintiff was not assaulting the defendant, then your verdict should be for the plaintiff." This instruction was held erroneous, on appeal, as excluding from the jury's consideration defendant's evidence that "the circumstances surrounding him at the time of the shooting were such as to lead a reasonable man to believe that his life was in danger, or that he was in danger of receiving great bodily harm at the hands of the plaintiff."
..... If the jury believed from the evidence that the defendant would have been justified in shooting one of the rioters had such person advanced towards him as did the plaintiff, then it became important to determine whether the defendant mistook plaintiff for one of the rioters, and, if such a mistake was in fact made, was it excusable in the light of all the circumstances leading up to and surrounding the commission of the act? If these issues had been resolved by the jury in favor of the defendant he would have been entitled to a judgment."

The court does not lay down any rule as to the amount of care required of the defendant in ascertaining the identity of his apparent assailant, but leaves it to the jury whether there actually was a mistake in regard thereto, and, if there was, then whether or not it was excusable.

Paxton v. Boyer, 67 Ill. 132, 16 Am. Rep. 615, which is the only other American case, is sufficiently noted in the opinion in CRABTREE v. Dawson.

Under the earlier English law, where trespass lay for any invasion of a party's right to security of person, such an assault was actionable. Thus, it appears in James v. Campbell, 5 Car. & P. 372, that at a public dinner X. and defendant became involved in a quarrel, in the course of which "defendant struck the plaintiff and gave him two black eyes, and otherwise in-

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Daviess County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for an assault and battery. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. D. Atchison and L. P. Tanner for appellant.

Messrs. Wilfred Carico and La Vega Clements, for appellee:

If Dawson believed, or had reasonable grounds for believing, that appellant was Ollie Noble returning to assault him with bricks and to carry out his threat, then he had the right, using due care as a prudent man would under the circumstances, to strike Crabtree, and, if believing that he was striking Noble under such circumstances, he would not be held civilly or criminally for his act.

If a man does an act, criminal in its nature, but which is excusable under the criminal law, then he cannot be held civilly for such act.

Burnam, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action for assault and battery instituted by appellant, Roy Crabtree, against the appellee, John T. Dawson, grew out of the following facts: Appellee, Dawson, owns a three-story building on the corner of Main and Locust streets, in Owensboro, Kentucky. The room on the first floor is used as a business house. The second floor is divided by a partition, the room on one side being used for private entertainments. The third floor is a large hall, which was rented by appellee for dancing and public entertainments. The following diagram of the second floor will give a fair understanding of the location of the parties and place at the time of the assault:

THE RED MARK, REFERRED TO IN THE OPINION OF THE COURT, IS INDICATED BY THE DOTTED LINES.

A is Dawson at the head of the stairs when he struck Crabtree. The red mark is the stairway leading from the store to the landing of the second floor. B is a door entering the storeroom from the landing, which is about 6 feet wide, and which Dawson opened to get the musket with which he struck appellant. C is a door opening into the entertainment hall on the second floor. D, D, are two windows looking from the second floor to the third floor. E is a storeroom on the second floor, and F is the hall on the second floor. On the night on which this accident occurred, Dawson had rented the large hall in the third story to Philip Dorn and Ed Riney to give what was jured him." There was evidence that plaintiff had been mistaken for X., and defendant's attorney contended that, if his client had not intentionally struck plaintiff, the jury should find for him. But the court instructed: "If you think . . . that the defendant struck the plaintiff, the plaintiff is entitled to your verdict whether it was done intentionally or not. But the intention is material in considering the amount of the damages."

See also Lucas v. Mason, L. R. 10 Exch. 251, where at an assembly a disturbance occurred in the rear of the hall, and the speaker ordered the ushers to "bring those men to the front." 67 L. R. A.

Plaintiff, who had had no part in the disturbance, was seized and dragged forward, receiving the injuries complained of. Without discussing the ultimate question of liability for the act, it was held that the ushers were not servants of the speaker in such sense as to render him liable for their acts.

No other cases, American or English, in which the element of mistaken identity appears, have been found after exhaustive search.

Upon the general subject of intent as an element of liability in assault, see cases collected in note to Vosburg v. Putney, 14 L. R. A. 228. W. A.

known as a "pay dance" for the benefit of the young people of the city. On the same night the daughter of appellee and a number of friends were giving a social entertainment in the small hall on the second floor. While these two entertainments were in progress, one Noble, while intoxicated, gained admittance to the hall on the third floor, without having paid the customary charge for admittance. Riney, one of the lessees, approached him, and insisted that he should either pay or leave the hall. He at first refused, but finally Riney succeeded in enticing him out of the room into the hall, and then closing the door, leaving Noble on the outside. He became disorderly, thereby attracting the attention of Dawson, who approached him. Dawson's version of what took place after this is as follows: "Noble remarked that he was going back and clean out the whole thing, and I said, 'No, you won't, friend.' He replied, 'I am doing no harm.' I told him he must go downstairs. He said that he would not. I replied, 'You will,' and took hold of him. He went down. I may have shoved him a little. He stopped in front of the door of the hall on the second floor, where he tried to go in. I pushed him by, and got down to the platform on the first floor, where he sat down. He then got up and said, 'If you will come down here, I will fix it with you.' I replied, 'I don't want to bother with you.' This platform goes into my storeroom. And when I got up to the head of the steps, somebody remarked, 'He is getting some bricks.' I stepped into the door and got an old musket. Just then Crabtree came running rapidly up the steps from the store below. I believed it was Noble returning to attack me, and called out to him, 'Don't come up here;' but he paid no attention to me, and, when he got up within striking distance, supposing it was Noble, I struck him with the butt of the musket, when I discovered that I had made a mistake and hit the wrong man." It is also shown that the hall at this point was somewhat dimly lighted, and that after appellee discovered his mistake he took appellant to a drug store, had his wounds dressed by a physician, and sent him home in a carriage, and that he went the next day to express his regret at the occurrence, and offered to pay his doctor's bill, for loss of time, and for a new suit of clothes, the one worn by appellant having been greatly injured. The testimony for plaintiff is to the effect that he was only seventeen years old; that he was on his way as a guest to the dance being given in the hall on the third floor; that, whilst he heard Dawson tell Noble not to come back at the time he pushed him out of the store, he did not hear anyone call to him not to come up; that, as a result of the blow, he was knocked to the bottom of the steps, and sustained serious injuries. The jury, on these facts and the instructions given by the court, returned a verdict for the defendant, and plaintiff has appealed.

The main ground for reversal is that the court did not properly instruct the jury. As the question is a somewhat novel one, we deem it best at this point to insert the instructions in full. They are as follows:

"(1) The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the defendant on the — day of November, 1903, did wrongfully, wilfully, recklessly, or unlawfully assault, beat, bruise, or wound the plaintiff by striking him violently on the head with the butt of a heavy gun or musket, thereby inflicting a dangerous wound on his head, from the effect of which assault and wounding the plaintiff suffered physical and mental pain and anguish, and was damaged thereby, they should find for the plaintiff such a sum of money as will reasonably compensate for the physical and mental pain which he sustained as the proximate result of said assault, not exceeding the sum of $5,000.

"(2) The court further instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the assault of the defendant on the plaintiff was wilful and reckless, and the defendant did not believe, or have reasonable grounds to believe, when he made said assault that the person he was assaulting was Ollie Noble, then they may find any sum as punitive damages in favor of the plaintiff, provided, however, all damages they may find for the plaintiff do not exceed in the aggregate the sum of $5,000.

"(3) The court further instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the striking of the plaintiff by the defendant as set out in the petition was unintentional, and they further believe that it was recklessly committed by the defendant, and that the defendant did not use ordinary care and diligence, considering all the circumstances, to discover who the person was that he was about to strike before he struck, then the law is for the plaintiff, and the jury should find for the plaintiff; and, if they find for the plaintiff, the measure of their finding should be such sum as will reasonably compensate the plaintiff for the physical and mental pain which he sustained as the proximate result of said striking or assault, not exceeding the sum of all as mentioned in instruction No. 1.

that the defendant believed, and had reasonable ground to believe, that the person whom he struck was Ollie Noble, and said Noble had been on the premises of the defendant immediately before said assault, and had been ordered to leave defendant's premises, and had threatened to return and assault the defendant or his guests, and the defendant believed, and had reasonable grounds to believe, that when the plaintiff was coming up his stairway that it was Ollie Noble, and that it was necessary to strike the plaintiff in order to defend himself and his guests from the threatened attack upon him and his guests, and the defendant used due care and diligence, considering all the circumstances and facts surrounding him, and his connection with said Noble, immediately before said time, and unintentionally struck the plaintiff, mistaking the plaintiff for the said Noble, then the law is for the defendant, and the jury should so find.

"(5) The court further instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that at the time the defendant assaulted the plaintiff he had just previously thereto had a difficulty with one Noble, and he had ordered said Noble to leave the premises, and took him out of his house, and that said Noble threatened to immediately return to the defendant's house, and threatened to assault the defendant, and immediately thereafter he did see the plaintiff coming up the plaintiff's stairway on his premises, and, after exercising due care to ascertain whether or not it was Noble, did believe the plaintiff to be said Noble, and defendant was in the exercise of reasonable care for his own safety and protection of his property and guests, and in his own house, and was also reasonably careful and exercised due care to discover whether the person he was about to strike or assault was or was not, the said Noble, and they further believe that before striking the plaintiff he ordered the plaintiff to leave defendant's premises, and the plaintiff did not do so, or offer to leave, and the defendant believed at the time he struck the person he was about to strike Ollie Noble, that he was then in danger of great bodily harm or death at the hands of the said Noble, and that it was necessary to strike him in order to protect his guests, property, family, or himself, from the threatened assault, and he had used no more force than was reasonably necessary to protect himself, his guests, or his property, from said assault, then the law is for the defendant, and the jury should so find, except they believe from the evidence that the defendant used more force and violence in striking than was necessary to eject the person from his premises, if he believed it to be Ollie Noble, or more force and violence than was necessary to protect his property, his guests, his family, and himself from the threatened assault of said Ollie Noble.

"(6) The court further instructs the jury that, if they believe from the evidence that the striking of the plaintiff by the defendant was unintentional, and that the defendant was intending to strike one Ollie Noble, and that the defendant would not have struck the plaintiff, except for the plaintiff's own carelessness and negligence in coming up the stairway of the defendant, and they further believe that the plaintiff's own carelessness and negligence contributed to and brought about the damages now complained of, then the law is for the defendant, and the jury should so find.

"(7) 'Due care,' as used in the foregoing instructions, is that degree of care that a prudent man would exercise under the same or similar circumstances.

"(8) The court further instructs the jury that, if they believe from the evidence that the striking of the plaintiff by the defendant on the occasion mentioned in instruction No. 1 was wilful or reckless, or that the defendant did not exercise due care in ascertaining who he was about to strike, then the jury cannot consider mitigating circumstances, as against the actual damage that the plaintiff sustained by such striking, but can only consider the mitigating circumstances and the justification, if any, of the defendant, in so far as it affects the punitive damages sought to be recovered in this action."

Both the plaintiff and defendant excepted to all the instructions given by the court, and offered instructions covering their respective views of the law. Those offered by appellant were based upon the theory that he was, in any contingency, under the admitted facts of the case, entitled to compensatory damages for the injuries resulting from the assault and battery made upon him by the defendant. On the other hand, those offered by defendant are based upon the theory that, if he believed, and had reasonable grounds to believe, at the time he struck plaintiff, that it was Ollie Noble whom he was striking, and that it appeared to him to be necessary in order to protect himself or guests from a threatened assault at the hands of Noble, he was excusable on the grounds of apparent necessity and self-defense. From a careful examination of the decisions of this court and those of other jurisdictions, we feel warranted in asserting that no one is liable, civilly or criminally, for an unintentional consequential injury which resulted from a lawful act, where neither negligence nor folly can be imputed to him, and that the burden of proving negligence or folly, where the act is lawful, is always upon the plaintiff. In other words, that the foundation of defendant's liability in all such cases is negligence, or the failure on his part to exercise that degree of care to avoid making a mistake which an ordinarily prudent man would exercise under the same or similar circumstances. A very full discussion of this class of cases is found in Morris v. Platt, 32 Conn. 84. As this is the oldest and best-considered case on the subject to which our attention has been directed, we quote from it liberally as follows: "An accident is an event or occurrence which happens unexpectedly, from the uncontrollable operations of nature alone, and without human agency, as when a house is stricken and burned by lightning, or blown down by tempest, or an event resulting undesignedly and unexpectedly from human agency alone, or from the joint operation of both; and a classification which will embrace all the cases of any authority may easily be made. In the first class are all those which are inevitable or absolutely unavoidable, because effected or influenced by the uncontrollable operations of nature; in the second class, those which result from human agency alone, but were unavoidable under the circumstances; and in the third class, those which were avoidable, because the act was not called for by any duty or necessity, and the injury resulted from the want of that extraordinary care which the law reasonably requires of one doing such a lawful act, or because the accident was the result of actual negligence or folly, and might, with reasonable care adapted to the exigency, have been avoided. Thus, to illustrate, if A burns his own house, and thereby the house of B, he is liable to B for the injury; but if the house of A is burned by lightning, and thereby the house of B is burned, A is not liable. The accident belongs to the first class, and was strictly inevitable and absolutely unavoidable. And if A should kindle a fire in a long unused flue in his own house, which has become cracked without his knowledge, and the fire should communicate through the crack and burn his house, and thereby the house of B, the accident would be unavoidable, under the circumstances, and belong to the second class. But if A, when he kindled the fire, had reason to suspect that the flue was cracked, and did not examine it, and so was guilty of negligence, or knew that it was cracked and might endanger his house and that of B, and so was guilty of folly, he would be liable, although the act of kindling the fire was a lawful one, and he did not expect or intend that the fire should communicate." The learned writer goes on to say further: "The foundation of that liability in every case of accident, where it is the result of human agency, uninfluenced by the operations of nature, and the act is lawful, is really negligence. This is true of collisions between vessels on the water, or horses and vehicles and persons upon the land. . . . So, when a man in firing at a mark unintentionally wounds another, the injury is direct, and the form of action is trespass; but the ground of liability is negligence in doing an unnecessary and avoidable, though lawful, act without that extraordinary degree of care which the law demands in such circumstances, and which would have prevented the accident."

In Brown v. Kendall, 6 Cush. 292, which was an action of assault and battery, the defendant accidentally hit the plaintiff, a bystander, while raising a stick to strike and part two dogs which were fighting. Chief Justice Shaw, in his opinion in that case, held that the defendant was not liable, unless the act was done in the want of the exercise of due care adapted to the exigencies of the case, and therefore such want of due care became part of the plaintiff's case, and the burden of proof was on the plaintiff to establish it. In Paxton v. Boyer, 67 Ill. 132, 16 Am. Rep. 615, the action was for an assault and battery. It appeared that defendant and plaintiff's brother were in a conflict. When defendant struck plaintiff with a knife, supposing him to be the brother, plaintiff had in fact given no provocation. The jury found for the plaintiff, and assessed his damages. The court instructed for that plaintiff "that it was no defense, so far as actual damages are concerned, that the defendant had been violently assaulted by persons other than the plaintiff, or was then being assaulted by such other persons, or that he may have honestly believed he was striking . . . [the plaintiff's brother] when he struck the plaintiff, or that he may have honestly believed it was necessary for his self-defense to assault the plaintiff, if the jury find from the evidence that the plaintiff was not a party to such assault upon the defendant; such evidence of mistake of facts or good intentions on the part of the defendant can only be considered . . . by the jury as a defense against the inflict-tion by the jury of vindictive damages, and not as a defense against such actual damages as the evidence may show the plaintiff has suffered from such assault, or as naturally resulted from such assault." The instructions were disapproved of in the opinion of the supreme court, the court saying: "If a person, doing a lawful act in a lawful manner, with all due care and circumspection, happens to kill another, without any intention of doing so, he is not liable criminally. How, then, can it be said he shall be responsible in a civil case, when, in doing a lawful act with due care, and an injury happens, he shall be deemed in fault, and mulcted in damages? It is said by appellee the rule is different in civil cases; that the motive, . . . intent, or design of the wrongdoer towards the plaintiff is not the criterion as to the form of the remedy, for, when the act occasioning the injury is unlawful, the intent of the wrongdoer is immaterial; but appellant here is no wrongdoer, as the jury have said by the special verdict." The judgment in the case was reversed.

In 1 Joyce on Damages, p. 427, § 367, the author says: "Though an assault may be unintentional, yet, if it is recklessly committed, the party guilty will be liable in damages therefor, and the injured party may recover such damages as are the natural and direct result of the act of violence, including mental and physical pain and suffering. But one who, in the exercise of his rights of self-defense, inflicts an unintentional injury upon a third party, is not responsible in damages therefor, as where a person was assaulted by another, when he struck a third person, mistaking him for the assailant." Roberson's Criminal Law & Procedure, in § 542, p. 752, lays down the rule as follows: "This right of self-defense exists although the danger is not real, but apparent only. A person will not be held responsible civilly or criminally if he acts in self-defense from a real and honest conviction induced by reasonable evidence, although he may have been mistaken as to the extent of the actual danger;" citing a number of Kentucky cases in support of the text.

When we apply the principles of law announced in these decisions to the case at hand, it follows that if the defendant, at the time he struck the plaintiff, believed, and had reasonable grounds to believe, that he was Ollie Noble, and that he further believed that it was necessary, in the exercise of a reasonable judgment, to strike Noble, in order to defend himself from a threatened attack about to be made upon him by Noble, and that he used no more force than was necessary, or appeared to him to be necessary, for this purpose, then he is excused on the ground of self-defense and apparent necessity. But it was the duty of the defendant to have exercised the highest degree of care practicable under the circumstances to have ascertained whether the person whom he was about to strike was in fact the one whom he believed him to be, and from whom he apprehended danger to himself. And if he recklessly and wantonly struck plaintiff, he was entitled, in addition to compensatory damages, to exemplary damages as well.

Whilst the instructions given in the case by the trial court are based upon the proper theory, they are in several important respects technically erroneous. For instance, in the third instruction only "ordinary care and diligence" are required of the defendant in ascertaining whether the person he was about to strike was in fact the person from whom he anticipated injury. This is error. He should have been required to exercise the highest or utmost care practicable under the circumstances by which he was surrounded.

In the fourth and fifth instructions the words "due care and diligence" are used. While the word "due" is defined to be "that which is owed," or "that which one has a right to demand or claim," we think it hardly comes up to the requirements of this case.

Instruction No. 5 is also objectionable in that it specifically calls the attention of the jury in detail to the facts testified to by the defendant, and relied on to excuse his conduct. This error has been frequently pointed out and condemned by this court.

The sixth instruction is based upon the plea of contributory negligence, and is, in our opinion, out of place in this case. There is not a particle of evidence to show contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. He was at the place and doing exactly what he had the right to do. The instruction should therefore have been omitted altogether.

For reasons indicated, the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial not inconsistent with this opinion.

(.....Wyo.....)

1. In a suit to compel specific performance of a contract to convey land which, subsequently to the execution of the contract, has been conveyed by the vendor to, and paid for by, a third person, the decree should require a conveyance by the latter, and entitle him to the purchase money, and not declare his deed void, and direct payment of the purchase money to the original vendor.
2. Absence of obligation, on the part of one who has an option to purchase land, to make the purchase, will not bar his right to have the contract enforced against the vendor, when he elects to exercise the option, and tenders the purchase price.
3. A lease with the affirmative covenants of the lessee is sufficient consideration for a contract giving him a right to purchase the property during the continuance of the lease, so that the option cannot be withdrawn by the lessor during that time.
4. A clause requiring the lessee to deposit money with the lessor to secure the faithful performance by the lessee of the covenants of the lease is not a covenant, but a condition, failure to perform which will prevent the lease from taking effect, although the terms of the contract indicate a present demise, where the covenants to be secured relate to the payment of taxes, the operation and use of the property, and the delivery of a portion of the crops as rent.
5. Demand for compliance with a condition precedent to the taking effect of a lease is not necessary to put the lessee in default for failure to comply, and thereby defeat the operation of the instrument.
6. A lease which does not become operative because of failure to comply with a condition precedent does not constitute a consideration for an agreement contained in it, giving the lessee an option to purchase the property.
7. The fact that the lessee is in possession of the leased property at the time of the execution of the lease, with nothing to show that possession was delivered to him by the lessor, is not sufficient to give validity to the lease, which would otherwise be of no effect because of failure to comply with a condition precedent.

8. An agreement, without consideration, giving an option to purchase real estate, may be revoked at any time before it is accepted, and a revocation is effected by a sale and conveyance of the property to a stranger.
9. A tender made for the purpose of exercising an option to purchase real estate which has been conveyed by the vendor to a third person after the execution of the contract is properly made to the original vendor.
10. A lessee who has not entitled himself to possession under the lease because of failure to comply with a condition precedent is not entitled to damages for being evicted from and kept out of possession of the property.

ERROR to the District Court for Crook County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to compel specific performance of an alleged contract for the conveyance of real estate, and to recover damages for being evicted from and deprived of the possession of the premises. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Nichols & Adams, W.S. Metz, and Gibson Clark, for plaintiffs in error:

If the agreement, when concluded, lacks mutuality of right and obligation, no subsequent event or act of the party seeking to enforce it can obviate the objection, and render it capable of specific execution.

The court had a right to allow damages from the time of dispossession until the entering of judgment.

Cosgriff Bros. v. Miller, 10 Wyo. 190, 98 Am. St. Rep. 977, 68 Pac. 206.

Potter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

S. Henrietta Carlile-Kent sued the plaintiffs in error, Abe Frank and Grace E. McKenzie, for the specific performance of an alleged contract for the conveyance of certain lands situated in Crook county, entered into by Frank, the grantor of Mrs. McKenzie, and damages for taking and withholding possession of the premises. The allegations of the first cause of action are substantially that on April 4, 1901, Frank was the owner of the lands, and on that date entered into a written agreement with plaintiff, which is set out in hæc verba; that thereafter, and on the same day, plaintiff went into possession of the premises under the terms of the agreement, and remained in possession until July 26, 1901, when Mrs. McKenzie forcibly and wrongfully evicted her; that on September 20, 1901, plaintiff tendered the purchase price to defendant Frank, and demanded a deed, which was refused; that plaintiff has duly performed all the conditions of the agreement on her part to be performed, and brings the purchase price into court, and offers it to defendant Frank, upon his executing and delivering a conveyance according to the contract; and that on April 17, 1901, Frank wrongfully sold and conveyed the premises to the defendant McKenzie, who had full knowledge of the agreement between the plaintiff and Frank. The second cause of action is based upon the alleged wrongful eviction of plaintiff and the withholding of possession, and charges that the same occurred under the direction of the defendant Frank, and there are certain averments of special damages.

The agreement set out in the petition, and which was introduced in evidence, is in form a lease for the period of six months from April 1st, containing a clause giving the lessee, the plaintiff below, the right to purchase the premises at any time within said six months upon the payment of $5,000, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent per annum. The alleged right to specific performance is based on that clause. The plaintiff, as lessee, covenanted to pay as rental the taxes on the premises for the current year, 1901, to have the fences and buildings in good repair, and not to pasture upon a certain portion of the land, designated as "the bottom pasture," to exceed ten head of saddle and work horses and two milch cows. It was agreed that she should have full use of "back pasture" for her own stock, and that she should not have the right to turn stock upon the hay meadows, nor be allowed to pasture upon certain specified "ranches." It was also agreed that, in the event she should not purchase the premises within the time granted, one half of the hay crop and one third of the other crops raised on the land should belong to the lessor, Frank. The lease then concludes with the following provision: "It is further agreed that the party of the second part [the lessee] shall deposit with the party of the first part the sum of $500 for the faithful performance of this lease and the payment of the taxes as aforesaid." The paper is signed by both parties.

The answer not only denied the allegations of the petition as to the eviction of plaintiff, but averred that the latter had voluntarily delivered possession to the defendant McKenzie. There was some conflict of evidence on that issue, and the trial court determined it in favor of the plaintiff, expressly finding that on July 26, 1901, Mrs. McKenzie, with the consent and connivance of the defendant Frank, took possession of the premises against plaintiff's consent, and continued to withhold possession, and that plaintiff never voluntarily surrendered it. The point of conflict in the testimony was as to whether or not the plaintiff had voluntarily surrendered possession. Upon that question the finding of the trial court will be accepted, and, so far as material, the fact will be considered as established that Mrs. McKenzie took possession of the premises against plaintiff's consent. It is not denied that she continued in possession. In the view we are constrained to take of the case under the issues and proof: Frank's alleged connection with the act of Mrs. McKenzie in taking possession may not become material; but we deem it proper to say that the evidence totally failed to connect him with that act in any way, unless the fact that he had previously conveyed the land ought to be given that effect, which is at least doubtful. There is not the slightest evidence, outside the mere fact of his conveyance, that Frank either consented to or aided in the act of taking possession, or that he even knew of it until after it had occurred.

The remaining material averments of the answer are in substance and effect that the privilege given to the plaintiff to purchase the premises was without consideration, that there was lack of mutuality in the contract for the sale, and that the lease never became operative, for the reason that plaintiff (the lessee) failed to make the deposit required by the contract for her faithful performance of the lease and the payment of the taxes, which it is alleged was a condition precedent to the acquirement of any right by the plaintiff under the lease. The reply met these averments, first, by a general denial; second, by alleging that the defendant Frank never demanded that the $500 mentioned in the agreement be deposited with him; and, third, that said Frank never demanded of the plaintiff that she comply with any or all the terms of the agreement, and never notified plaintiff that she had violated any of such terms. The case was tried to the court on all the issues, and there was a separate statement of the conclusions of fact and law.

Briefly state, the conclusions of fact were as follows: That plaintiff substantially complied with the terms and conditions of the contract; that she was in possession of the premises prior to and at the time of the execution of the contract, and at the time of the execution of the deed from Frank to Mrs. McKenzie, and until July 26, 1901; that Mrs. McKenzie took her deed with full knowledge and notice of the terms and conditions of the contract set up in the petition; that plaintiff never recognized the validity of the deed to Mrs. McKenzie, but always insisted on her rights under the contract and did not voluntarily surrender possession; that with the consent and connivance of Frank Mrs. McKenzie wrongfully took possession against plaintiff's consent and continued to withhold possession; that plaintiff tendered the purchase price to Frank ($5,300) September 20, 1901, within the life of the contract, and then demanded a deed, and has kept the tender alive by bringing the money into court; that defendant Frank had failed to execute and deliver a deed to plaintiff; that plaintiff had been damaged by the wrongful entry and withholding possession in the sum of $1,000. Upon these conclusions of fact and the admissions in the pleadings, the conclusions of law were, to state them briefly, as follows: That the contract was during its term a valid one, and obligated the defendant Frank to convey the lands to plaintiff upon a substantial compliance by her with its terms; that the deed to Mrs. McKenzie ought to be set aside, and the title to the lands quieted in the plaintiff; that defendant Frank should be required to execute and deliver a deed to plaintiff; that the defendants are wrongfully detaining possession of the lands from plaintiff, and she ought to recover from defendants her damages, in the sum of $1,000. Thereupon a decree was entered in accordance with the conclusions of law.

A motion for new trial was filed and overruled, and the defendants prosecute error, assigning as error the overruling of the motion for new trial and the insufficiency of the findings to support the judgment. The motion for new trial challenged each finding of fact and conclusion of law on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to sustain it, and as contrary to law, as well as the sufficiency of the evidence to support the judgment, and also various rulings of the court on the trial in the admission and rejection of evidence. Since the submission of the cause the defendant in error died, and the cause has been revived in the names of her devisee and legal representatives.

Before discussing the questions involved upon the errors assigned, we think attention should be called to the objectionable method adopted in enforcing the alleged right of the plaintiff to a conveyance. There was no claim that Mrs. McKenzie's deed was without consideration, and there was no necessity of adjudging it void and vacating it, nor was that theoretically proper. A purchaser of real property, with notice of a prior contract to convey the same to another, takes it subject to the equitable rights of the original contractor to a completion of his bargain, and may be compelled in equity to perform the contract of his vendor; and, upon a bill filed by the original vendee against the vendor and such subsequent purchaser, the proper practice is to direct a specific performance of the contract by the subsequent purchaser, in whom resides the legal title. 2 Warvelle, Vendors, 2d ed. § 735; Waterman, Spec. Perf. § 75; 1 Tiffany, Real Prop. § 110; Pom. Spec. Perf. of Contracts, § 465. In the case of an executory contract for the sale of land, capable of specific performance, upon the principle that equity regards as done that which ought to be done, the equitable estate is considered as vested in the purchaser, unless a contrary intention appears, and the vendor is regarded as holding the legal title in trust for the benefit of the purchaser, while the latter is regarded as the trustee of the vendor for the unpaid purchase money, and anyone thereafter taking a conveyance of the land from the vendor, with notice of the contract, takes it subject to the same equity in favor of the purchaser that controlled the title in the hands of the vendor. Waterman, Spec. Perf. §§ 512 et seq.; Tiffany, Real Prop. § 110; Pom. Spec. Perf. of Contracts, § 314. If the court's conclusions as to the respective rights and obligations of the parties under and in view of the contract were correct, the decree should have directed a conveyance by Mrs. McKenzie to the plaintiff; and as everything in this record indicates that the former had paid to Frank for her deed the same amount of money named as the price to be paid by plaintiff, and had become the owner of the property, subject only to the rights of the plaintiff under her alleged contract, the purchase price on deposit in the court should have been ordered paid to her, or, to overcome any doubt on the subject, the court might have directed an inquiry to ascertain which of the two parties, Frank or Mrs. McKenzie, was equitably entitled to the money. The decree as entered not only declared Mrs. McKenzie's deed void, but directed the money paid into court by the plaintiff to be paid to Frank, who, for all that the evidence discloses, had already received the same amount substantially from Mrs. McKenzie when he conveyed to her.

The defendants tendered the issue of want of consideration and lack of mutuality in the contract sought to be specifically enforced, and the errors assigned depend largely upon the contention that the contract is not enforceable by specific performance, for the reason that it lacked both mutuality and consideration. The agreement relied on is expressed in the written contract as follows: "It is further agreed that the party of the second part shall have the right to purchase the above-described premises at any time before the expiration of said six months upon the payment of the sum of $5,000, and the interest on the same at the rate of 8 per cent during said time." The older authorities declare the doctrine that, as a prerequisite to specific performance, there must exist both mutuality of obligation and remedy, and, as a general or fundamental rule, that doctrine seems still to be maintained; but in modern equity practice it has become very much narrowed in its application by the recognition of a number of so-called exceptions, though the exceptions are so thoroughly established that it would seem more accurate to consider them as a part of, or a modification of, the doctrine itself. Where a contract is intended to bind both parties, or where it is of such form or nature that it contains mutual executory provisions,—that is to say, where both parties have bound themselves or intended to bind themselves by reciprocal obligations,—then no doubt the doctrine as to the requirement of mutuality applies: and in such a case, if for any reason one of the parties is not bound, he cannot compel performance by the other. 2 Warvelle, Vendors, 2d ed. § 739; Pom. Spec. Perf. of Contracts, § 169.

But the doctrine is not applicable to contracts unilateral in form, though bilateral in effect, such as bonds and similar obligations; for contracts of that description are constantly enforced. 2 Warvelle, Vendors, 2d ed. § 739. Nor does it apply to an optional contract for the purchase or sale of land that is founded upon a proper and sufficient consideration. Mathews Slate Co. v. New Empire Slate Co. 122 Fed. 972; Watts v. Kellar, 5 C. C. A. 394, 12 U. S. App. 274, 56 Fed. 1; Hawralty v. Warren, 18 N. J. Eq. 124, 90 Am. Dec. 613; 1 Warvelle, Vendors, §§ 125, 126; Pom. Spec. Perf. of Contracts, §§ 167–169, and notes. In Watts v. Kellar, 5 C. C. A. 394, 12 U. S. App. 274, 56 Fed. 1, the United States circuit court of appeals said: "When one holding a buyer's option makes his election to purchase, and tenders the money according to the terms of the contract, it is the duty of the seller to accept the price, and execute a deed to the purchaser for the property; and when one holding an option to sell elects to make the sale, and tenders a deed, it is the duty of the buyer to accept the deed and pay the price. Such contracts are perfectly valid, and it is now well settled that a court of equity may decree a specific performance of them." In Mathews Slate Co. v. New Empire Slate Co. 122 Fed. 972, it is said: "This court is of the opinion that, if two persons enter into a contract in writing under seal, by which the one party, in consideration of $1, the payment of which is acknowledged, agrees to sell and convey to the other party within a specified time certain lands and premises, on payment by the other party of a specified consideration, such contract is valid and binding, and ought to be and may be specifically enforced. The seller has the right to fix his price, and covenant and agree that, on receiving that price within a certain time, he will convey the premises; and if within that time the purchaser of the option tenders the money and demands the conveyance he is entitled to it. To hold otherwise is to destroy the efficacy of such contracts and agreements."

the proposition that an agreement by one party to sell and convey land to another for a stated price, if given upon a proper consideration, may be specifically enforced upon an acceptance and tender of the price within the time allowed by the contract; and it is not a valid objection in such case that prior to acceptance and tender no obligation rested upon the option holder to purchase. "And it is now well settled that an optional agreement to convey, or renew a lease, without any covenant or obligation to purchase or accept, and without any mutuality of remedy, will be enforced in equity, if it is made upon proper consideration, or forms part of a lease or other contract between the parties that may be the true consideration for it." Hawralty v. Warren, 18 N. J. Eq. 124, 90 Am. Dec. 613; 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 928; Waterman, Spec. Perf. § 200; 1 Warvelle, Vendors, §§ 125, 126; Pom. Spec. Perf. of Contracts, §§ 167–169; Guyer v. Warren, 175 Ill. 328, 51 N. E. 580; Wilcox v. Cline, 70 Mich. 517, 38 N. W. 555; Ross v. Parks, 93 Ala. 153, 11 L. R. A. 148, 30 Am. St. Rep. 47, 8 So. 368; Hall v. Center, 40 Cal. 63. Waterman, in the section cited, states that it is doubtful if such an agreement should be called an exception to the general rule as to mutuality, since it is in fact a conditional contract, and, when the condition has been made absolute by a compliance with its terms, the contract becomes mutual and capable of enforcement by either party. See also 2 Warvelle, Vendors, 2d ed. § 739. Such an agreement—that is, an optional agreement to convey, made upon proper consideration, or forming part of a lease or other contract that is in fact the consideration for it—cannot be revoked by the vendor within the period granted for the exercise of the option. Authorities supra. But a mere proposal without consideration creates no obligation, unless accepted according to its terms; and it may, therefore, be withdrawn at any time before acceptance, though, if such an offer is allowed to remain open until accepted, it will become a binding contract. When the option given upon a consideration is accepted within the time allowed, and according to its terms, the offer and acceptance constitute a contract of sale; and the same result flows from the acceptance of an offer without consideration, if accepted before the offer is withdrawn or revoked. 1 Warvelle, Vendors, §§ 125, 126. An agreement in a lease, granting the lessee the privilege of purchasing the premises within a stated period upon specified terms, is regarded as a continuing offer to sell, which may not be revoked during the period within which the agreement permits the option to be exercised. Ibid. In such case, where no other consideration is stated or shown, the lease itself, with the affirmative covenants of the lessee, is usually considered as a sufficient consideration for the agreement to sell and convey at the lessee's option.

Now, in the case at bar, the optional agreement does not recite a consideration; but it is contained in a written contract signed by the parties, and it is maintained on the part of defendants in error that the contract, being a lease of the premises, constituted a sufficient consideration for the agreement to convey, and it seems to be relied on as the sole consideration. On the other hand, it is contended that the contract never took effect or became operative as a lease, or for any other purpose, for the reason that the plaintiff neglected to perform a condition precedent to its operation, viz., the agreement to deposit $500 as security for her faithful performance of the lease and the payment of the taxes. Hence it is insisted that the paper did not amount to a lease, and could not, therefore, be regarded as a proper consideration for the optional agreement, and that the lessor, Frank, revoked the agreement by the sale and conveyance of the premises to his codefendant, Mrs. McKenzie, which fact was brought to the knowledge of the plaintiff shortly thereafter, and before any acceptance on her part of the privilege of purchase. It becomes important, therefore, to consider the character of the agreement to make the deposit, and whether the failure to do so rendered the lease ineffective. There is no dispute upon the facts as to the deposit. It was neither made nor offered at any time; but, on the contrary, the plaintiff stated, after her eviction, and when her attention was called to her neglect to comply with her agreement to secure her performance of the terms of the lease by making a deposit of $500, that she repudiated that part of the contract.

Conditions precedent are to be strictly complied with. Such a condition is one that must happen or be performed before the estate dependent upon it can arise or be enlarged, while a condition subsequent defeats the estate in case it does not happen or is not performed. In determining whether a particular provision amounts to a condition or not, the rule is that the intention of the grantor governs. Such intention is to be gathered from the whole instrument and the existing facts. The authorities lay down the principle that whether a condition is precedent or subsequent depends upon the intent of the parties, as collected from the whole contract, whatever the order in which they are found, or the manner in which they are expressed, although certain words are customary when a condition rather than a covenant is intended. But it seems that the same words may be employed to create either a covenant or a condition. The words employed in the beginning of the instrument are words of present demise. It reads: "This article of agreement, made and entered into this 4th day of April, 1901, by and between Abe Frank, party of the first part, and S. Henrietta Carlile-Kent, party of the second part, witnesseth: That the party of the first part has this day leased to the party of the second part the following described lands [description] for a term of six months from April 1, 1901, and the party of the second part agrees to pay as rental of said premises the taxes on the same for the current year 1901." Then follows the clause giving the privilege of purchase, and following that are the other agreements as to the use of the premises, and the instrument then concludes with the agreement for the deposit that is quoted in an earlier part of this opinion.

The deposit was required for a specified purpose, viz., to secure the faithful performance by plaintiff, the lessee, of the lease, and the payment of the taxes. She had agreed to keep the fences and buildings in repair, to refrain from pasturing stock upon certain designated lands, and to limit her use of the premises in other respects; and the only rental was to be the taxes for the year, and a certain portion of the crops, should she not exercise the option of purchase. Now, we know, as the parties doubtless also knew, that the taxes would not become due or payable until a very short time before the expiration of the lease. The statutes require the tax list to go into the hands of the collector by the third Monday of September, and the taxes would not become delinquent until the last day of December. Indeed, the amount of the taxes could not have been ascertained until September. Here, then, is to be perceived a substantial reason for the requirement of security in advance. A reason is also to be found in the nature of the covenants of the plaintiff respecting the use to be made of certain parts of the premises, as well as to the keeping of the improvements in repair. This would all indicate that the agreement for the security was intended as a condition, rather than a mere covenant. Moreover, as a covenant, it would have added nothing substantially to the contract. The damages that might be recovered upon its breach could not have exceeded the damages sustained by a breach of the covenants which it was intended to secure; and those damages would be as capable of recovery by assigning and proving a breach of the principal covenants. The very nature of the provision would seem to stamp it as a condition precedent. There would be little necessity for requiring security by a deposit of money after the time for performance of the lease had expired, and the lessee had enjoyed on her part all its benefits. As no time for making the deposit was stated, doubtless a reasonable time would be implied, and, had the lessee been out of possession, a tender of the security and demand for possession within a reasonable time might no doubt have entitled her to possession under the lease. But no such question arises here. It was clearly proved, and so found by the court, that she was in possession at and prior to the making of the contract. There is nothing in the evidence to show that Frank did any act toward placing her in possession; nor is the title or right under which she had been in possession disclosed, except, perhaps, it may be inferred from a circumstance to which we shall have occasion to refer.

There is no question of waiver of the condition which we are permitted to consider. The pleadings set out a full compliance with all conditions, and the judgment of the court was based upon a finding that they had been substantially complied with. The reply, indeed, alleges that Frank did not demand the deposit; but he was not required to do so. There is no showing, however, as to that averment. The evidence is silent as to whether or not such a demand was made. But, when the plaintiff was charged with failing to furnish the security, she responded by saying that she repudiated that agreement. It is not disclosed, moreover, that Frank did anything toward recognizing the possession of the plaintiff, after the making of the contract, or that he did any act in relation to the property, except to sell and convey it to Mrs. McKenzie on April 17th; and after that the record is silent concerning him until his refusal of the tender of the purchase price September 20th, except that he appears to have been present at an interview between the plaintiff and Mrs. McKenzie, and their attorneys, after plaintiff had been evicted from the premises. But we think the question of waiver is not the case now before us. The trial court made no finding in that respect, and such an issue is not presented by the pleadings.

The above facts have been adverted to for the purpose of showing that nothing appears, even by the subsequent conduct of Frank, to indicate an intention to treat the agreement for security as anything other than a condition precedent to any right of the plaintiff to the premises under the lease.

Similar provisions have, so far as we have been able to discover, been held to amount to conditions precedent. In the English case of John v. Jenkins, 1 Crompt. & M. 227, the lease there before the court contained words of present demise: "He, the said Esau Jenkins, lets this farm to David Jones," etc. But the following clause was contained in it: "David Jones is to give two sureties to answer for the rent." The court said that the provision as to sureties was very important, and showed that the instrument was never intended to operate as a lease at all events, but to operate as an agreement only, and that it was not to so operate, except security should be given for the rent by two sureties on the part of plaintiff; and, as no sureties were given, the instrument was for that reason, as well as others unnecessary to mention, held to be without effect, and the plaintiff's possession was held to have been under the terms of a previous tenancy. In that case the plaintiff was in possession as tenant under a former agreement when the one in controversy was entered into. In McGaunt v. Wilbur, 1 Cow. 257, a house was hired on October 31st for six months from the 1st day of November following, for which the hirer agreed to pay $150, $50 to be paid in advance, and the residue to be secured by a bill of sale of his furniture in the nature of a mortgage. At the time of the hiring the hirer mentioned that he would not want possession for a fortnight. On the 3d of November the owner of the house, not having received the advance payment or security, rented it to another tenant. A few days later the first party tendered the $50 and bill of sale, and demanded possession. It was held that, as the tenancy under the agreement was to commence November 1st, and the advance payment had not been made on that day, nor the security given, the owner had the right to consider the contract at an end, and let his house to any other person. To the same effect are the following cases: Andis v. Personett, 108 Ind. 202, 9 N. E. 101; Hard v. Brown, 18 Vt. 87. See also Cassidy v. Robinson, 8 B. Mon. 279; Stainton v. Brown, 6 Dana, 248; Burlington & M. River R. Co. v. Boestler, 15 Iowa, 555.

It is impossible, therefore, to construe the provision in question as anything other than a condition precedent, and hence, until performed, the instrument was only an agreement for a lease; but, not having been performed, the lease did not become effective or binding upon the owner of the premises, and cannot be regarded as constituting a consideration for the optional agreement to convey. There is nothing in the fact of plaintiff's possession to change the situation.

She was in possession at and before the signing of the contract, and there is no proof that Frank delivered possession to her. It is not perceived, therefore, upon what ground such possession can be regarded as imparting vitality to the lease. In the absence of any other showing, she would be but a mere tenant by sufferance. Rev. Stat. 1899, § 2772. The taking and keeping possession by the plaintiff, without more, was clearly not a part performance of the contract on her part. Possession is what she contracted to receive, not to give, and there is no opportunity or foundation in this case upon the record for the application of the principle that, when a party has voluntarily accepted the benefits of part performance, he may be precluded from insisting upon the performance of the residue as a condition precedent to his liability to pay for what he has received. No doubt, had the lessor put the lessee in possession, that act might have indicated an intention not to treat the agreement for security as a condition precedent; and possibly the same intention might have been gathered from affirmative acts of the lessor in recognition of the possession and an existing tenancy under the contract. But there is no evidence of such acts on Frank's part. The evidence does disclose a notice served upon the plaintiff in the early part of July by Mrs. McKenzie, which seems to recognize in a way that plaintiff was holding under the lease, but asserted that she had not complied with its terms, and that the giver of the notice reserved the right to declare the lease forfeited. But Mrs. McKenzie was not a party to the contract, and we do not understand that she could, by recognizing the lease at that time and in that manner, render it effective, so as to make the obligation to convey binding upon Frank, her vendor. There is nothing to show that the latter advised or consented to the notice, or knew of it, and hence it can hardly be deemed persuasive of an intention on his part, or of the parties to the contract, to consider the contract as a present demise, and the provision as to security as a mere covenant.

We are constrained, therefore, to hold that the finding of substantial compliance with the terms of the contract is not sustained by the evidence. No doubt the contract was valid, so far as effective, and the agreement to convey upon payment of the specified price, although without consideration, obligated Frank to make the conveyance, had there been an acceptance and tender before a revocation on his part. But as his promise was, so far as the record discloses, without consideration, it was his privilege to revoke it at any time previous to acceptance; and the sale and conveyance of the property to Mrs. McKenzie, which does not appear to have been otherwise than in good faith and for a valuable consideration, and which was brought to the knowledge of the plaintiff before any attempted acceptance of the option, amounted to a sufficient revocation. Dickinson v. Dodds, L. R. 2 Ch. Div. 463; Coleman v. Applegarth, 68 Md. 21, 6 Am. St. Rep. 417, 11 Atl. 284; Little v. Thurston, 58 Me. 86; Warren v. Richmond, 53 Ill. 52. There was no apparent attempt on the trial to show, nor is it now suggested, that the optional agreement was based upon any other consideration than the lease. There is a fact disclosed by the evidence that seems to point to the probability of an executed consideration independent of the lease. The plaintiff introduced in evidence a warranty deed of the same date as the contract in question, whereby it appears that the plaintiff conveyed the identical premises to the defendant Frank, in which the consideration is stated to be $5,000; and it is shown that plaintiff had before that date been in possession of the property. But the deed is not in any way explained, nor is there any proof that it formed a part of the transaction out of which grew the optional agreement. Had the agreement of Frank to subsequently convey the premises to plaintiff at her option been made in consideration of her conveying the property to him, and as a part of the same transaction, we are inclined to think that it would have been competent for plaintiff to have shown that fact, and that it might have rendered the optional agreement binding for the period in which the option was permitted to be exercised, notwithstanding that no right of possession was acquired under the lease because of the failure to furnish the required security. It is true that in her testimony plaintiff speaks of her right to "repurchase" the property. But there was no attempt to show that she obtained or contracted for that right at the time she executed her deed or as a part of that transaction.

Counsel for plaintiff asked her, when she was on the witness stand, to state the conversation between herself and Frank at the time she "signed this deed;" and, upon objection being interposed, counsel stated that the proof was offered particularly in support of the second cause of action, to show that Frank did not intend to comply with his agreement, and to show malice and wrongful acts on the part of both defendants. The objection was sustained, and the proof offered excluded. The deed and the conversation at the time, therefore, do not seem to have been offered as proof of consideration for the optional agreement; and, as the deed and contract were not connected by the evidence, we are not at liberty to supply the omission by inference, if, indeed, there was any omission. It is not our privilege to assume that they were related. It may be that the agreement sought to be enforced was an afterthought, and entered into after the transaction resulting in the conveyance of the property to Frank had been entirely closed. There is nothing in the findings of the trial court to indicate that any reliance was placed upon the deed.

It follows, from our conclusions as to the contract relied on under the pleadings and evidence, that the district court erroneously found it to be obligatory upon the vendor, Frank, during its term, and to be binding upon him to convey the property upon the tender by plaintiff of the purchase price in September, when the tender was made. As the cause must be remanded for new trial, it will be proper for us to say that we do not coincide with the contention of counsel for plaintiffs in error that the tender was made to the wrong party, assuming that the agreement to convey was then in force. Mrs. McKenzie was not a party to the contract. Frank's conveyance to her would not have released him from his obligations to perform the contract, had it been incapable of revocation on his part. The doctrine of specific performance of contracts for the sale and purchase of land is said to mainly depend upon the principle of the transmission by the contract of an equitable estate, and the impressing of a trust upon the legal estate for the benefit of the vendee; and a subsequent purchaser from the vendor, with notice of the previous contract, stands in equity in the place of his vendor, and is as much a trustee as he was; and therefore he may be compelled to specifically perform his vendor's contract by conveying the legal title to the first purchaser. Waterman, Spec. Perf. § 512. The object of the tender was to exercise the claimed option within the time limited, and to show an acceptance of the option according to its terms; and, under the circumstances of this case, had the option been a subsisting one, we are of the opinion that the tender was properly made to Frank, who had entered into the covenant to convey; and thereupon both

Frank and his grantee, Mrs. McKenzie, would have become bound to make the conveyance. Sizer v. Clark, 116 Wis. 534, 93 N. W. 539.

It further follows that the court erroneously awarded the plaintiff damages for the withholding of possession from her from the time of her eviction up to the date of the decree. Not having performed the condition precedent to her right of possession under the lease, she could not lawfully retain it. Even had there been shown an independent consideration for the agreement to convey, she would not have been entitled to possession, in consequence, merely, of such an option, in the absence of an express stipulation to that effect, until, at least, she had made the tender and demanded a deed. 2 Warvelle, Vendors, 2d ed. §§ 891, 958. It is evident that the damages were awarded upon the second cause of action on the theory that both defendants had wrongfully and maliciously dispossessed the plaintiff and used and occupied the premises. Upon that theory, as already indicated, we think it doubtful if there was a sufficient showing to hold Frank accountable for the acts of his codefendant. But, as the case must go back upon other grounds, it is not necessary to express a decided opinion upon that question; and for obvious reasons it is not necessary to consider whether, had the optional contract been shown to be binding and incapable of revocation by the vendor during its term, Frank would have been liable in damages for plaintiff's loss of possession after the tender, upon the theory that after tender she became in equity the owner, and thereafter entitled to possession or the rents and profits, and that a court of equity, in order to adjust the rights of the parties, in furtherance of justice, might, in an action for specific performance, award damages for deprivation of possession. See 2 Warvelle, Vendors, § 958; Waterman, Spec. Perf. § 519; Worrall v. Munn, 38 N. Y. 137; Cole v. Tyson, 43 N. C. (8 Ired. Eq.) 170.

For the reasons stated, the judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded for new trial.

FLORIDA SUPREME COURT.

John C. L'ENGLE, Plff. in Err.,
v.

SCOTTISH UNION & NATIONAL IN-

*1. Chapter 4173, p. 101, act approved June 2, 1893, providing for the recovery of attorneys' fees in certain actions against fire and life insurance companies, was not repealed by chapter 4677, p. 33, act approved May 31, 1899, nor is it repugnant to any provision of the Constitution of Florida or the Constitution of the United States.

2. A policy of insurance for $2,500 on two buildings contained a clause providing that "this entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, shall be void if the insured now has, or shall hereafter make or procure, any other contract of insurance, whether valid or not, on property covered in whole or in part by this policy." Attached to the policy were three indorsement slips, all same date as the policy, one fixing the insurable value of the property at $2,500, in compliance with the requirements of chapter 4677, p. 33, act approved May 31, 1899, another being the standard mortgage clause with full contribution, and the third containing a description of the property insured, with the amount of insurance written thereon, and a clause as follows: "Two thousand five hundred total concurrent insurance permitted." Held, that the clause last quoted, construed in connection with the language of the entire policy, permitted other concurrent insurance not to exceed $2,500.

3. In construing the different provisions of a contract of insurance, all must be so construed, if it can reasonably be done, as to give effect to each. Where two interpretations equally fair may be given, that which gives the greater indemnity will prevail. If one interpretation, looking to the other provisions of the contract and to its general object and scope, would lead to an absurd conclusion, such interpretation must be abandoned, and that adopted which will be more consistent with reason and probability. In all cases the policy must be liberally construed in favor of the insured, so as not to defeat, without a plain necessity, his claim to the indemnity which, in making the insurance, it was his object to secure. When the words are, without violence, susceptible of two interpretations, that which will sustain the claim of the insured and cover his loss must, in preference, be adopted.

4. If a written contract is ambiguous or obscure in its terms, so that the contractual intention of the parties cannot be understood from a mere inspection of the instrument, extrinsic evidence of the subject-matter of the contract, of the relations of the parties to each other, and of the facts and circumstances surrounding them when they entered into the contract, may be received to enable the court to make a proper interpretation of the instrument.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Duval County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to enforce payment of the amount alleged to be due on a fire-insurance policy. Reversed.

Statement by Carter, P. J.:

On July 25, 1901, plaintiff in error began an action against the defendant in error in the circuit court of Duval county to recover upon a fire-insurance policy. There was a verdict and judgment for defendant, from which this writ of error was taken by the plaintiff.

The original declaration contains three counts. The first is substantially in the form prescribed by chapter 4935, p. 67, act approved May 31, 1901. It makes no reference to other insurance upon the property. It claims attorneys' fees under chapter 4173, p. 101, act approved June 2, 1893.

The court sustained a demurrer to the second count, and, in view of the conclusions reached on other assignments of error, it is not deemed necessary to state the substance of that count, or to consider the assignment of error based upon that ruling.

The third count was for attorneys' fees under chapter 4173, supra. Upon motion the court struck out so much of the first count as claimed attorneys' fees, and sustained a demurrer to the third count.

After the ruling upon the demurrers the plaintiff amended his declaration by adding two new counts, numbered, respectively, second and third. The second count of the amended declaration alleges: That on or about January 10, 1901, plaintiff, being the owner of the property insured, applied to defendant to issue a policy of insurance for $2,500 thereon against loss or damage by fire, and directed the defendant to provide in said policy for $2,500 additional insurance upon said property. That thereafter, in compliance with such request and direction, the defendant issued and delivered to plaintiff, in consideration of $56.25 to it then paid by plaintiff, its policy of insurance, which said policy permitted $2,500 other and additional insurance, and thereby promised to insure plaintiff against loss or damage by fire to the amount of $2,500, and to make good unto plaintiff the loss or damage that might happen to an amount not exceeding $2,500 for one year from the 10th day of January, 1901, to the 10th day of January, 1902, on the two-story frame shingle-roof buildings and additions situate 231-233 West Beaver street, Jacksonville, Florida, being $1,250 specifically on each building, the loss to be paid sixty days after due notice and proofs made by the plaintiff and received by the defendant; and in said policy sundry provisions, conditions, prohibitions, and stipulations were and are contained and thereto annexed, as by a copy of said policy filed therewith and made a part of the declaration more fully appears. That at the time said policy was issued and delivered there was other and additional insurance upon the property to the amount of $1,500, of which defendant had notice at and before the time it issued and delivered its policy to the plaintiff, and said other and additional insurance to the amount of $1,500 was in force and effect at the time the property was destroyed by fire. That afterwards, on May 3, 1901, the property was totally burned and destroyed by fire, and damage and loss was thereby occasioned to plaintiff to the amount of $2,500, being $1,250 upon each of said buildings, in such manner and under such circumstances as to come within the promise and undertaking of the policy, and to render liable and oblige the defendant to pay plaintiff said sum of $2,500 on account of its policy, of which loss defendant had due notice, to wit, on or about May 10, 1901, whereupon defendant then and there denied that it was liable under and by virtue of the policy, and denied that there was anything due plaintiff on account of the policy, and refused to pay said loss, or any part thereof, for the reason that at the time said property was destroyed by fire there was other and additional insurance upon the property to the amount of $1,500. That, although all conditions had been performed and fulfilled, and all events and things existed and happened, and all periods of time had elapsed to entitle plaintiff to a performance of the contract and to the sum of $2,500, and nothing had occurred to prevent plaintiff from maintaining the action, yet the defendant had not paid or made good to the plaintiff the amount of loss and damage, or any part thereof; wherefore plaintiff claims $4,000 damages.

The third count of the amended declaration is substantially the same as the second, except in two particulars, as follows: (1) It alleges that the policy permitted "$2,500 total concurrent insurance," while the second count alleges that the policy permitted "$2,500 other and additional insurance."

Second. It alleges that long prior to the loss under the policy the plaintiff paid the defendant the premium demanded by it for the issuance of the policy, and defendant received and accepted the same, and that after such payment and receipt of the premium the defendant knew of the existence of the other and additional insurance on the property, and with such knowledge kept and retained the premium so paid, and never at any time paid or returned the same, or any part thereof, to plaintiff, or tendered or offered so to do, but still retains and keeps same; while the second count omits such allegations. Each count contains other allegations not necessary to be mentioned.

The policy was attached to and made a part of the declaration. Three riders, or indorsement slips, each signed by the agent, and purporting to be attached to the policy, appear as parts of the policy. The first indorsement slip contains the following among other provisions: "Two thousand five hundred dollars on the two-story frame shingle-roof buildings and additions, including foundations, plumbing, steam, gas, and water pipes and connections, and all permanent fixtures for heating and lighting, occupied as dwellings and situate 231-233 West Beaver street, Jacksonville, Fla., being $1,250 specifically on each building." "Two thousand five hundred dollars total concurrent insurance permitted." The second indorsement slip is a standard mortgage clause with full contribution. The third indorsement slip is as follows:

Florida indorsement slip. For policy covering two or more buildings. The insurable values of the buildings herein described are fixed at the following amounts:

Value of buildings:

Building No. 1 1250 Building No. 3.

Building No. 2 1250 Building No. 4.

Attached to policy No. 263958, Scottish Union & National Insurance Company, to comply with the act of the legislature of the state of Florida regulating the issue of policies by fire insurance companies, approved May 31, 1899.

The body of the policy contains a stipulation as follows: "This entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, shall be void if the insured now has or shall hereafter make or procure any other contract of insurance, whether valid or not, on property covered in whole or in part by this policy."

The defendant filed its pleas, making them applicable to each count as follows:

(1) The alleged policy was void, in that, without an agreement indorsed thereon or added thereto, the plaintiff, at the time said alleged policy issued, had another contract of insurance on property covered by the alleged policy.

(2) The alleged policy was void in that, without an agreement indorsed thereon or added thereto, the plaintiff at the time of the alleged loss by fire had another contract of insurance on property covered by said alleged policy.

(3) At the time said alleged policy was issued and delivered there was other and additional insurance upon said property, procured by the plaintiff, to the amount of $1,500.

(4) At the time said property was destroyed by fire there was in force and effect other and additional insurance upon said property, procured by the plaintiff, to the amount of $1,500.

(5) At the time said alleged policy was issued and delivered there was other and additional insurance upon said property, procured by the plaintiff, to the amount of $1,500, and said defendant had no notice or knowledge of said other and additional insurance.

(6) At the time said property was destroyed by fire there was in force and effect other and additional insurance upon said property, procured by the plaintiff, to the amount of $1,500, and said defendant had no notice or knowledge of said other and additional insurance until after the alleged loss by fire.

The plaintiff filed his demurrer to each of the defendant's pleas, and assigned as matters of law to be argued:

(1) The pleas do not issuably deny or 67 L. R. A.

avoid any material allegation of the amended declaration.

(2) Said pleas do not allege any facts constituting a defense to the several counts of the amended declaration.

(3) It appears by the declaration that the policy of insurance permitted other and additional insurance.

The court sustained this demurrer to the first, second, third, and fourth pleas, so far as the third count of the amended declaration was concerned, and overruled it as to each of the six pleas so far as the first and second counts of the amended declaration were concerned. Issue was thereafter joined on the pleas, and a trial had, with the result stated.

Among the rulings assigned as error are included those disposing of the motion to strike, the demurrer to the third count of the original declaration and the demurrer to the pleas, and the court does not deem it necessary to consider any other.

Messrs. E. P. Artell and E. J. L'Engle, for plaintiff in error:

The policy in question by its terms permitted other and additional insurance to the amount of $2,500.

If there is any doubt as to the proper construction of this stipulation regarding concurrent insurance the doubt should be resolved against the defendant.

Messrs. A. W. Cockrell & Son for defendant in error.

Carter, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The rulings upon the motion to strike that portion of the first count relating to attorneys' fees, and upon the demurrer to the third count of the original declaration, which also claimed attorneys' fees, are erroneous, for the reason that chapter 4173, p. 101, act approved June 2, 1893, authorizes such recovery in cases of this kind. That act was not repealed by chapter 4677, p. 33, approved May 31, 1899, nor is it repugnant to any provision of the Constitution of this state or the Constitution of the United States. This was expressly decided in Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Redding (Fla.) 37 So. 62. We do not mean to intimate that the judgment in favor of defendant would be reversed for these errors if no other was found in the record.

In determining the propriety of the ruling upon the demurrer to the pleas, it will be necessary to ascertain the meaning of the clause in the first indorsement slip attached to the policy, reading, "$2,500 total concurrent insurance permitted," as the policy was filed with the declaration and made a part of each count thereof. It is not claimed that any of the pleas should be construed as denying the execution of the policy or of the indorsement slip, except the first and second, and as to these it is contended that the allegation, "Said alleged policy was void, in that without an agreement indorsed thereon or added thereto the plaintiff . . . had another contract of insurance on property covered by said alleged policy," should be held to constitute a denial that the clause, "$2,500 total concurrent insurance permitted," was made a part of the policy by indorsement. The court is of opinion that no such effect can be given these pleas. They do not deny the execution of the policy, nor do they deny that the indorsement slip was duly executed and attached to the policy as appears from the policy itself made a part of the declaration. They proceed upon the theory that nothing in the policy can be construed as a permission for other insurance, and that no agreement relating to other insurance was indorsed on the policy other than such as appears upon its face. By the terms of the policy it was to be void, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed thereon or added thereto, if the insured then had or should thereafter make or procure any other contract of insurance, etc. The clause quoted from the indorsement slip purports to give the insurer's consent to, or permission for, insurance. It has direct reference to the provision against other insurance, and can have no reference to any other provision in the policy. It was inserted at the time the policy was written, for it appears upon the indorsement slip along with the description of the property insured, which bears the same date and the signature of the same agent as the policy itself. It purports clearly and definitely to give the insurer's consent or permission for "$2,500 total concurrent insurance." Unless other or additional concurrent insurance was intended, then the clause means nothing more than that the insured is permitted to take out and carry this particular policy, which is absurd, for no such permission was within the contemplation of the parties, or required by the terms of the policy. The use of the word "permitted," shows that the insurer intended to give its consent to something that was prohibited by the policy. As the prohibition extends only to other insurance, and not to the insurance then written, we must apply the permission to the kind of insurance prohibited, viz., other insurance, for the conclusion is irresistible that the parties so intended it. Suppose the clause had read, "Concurrent insurance permitted," can it be doubted that the permission was intended to relate to other insurance, and to authorize any amount, provided it was concurrent? Or suppose the clause had read "$1,500 total concurrent insurance permitted," would it be doubted for a moment that $1,500 additional concurrent insurance was intended to be permitted? The clause permits "concurrent" insurance. The word "concurrent" means "acting in conjunction; agreeing in the same act, or opinion; contributing to the same event or effect; co-operating, . . . existing or happening at the same time; . . . operating on the same objects." Webster's International Dict. See also East Texas F. Ins. Co. v. Blum, 76 Tex. 653, 13 67 L. R. A.

S. W. 572; Senor v. Western Millers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 181 Mo. 104, 79 S. W. 687; Washburn-Halligan Coffee Co. v. Merchants' Brick Mut. F. Ins. Co. 110 Iowa, 423, 80 Am. St. Rep. 311, 81 N. W. 707,—as to the meaning of the word as used in insurance contracts. It is very evident that none of these definitions give the word the precise meaning of "other" so that one can say that concurrent insurance necessarily means other insurance exclusively; but in every instance the word necessarily implies the existence of two or more things or conditions. Therefore the term "concurrent insurance," used in granting permission for insurance, cannot be construed as embracing the one amount covered by the one policy in which the permission is granted, but necessarily embraces another amount or another policy, though it might, under some circumstances, include the former; otherwise we have an amount or a policy concurrent with itself alone, which is an impossibility under any definition of the word. In East Texas F. Ins. Co. v. Blum, 76 Tex. 653, 13 S. W. 572, the policy contained a provision, "total concurrent insurance $4,000." The word "permitted" was not used, but the court held that an amount of other or additional insurance ($3,000), which, with the policy so indorsed, would not exceed $4,000, was thereby consented to. In Senor v. Western Millers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 18 Mo. 104, 79 S. W. 687, the policy covered $3,500 on buildings, boiler, engines, and machinery, and $1,000 on stock. It also contained a provision as follows: "$3,500 total insurance permitted, concurrent herewith, on buildings, boiler, engines, and machinery. Other insurance permitted concurrent herewith on stock." The court held that the first clause of the permit for insurance did not authorize any other insurance on buildings, boiler, engines, and machinery; but the decision was largely influenced by the last clause, which, using the words "other insurance," not found in the first clause, was thought by the court to constitute a controlling circumstance showing the intention not to use the term "concurrent herewith," in the first clause, as authorizing additional insurance. There is no such clause in the policy we are dealing with to control the interpretation of the clause we have: "Two thousand five hundred dollars total concurrent insurance permitted." That clause, construed naturally according to the obvious meaning of the language used and the purposes for which it was inserted, carries to the mind the idea that permission is granted to do something that the policy prohibits, viz., to procure insurance; but this insurance must be concurrent with that secured by the policy to which the permission is attached, and must not exceed $2,500,—that is, the total concurrent insurance which is permitted is $2,500. See Strauss v. Phenix Ins. Co. 9 Colo. App. 386, 48 Pac. 822; Palatine Ins. Co. v. Ewing, 34 C. C. A. 236, 92 Fed. 111. It may be admitted that the language is somewhat ambiguous, but, under well-settled rules for the interpretation of contracts, the conclusion we reach is correct. Thus, the different provisions of the contract must be so construed, if it can reasonably be done, as to give effect to each. Where two interpretations equally fair may be given, that which gives the greater indemnity will prevail. If one interpretation, looking to the other provisions of the contract and to its general object and scope, would lead to an absurd conclusion, such interpretation must be abandoned, and that adopted which will be more consistent with reason and probability. In all cases the policy must be liberally construed in favor of the insured, so as not to defeat without a plain necessity his claim to the indemnity, which in making the insurance it was his object to secure. When the words are without violence, susceptible of two interpretations, that which will sustain the claim of the insurer and cover his loss must, in preference, be adopted. 1 May, Ins. §§ 174, 175, and notes; Strauss v. Phenix Ins. Co. 9 Colo. App. 386, 48 Pac. 822; Palatine Ins. Co. v. Ewing, 34 C. C. A. 236, 92 Fed. 111. See also McMaster v. New York L. Ins. Co. 183 U. S. 25, 46 L. ed. 64, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 10; Hagan v. Scottish Union & Nat. Ins. Co. 186 U. S. 423, 46 L. ed. 1229, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 862; First Nat. Bank v. Savannah, F. & W. R. Co. 36 Fla. 183, 18 So. 345. It is insisted that this interpretation loses sight of the fact that by the third indorsement slip attached to the policy the insurable value of the property was fixed at $2,500, being $1,250 on each building, and that it cannot be presumed the insurer intended to permit the insured to carry other insurance equal in amount, its policy being for the full insurable value as fixed in the policy. This slip was attached in obedience to the requirements of chapter 4677, p. 33, act approved May 31, 1899. This statute requires the insurer to cause the building insured to be examined by its agent, and full description thereof to be made, and the insurable value thereof to be fixed by him and written in the policy. It estops the insurer from denying that at the time of insuring the property was worth the amount of the insurable value as fixed by the agent. It fixes the measure of damages in case of total loss at the amount upon which the insured paid a premium, and in case of partial loss at such part of the amount upon which premiums are paid as the damage sustained is part of the insurable value of the building as fixed by the agent. The court fails to see that the third indorsement slip has any controlling effect in the interpretation of the one relating to permission for concurrent insurance. The insurable value is required to be fixed, not for the purposes of permitting other insurance, but for the purpose of arriving at the measure of damages in case of loss. The insurer is not permitted to deny that the property was worth the amount fixed as the insurable value, but the statute does not deprive either party of the privilege of showing that it was worth more, if such fact should become material. The insurable value is fixed with reference to the particular policy in which it is written, and not with reference to all other insurance that may be permitted upon the property. The matter of other insurance rests in contract. The law does not forbid it by rendering the policies void, even if the total insurance exceeds the value of the property. In such a case a moral hazard would result, and the insurer might be put to inconvenience in making settlement in case of loss if the insurance was not concurrent; but, in the absence of contract provisions to that effect, the policy would not be void, though the measure of damage might be different. So that the prohibition against other insurance does not come from the statute requiring the insurable value to be fixed, but results from contract provisions. These provisions render the policy void, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed thereon or added thereto, if other insurance exists. The clause permitting "$2,500 total concurrent insurance" is an agreement indorsed on or added to the policy, having direct reference to and modifying the provision against other insurance; and there is nothing in the insurable value clause which can be construed as annulling or modifying the permission given by the first indorsement slip.

In view of the interpretation placed upon the clause permitting insurance, it is evident that the pleas set up no defense to either count, for neither plea alleges that other insurance in excess of the limit permitted, viz., $2,500, existed upon the property. The fact that the company did not know of the existence of the other insurance is not material, as the permission to carry it is general, and the insured was not required by the policy to give the insurer any notice in regard thereto further than to obtain permission to carry other insurance.

We have thus far considered the question of interpretation from a consideration of the language of the policy alone, without the aid of extraneous circumstances. The second count alleges that the plaintiff "applied to the defendant to issue a policy of insurance for $2,500 on said property against loss or damage by fire, and directed said defendant to provide in said policy for $2,500 additional insurance upon said property. And thereafter, in compliance with said request and direction, the said defendant did issue and deliver to the plaintiff, in consideration of the sum of $56.25 to it then paid by the plaintiff, its policy of insurance, which said policy permitted $2,500 other and additional insurance." The third count contains the same allegations, except that it alleges that the policy issued "permitted $2,500 total concurrent insurance." The pleas do not deny that the plaintiff directed the defendant to provide in its policy for $2,500 additional insurance. And, if the clause we have been considering was inserted in response to such a direction, can it be doubted that the proper construction of the clause authorizes $2,500 additional or other concurrent insurance? In 9 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 772, it is said that, "if a written contract is ambiguous or obscure in its terms, so that the contractual intention of the parties cannot be understood from a mere inspection of the instrument, extrinsic evidence of the subject-matter of the contract, of the relations of the parties to each other, and of the facts and circumstances surrounding them when they entered into the contract may be received to enable the court to make a proper interpretation of the instrument." This rule has been approved in this state. Solary v. Webster, 35 Fla. 363, 17 So. 646; Robinson v. Hyer, 35 Fla. 544, 17 So. 745. See also the authorities cited in Robinson v. Barnett, 18 Fla. 602, 43 Am. Rep. 327. The same principle has also been applied to contracts of insurance. Reed v. Merchants' Mut. Ins. Co. 95 U. S. 23, 24 L. ed. 348; Butterworth v. Western Assur. Co. 132 Mass. 489.

From the views announced, it results that the judgment must be reversed, and a new trial granted.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the Circuit Court to deny the motion to strike, overrule the demurrer to the third count of the original declaration, and to sustain plaintiff's demurrer to defendant's pleas, and for such further proceedings as may be agreeable to law and conformable to the views announced in this opinion.

Hoeker, J., dissenting:

I am in the embarrassing position of being obliged by a conviction of duty to dissent from the reasoning and conclusions of the court as to the sufficiency of the defense to the declaration set up by the pleas of the defendant in error.

The general rules for the construction of insurance contracts are like those which apply to other contracts. Forfeitures are generally obnoxious, and any contract—insurance included—should be construed to avoid a forfeiture if it can be done without violence to the rules of law or the accepted meaning of words and figures. I do not contest the propriety of the rule that when there is ambiguity in the language of an insurance contract—that is, where words are used which have two or more meanings—the meaning should be preferred which leans to the side of the insured. But it seems to me that a practical application of the principles of construction to the case at bar, especially as they are applied in the cases cited in the majority opinion, lead to a conclusion the reverse of that of the majority opinion.

In the case of Senor v. Western Millers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 181 Mo. 104, 79 S. W. 687, there was an insurance policy for $4,500 to Senor, of which $1,200 was on buildings, $1,600 on machinery, etc., in mill building, $700 on steam boilers, engines, etc., in boiler and engine house, $1,000 on grain, etc., which was in said building, and, lastly, "$3,500 total insurance permitted concurrent herewith on buildings, boiler, engines, and machinery. Other insurance permitted concurrent herewith on stock." The policy contained a provision that "this entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, shall be void if the insured now has or shall hereafter make or procure any other contract of insurance, whether valid or not, on property covered in whole or in part by this policy." Senor obtained from another company a second policy for $2,000; $500 applicable to the frame flour-mill building, including, etc., covered by the policy of the defendant, the Western Millers' Mutual Fire Insurance Company. It was contended by Senor and denied by the defendant (Western Millers' Mutual Fire Insurance Company) that the $500 additional insurance was warranted by the policy. The court, on this phase of the case, held the defendant company's contention was sound. The court, among other things, says: "We are unable to reach the conclusion that it was intended by the term 'concurrent herewith' to authorize additional insurance. The terms employed in the concluding part of the provision, 'other insurance permitted concurrent herewith on stock,' clearly excludes the idea that such meaning was to be attributed to the first clause of the provision. While the provision, '$3,500 total insurance permitted concurrent herewith on buildings, boiler, engines, and machinery,' is not most happily expressed, and is deservedly subject to criticism, and furnishes the able and ingenious counsel (which he is fully warranted in entering) a great field for a play upon terms, if this provision is to be construed as contended for by respondent, it would be necessary to change the term 'total,' and add in its stead the word 'additional.' 'Total insurance,' as used, contemplates the entire insurance upon the property. 'Concurrent herewith' relates to the terms 'total insurance,' in other words, it means that the total insurance must all concur with this,—that is, this policy provides the subjects upon which there must be a concurrence. This policy designates the property upon which the insurance operates, and the time of its operation, and there must be a concurrence of the total insurance in harmony with the time and property as fixed by the policy in suit. [Italics ours.] Let us transpose the first clause of the provision thus,—'$3,500 total insurance permitted on the buildings,' etc. In that form it is apparent that the limitation embraces the entire insurance. Does the adding of the words 'concurrent herewith' convey the meaning that $3,500 additional insurance is permissible? We think not. It simply means that there must be a concurrence of the total insurance upon the subjects provided in the policy before us,—that is, the total insurance must operate at the same time and upon the same property as is fixed by the policy upon which this suit is brought." The court then says that "the conclusion reached upon this proposition is emphasized [not that it was a controlling circumstance, or that the conclusion was largely influenced thereby] by the concluding clause of the provision. It will be observed in that clause where it is apparent that the parties intended to provide for additional insurance that such terms were used as clearly expressed such intent. It was there expressly stated, 'other insurance permitted concurrent herewith on stock.'" It is apparent from this whole quotation, if the court were satisfied the last clause alone was a controlling circumstance, and clearly excluded the idea that concurrent insurance could not mean additional insurance in the first clause, that the whole reasoning of the court subsequent to the two first quoted sentences was futile and useless, and a mere waste of words. The statements of the first two quoted sentences would have settled the matter. But as the court did not rest its views there, but reasoned out its views upon the first clause, we, in fairness of criticism, are constrained to say, with it, that its views thus reasoned out were (in its own language) emphasized—not "largely influenced" or "controlled" in any way—by the concluding clause of the provision. The court does not indicate that there was any infirmity or weakness in its deductions made upon the language of the first clause, which it was necessary to buttress by calling in the aid of the second clause. The deductions made from the language of the first clause were simply emphasized by the deductions made from the language of both clauses taken together.

Thus viewed, this decision, so far from sustaining the majority opinion, overthrows it; for in this case the total insurance of Senor on the mills, machinery, and steam boilers, etc., in boiler and engine house was $3,500, and $3,500 was the total insurance permitted "concurrent herewith." Afterwards, without proper indorsement of consent on the policy, Senor obtained $500 additional insurance on a part of the same property. The court held that this act of Senor made the policy void as to him. If the case of East Texas F. Ins. Co. v. Blum, 76 Tex. 653, 13 S. W. 572, has any bearing on the case at bar, it is rather against, than in support of, the majority opinion. In that case, at the time of the issuing of the policy sued on for $1,000, there was $3,000 insurance on the property. The policy sued on contained the following and other provisions: "Total concurrent insurance, $4,000." "This policy shall become void unless consent in writing is indorsed by the company thereon in each of the following instances, viz.: Section 1. . . . Sec. 2. If the assured have or shall hereafter obtain any other policy or agreement for insurance, whether valid or not, on the property above mentioned, or any part thereof." Says the court: "Additional insurance was obtained without the consent of the company, and, in accordance with its terms, the policy became void unless the insertion in the policy of the words 'total concurrent insurance . . . ' gave to the assured the right to procure other insurance without further consent of the company." It was contended by the insured that the policy entitled him to take out $5,000 insurance without consent of the insurance company,—construing the contract as authorizing him to take out

$4,000 insurance in addition to his $1,000 in the policy sued on without the consent of the company. The court, in effect, held that the phrase, "total concurrent insurance $4,000," was a limitation on the total amount of insurance, without further consent, and that taking out other insurance without consent made the policy void, and consequently that "total concurrent insurance $4,000" did not mean "total additional insurance $4,000." In the case at bar the result of the reasoning of the majority opinion makes the word "concurrent" equivalent to the word "additional." The quoted case does not, in my judgment, authorize such a construction. In the case of Washburn-Halligan Coffee Co. v. Merchants' Brick Mut. F. Ins. Co. 110 Iowa, 423, 80 Am. St. Rep. 311, 81 N. W. 707, the only question relevant in any sense to the case at bar was whether the phrase "other concurrent insurance permitted" required later policies to exactly concur in covering all the insured property for all of the period of time of insurance. The court held that it should not be so construed. I have failed to find in any case cited in the majority opinion, or in any dictionary, or in any other authority, the adjective "concurrent" defined as equivalent to or synonymous with the adjective "additional." It is stated that, "when words are, without violence, susceptible of two interpretations, that which will sustain the claim of the insurer and cover his loss must be preferred." To this proposition I entirely agree. But is no violence done to the usual meaning of language by making the word "concurrent" the equivalent of the word "additional?" I can discover no escape from an affirmative answer to this question. It is argued that the mere fact that the clause, "$2,500 total concurrent insurance permitted," was attached to the policy, shows clearly an intent to permit other insurance than that provided for by the policy, or otherwise its presence is an absurdity. It is possible that the clause shows some sort of intent to permit other insurance. Its infirmity is that it does not show enough.

In the case of Philadelphia Underwriters' Ins. Co. v. Bigelow (Fla.) 37 So. 210, the concurrent insurance clause is as follows: "$—— total concurrent insurance permitted." The daily report of the agent showed this clause, and also: "Additional insurance $——. Are the policies concurrent? Yes." The argument that these 67 L. R. A.

indorsements were absurd and useless unless they were construed to show that other insurance was thereby intended to be permitted was made, but was not thought to be constraining; and this court held that they did not, of themselves, show a purpose to allow other insurance. I see no practical difference between that case and the one at the bar. It is true that in the former case there was no sum of money placed after the dollar mark. In this case there is $2,500. But this amount is too small by $1,500 to cover any insurance except that in the policy to which it is attached. If A should go into the business of keeping a ferry over a sheet or stream of water 4,000 feet wide, and should order 4,000 feet of wire from his hardware merchant, and the merchant should send him 2,500 feet of wire, how much better off would A be, so far as the operation of his ferry was concerned, than if the merchant had sent him no wire at all? I am not able to discover. And so $2,500 cannot, by any violence of construction, be made the equivalent of $4,000. What the plaintiff in error needs to meet the allegations of his declaration is a policy permitting $4,000 concurrent insurance, or $1,500 in addition to the amount of his policy. This he has not. If, from fraud or mistake, the policy does not state the true contract between the parties, then the plaintiff's remedy was in equity, and not at law. 4 Joyce, Ins. §§ 3510, 3511; Taylor v. Glens Falls Ins. Co. 44 Fla. 273, 32 So. 887. It is emphasized that, if the terms of a policy are capable of two or more interpretations equally reasonable, it is proper to adopt that construction which is most favorable to the insured. But my judgment is that this rule will not authorize a court to construe $2,500 as the equivalent of $4,000 or $5,000, for the simple reason that figures and numbers do not symbolize different and contradictory notions or ideas. Believing, as I do, that these views are sustained by the cases of Senor v. Western Millers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 181 Mo. 104, 79 S. W. 687, and Philadelphia Underwriters' Ins. Co. v. Bigelow (Fla.) 37 So. 210, by the rules of construction and by reason, I think the demurrer to the pleas should not have been sustained.

Peter H. DAHL et al., Respts.

(88 Minn. 506.)

*In an action by a judgment creditor to set aside as fraudulent a conveyance of property made prior to the entry of the judgment.—Held:

1. It is necessary to prove that the claim upon which the judgment is based existed prior to the time of the conveyance, but the judgment itself does not prove such fact. It is not required to establish the fact that the claim was lawful. In such action the grantee is estopped from setting up any defenses which might have been interposed by his grantor in the original action. Such judgments cannot be impeached in collateral proceedings, except for fraud.

2. A trustee in bankruptcy is entitled to maintain such action to set aside the fraudulent conveyance where the estate of the judgment debtor is in the bankrupt court, and the claim has been filed.

I. Introductory.

This note is not concerned with the question whether a judgment in his favor is necessary to entitle a creditor to bring his bill to set aside a fraudulent conveyance of his debtor,—that being a matter of statute in most cases; or whether, if a judgment be necessary, an execution upon it must have been returned nulla bona, and the plaintiff's remedy at law must have been exhausted. It is limited to the discussion of what grounds of attack upon the judgment will avail the grantee defendant, whose attack must necessarily be collateral: there being, in the first place, no question that a judgment rendered without jurisdiction or collusively may be attacked either directly or collaterally. See, upon this point, Thornly v. Prentice, 121 Iowa, 89, 100 Am. St. Rep. 317, 96 N. W. 728.

II. The judgment considered as evidence.

a. As prima facie evidence of the debt.

In an action based upon a judgment debt, or upon the position of the plaintiff as a creditor, the judgment for the debt is naturally admissible as evidence. It remains to be seen of what facts it is evidence, and to what extent it is decisive.

In an action against both grantor and grantee to set aside a conveyance as fraudulent, the plaintiff's judgment against the grantor is, as against the grantor, conclusive evidence of the indebtedness at the time of the commencement of the suit, and is, as against the grantee, prima facie evidence of the same fact, being made conclusive by proof of the facts in the first action; and an admission in the vendee's answer of such facts is sufficient proof of them. New York & H. R. Co. v. Kyle, 5 Bosw. 587.

So in an action of trover against a deputy sheriff who defended upon the ground that the sale under which the plaintiff claimed was fraudulent as to the vendor's creditors, by one of whom the property had been attached, the judgment obtained in the attaching plaintiff's favor was pertinent evidence to prove that he was a creditor of the vendor, and the plaintiff's objection that as to him the judgment was res inter alios acta was not sound, since it would apply with equal force to any other evidence of transactions between the judgment debtor, the vendor, and the judgment creditor, and so it

APPPEAL by plaintiff, trustee in bankruptcy of Peter H. Dahl, from a judgment of the District Court for Brown County refusing to set aside a transfer of real estate which was alleged to be in fraud of creditors. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. W. Schmitt, with Messrs. H. L. Schmitt and Joseph A. Eckstein, for appellant:

Hahl's judgment against Peter H. Dahl is, in this action, conclusive against him and the whole world, as to the amount and validity of the debt on which it was recovered and it cannot be collaterally attacked by the defendant, Amelia Dahl, except for fraud, collusion, or want of jurisdiction in procuring it.

would be impossible to prove the debt; but, from the necessity of the case, each party must prove his transactions with the vendor in order to establish his right to contest the title of the other party. Goodnow v. Smith, 97 Mass. 69.

On a writ of entry for land on which the demandant's execution had been extended, an instruction was correct that the note in favor of the demandant and the judgment entered upon it were prima facie evidence of the grantor's debt, and were sufficient to entitle the demandant to show the defendant's deed to be fraudulent, unless the latter could prove that the note was not due or had been paid, and that the judgment was collusive or fraudulent. Reed v. Davis, 5 Pick. 388. In accord is Vogt v. Ticknor, 48 N. H. 242.

So the judgment roll was properly admitted to prove the debt and the exhaustion of legal remedies. Baxter v. Heberd, 5 N. Y. S. R. 854.

In an action to set aside as fraudulent a general assignment for the benefit of creditors the judgment roll on which a creditor's action is brought is binding upon the assignor defendants so far as it adjudicates that they are debtors of the plaintiff, but, as against the assignee and the creditors that he represents, it is not evidence as to any other facts in it. St. Nicholas Bank v. DeRivera, 3 N. Y. Supp. 666.

Where a mortgagee of chattels sued a sheriff for levying on them as the property of the mortgagor, and the defendant, alleging fraud against creditors in the execution of the mortgage, justified the seizure of the property under the judgment and execution, and plaintiff denied that the judgment alone was sufficient evidence as against him of the mortgagor's indebtedness to the judgment creditor, it was held that the rule was well settled that a judgment, in personam, at least, of a court of competent jurisdiction may be offered in evidence in a subsequent suit as evidence of its own existence, and of its legal effect; to prove which it is admissible for and against strangers, as well as for and against parties and privies. Pabst Brewing Co. v. Jensen, 68 Minn. 293, 71 N. W. 384.

In the first instance the judgment by itself is competent and sufficient and indispensable proof of the debt recovered, although it is not conclusive on the grantee from the judgment 67 L. R. A.

Ferguson v. Kumler, 11 Minn. 104, Gil. 62.

It is not sufficient for the plaintiff to allege and prove a judgment. He must, by proper allegations and proof, connect his judgment with the indebtedness on which it is founded, and show that the indebtedness antedated the fraudulent conveyance; but, having done that much, the judgment is conclusive proof of the amount and validity of his claim.

State Ins. Co. v. Prestage, 116 Iowa, 466, 90 N. W. 62; Fuller v. Nelson, 35 Minn. 213, 28 N. W. 511; Scanlan v. Murphy, 51 Minn. 536, 53 N. W. 799.

No other or different rule is promulgated in Bloom v. Moy, 43 Minn. 397, 19 Am. St. Rep. 243, 45 N. W. 715, or Hoerr v. Mei- debtor. Hafner v. Irwin, 26 N. C. (4 Ired. L.) 529.

On the question whether one is or is not a debtor, an adverse judgment is evidence, prima facie, that he is a debtor, even against strangers who claim under him property affected by the judgment. Garland v. Rives, 4 Rand. (Va.) 282, 15 Am. Dec. 756.

In Troy v. Smith, 33 Ala. 469, and Sweet v. Dean, 43 Ill. App. 650, it is held that the judgment is not evidence of the existence of the debt at the time of the commencement of the suit.

In other cases it is declared that the judgment is evidence only of its rendition and its time (Donley v. McKiernan, 62 Ala. 34); and not of the facts on which it is based (Hartman v. Welland, 36 Minn. 223, 30 N. W. 815).

In Hoerr v. Melhofer, 77 Minn. 228, 77 Am. St. Rep. 674, 79 N. W. 964 (distinguished in SCHMITT v. DAHL, merely upon the ground that the meaning of "indebtedness" was not there considered), an action being brought to set aside as fraudulent a conveyance made before the entry of the judgment, it was held that the judgment was not, at least as against the grantee, evidence of the antecedent existence of the indebtedness for which the judgment was rendered; and the plaintiff could not succeed upon evidence tending merely to show the existence of a similar debt, the amount of the indebtedness nowhere appearing.

When a sheriff, sued for chattels which he levied upon as the property of a judgment debtor, defended upon the ground that the debtor had made a fraudulent conveyance of the property without relinquishing possession, and offered in evidence the judgment on which execution was issued, it was held that a judgment entered in an action in which the service of summons is by publication, and in which property is attached as was the case here, could not be used as evidence in another proceeding not affecting the property attached; but, as the action did affect the attached property, and nothing else, the judgment was admissible. Mosgrove v. Harris, 94 Cal. 162, 29 Pac. 490.

The allowance of a claim in a probate court against the administrator of a deceased person is not more than prima facie evidence of the validity of the claim; but, as against heirs of the decedent in an action to set aside as fraudulent as against creditors grants to them by the decedent in his lifetime the allowance-

In the absence of an allegation and proof of fraud or collusion between the debtor and creditor, a judgment procured by the latter against the former (after a fraudulent conveyance of property by the debtor) upon a pre-existing debt or claim, in a court of competent jurisdiction, is conclusive evidence against the fraudulent grantee of the validity and amount of the claim, in an action by the judgment creditor or his representative to set the conveyance aside.

of the claim is not competent evidence of the claim's validity. Willett v. Malli, 85 Iowa, 675, 22 N. W. 922. The court distinguished Strong v. Lawrence, 58 Iowa, 55, 12 N. W. 74, infra, III. c. 7, deciding that a judgment rendered against a fraudulent grantor may be pleaded as conclusive against the fraudulent grantee, upon the ground that in that case the judgment defendant was charged personally.

And it has been held that a judgment against an administrator is not evidence, in an action by a creditor of an intestate to set aside a deed by him in his lifetime, except to prove that the creditor has pursued his legal remedy and failed. Alexander v. Quigley, 2 Duv. 399. (As to what is a judgment on which may be based a creditor's bill to set aside a conveyance as fraudulent, see infra, VI.)

Under the Louisiana law allowing the grantee to set up anything that his grantor might have set up, the court in a revocatory action properly admitted the plaintiff's original judgment as prima facie evidence of the claim, and it then became the duty of the defendant to controvert the demand of the plaintiff, although it was liquidated by a judgment, in the same manner as the original debtor might have done before judgment. Lanata v. Planas, 2 La. Ann. 544.

So the court did not err in permitting the record in the first suit to be given in evidence to prove simply the fact that such a judgment had been recovered; but the evidence upon which that judgment was obtained was not admissible in the second action. Lopez v. Bergel, 12 La. 197.

b. What must, or may, be produced.

A rule, in creditors' bills to set aside fraudulent conveyances, requiring an exhibition of the regularity of all the proceedings upon the judgment in the court of law, would lead to prolixity, and be productive of no good results. All that is required to give the court jurisdiction is to show that the complainant has had execution upon his judgment in the hands of the proper officer, and that he has been unable to find any property leviable. Williams v. Hubbard, 1 Mich. 446. Following Sandford v. Sinclair, 8 Paige, 373.

that the person in whose favor it was entered was a creditor of the defendant; but the objection, if not taken at the trial by motion or otherwise, is not available on appeal. Lalliman v. Hovey, 92 Hun, 419, 36 N. Y. Supp. 662.

But a transcript of the plaintiff's judgment against the grantor is admissible to establish the fact of the indebtedness of the grantor to the plaintiff, and an objection to the form of the clerk's certificate to the transcript, if not made on the trial, is not available on appeal. Hunsinger v. Hofer, 110 Ind. 390, 11 N. E. 463.

The certificate of a justice of the peace is conclusive as to the existence of the judgments on which the creditor's bill is based. Helatt v. Barnes, 5 Dana, 219.

But when a judgment creditor in an execution issued on a judgment of a justice of the peace is sued as for a trespass by the grantee of the judgment debtor, and wishes by way of defense to attack the grantee's deed as fraudulent, it has been held that he must, in order to show himself a judgment creditor, produce the whole transcript of the justice's docket in order that it may appear, not only that there was an execution, but a judgment to warrant the execution, and other previous proceedings to warrant the judgment. Dameron v. Williams, 7 Mo. 138.

In detinue against a sheriff for a slave levied upon under an execution against the plaintiff's donor, when the defendant had offered the judgment in evidence, as proof of indebtedness, in order to prove fraud in the gift to the plaintiff, the plaintiff might put in evidence the entire record in the case for the purpose of showing the effect of the judgment and execution. Easley v. Dye, 14 Ala. 158.

But it was error in an action between a creditor and the vendee of the debtor to determine the title to property, to admit the recitals of the record in judgments taken by the creditor against the debtor in order to prove that the debts existed before the date of the judgment. The record of a judgment between other parties is always admissible to prove the mere fact of the existence of the judgment when that fact is material to the issue; but this comprehends only the judgment of the court and such parts of the record as are necessary to show when and by what court it was rendered. All other parts must be considered as to all other persons than the parties to the judgment, and their privies,

And some proof seems always to be necessary; so the fact that the judgment was entered in an action before the same court and judge trying the creditor's action is not of itself ground for dispensing with proof of the judgment; and, if proper objection is made, it cannot be proved by putting in evidence executions issued upon it, nor by the docket containing an abstract of it, nor by oral evidence, if there is no proof which will allow introduction of secondary evidence. Amundson v. Wilson, 11 N. D. 193, 91 N. W. 37.

III. Conclusive effect of the judgment.

a. Generally.

Unquestionably the general rule is that the judgment is conclusive against the grantee, as to the fact of the indebtedness upon which it is founded, if rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction, and in the absence of fraud and collusion.

In the leading New York case it is held that the right of the creditor to impeach the act of the debtor arises out of the relation which exists between them at the commencement of the suit for that purpose, and does not depend upon the time when the fraud was consummated; hence, the fraudulent grantee is not permitted to allege, in bar of the action against him, that the parties seeking relief were not creditors, either before or at the time of the conveyance. Candee v. Lord, 2 N. Y. 269, 51 Am. Dec. 294.

And in accordance with this rule, the judgment being, in the absence of fraud, conclusive evidence of the debt as against the grantee, testimony to disprove the existence of such a debt is inadmissible. Burgess v. Simonson, 45 N. Y. 225.

The usual rule, however, is represented in Mattingly v. Nye, 8 Wall. 370, 19 L. ed. 380, which holds that a judgment for money against one making a voluntary conveyance cannot be questioned upon a creditor's bill; but that it is also necessary for the complainant to show, otherwise, that the grantor was indebted to him at the time of the conveyance.

Messrs. Holdale & Somsen, for respondents:

Fraud in the transaction on which the judgment was founded might be shown as

A merely voluntary conveyance, not tainted with fraud, is void only as to antecedent debts; but, if made with the intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors, it is void as to subsequent, as well as existing, creditors. When one aggrieved by such a conveyance moves to set it aside those claiming under it may demand that he shall prove himself to be a creditor with a valid, subsisting debt. The principle that no grantee is affected by a judgment against the grantor since the alienation, since otherwise his rights could be divested without his consent, does not conflict with that other principle that a judgment, rendered by a court having jurisdiction, and without fraud or collusion, is conclusive evidence of the amount of the debt at the time, and that, in a proceeding to set aside an alleged fraudulent conveyance such a judgment, whether rendered before or after the conveyance, is competent evidence of the debt. If the complainant would use the judgment to the prejudice of the grantee in a deed alleged to be only voluntary and constructively fraudulent, he must produce independent facts showing the cause of action which authorized the rendition of the judgment, and that it is older than the conveyance. Yeend v. Weeks, 104 Ala. 331, 53 Am. St. Rep. 50, 16 So. 165, Following Pickett v. Pipkin, 64 Ala. 520.

So when a judgment creditor has ineffectually attempted to collect his judgment at law, and resorts to a court of equity to enforce it, the judgment, upon due proof of every allegation necessary to entitle him to a verdict, must be presumed to have been regularly obtained, and it will not be inquired into in equity. Schley v. Dixon, 24 Ga. 273, 71 Am. Dec. 121.

These cases, in requiring that other proof than the judgment must be produced of the existence of a "debt" at the time of the conveyance, differ from SCHMITT v. DAHL, which requires only proof of the existence, at that time, of a "claim."

These decisions, moreover, treat only the case of an adverse judgment; but there are others declaring a different rule when the judgment is entered without contest.

So when property was taken in execution while in the possession of one who had it by virtue of a sale from the owner, upon which the vendee brought an action and the defendant insisted that the sale was fraudulent as against him, he being a creditor by judgment, "Holt, Ch. J., said that, if the judgment was a defense in the action to set aside the transfer.

Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Stoneman, 53 Minn. 212, 54 N. W. 1115.

One whose demand is the offspring of fraud and misrepresentations has no business in an equity court, and equity will not exercise its peculiar jurisdiction to grant him relief.

1 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 397, 400, pp. 433, 435.

Without proof that Hahl or Damron parted with something in consideration of the notes upon which the suit is based, it is certainly unnecessary for defendant to prove that any offer to reconvey was ever made.

Even if a person seeking relief did examine the land, this is not conclusive that he upon a point tried, that then he need not to prove the consideration, but it shall be intended good; but, if it be a judgment by confession, etc., he ought to prove it to be for a just debt, otherwise he shall not overthrow the sale though it be fraudulent, for it is good against all the creditors for a just debt bona fide due." Sanders v. ———, Skinner, 586, Holt, 327.

And from O'Connor v. Docen, 50 App. Div. 610, 64 N. Y. Supp. 206, it seems that a confession of judgment is not sufficient proof to establish the status of the person in whose favor it is confessed as a creditor, so as to entitle him to maintain an action to set aside a conveyance by the debtor as fraudulent, if the confession is made after the conveyance.

And the fact that judgment was taken by default in the action upon which a creditor's bill is based to set aside a conveyance as fraudulent does not dispense with the necessity of the plaintiff's making full proof of the indebtedness of the original debtor to him, and of the facts, such as his capacity as executor. Fink v. Martin, 1 La. Ann. 117.

The recovery, however, of an adverse judgment by executors in their representative character is conclusive evidence of their right to sue as executors so far as respects that debt; and it is not necessary for them to show how they became entitled to sue as the representatives of the testator, to whom the demand was originally due. Rogers v. Rogers, 3 Paige, 379.

That the judgment is not conclusive as to the debt and its amount at the time of the transfer is held in Lynch v. Burt, 132 Fed. 417, and Finch v. Kent, 24 Mont. 268, 61 Pac. 658; although in the latter case testimony of the grantor, that he did not owe the amount of the judgment against him, is held incompetent, since, "in the absence of evidence tending to show fraud, accident, mistake, or satisfaction, the judgment was conclusive evidence of his liability."

On the other hand, in Morley Bros. v. Stringer, 133 Mich. 690, 95 N. W. 978; Carter v. Baker, 10 Helsk. 640; and Young v. Pate, 4 Yerg. 164,—it is simply held that when the judgment is valid upon its face it cannot be collaterally attacked.

But the judgment, nevertheless, should recite the ground upon which it was rendered, and the fact that the question at issue was proved to the satisfaction of the court, as well as all the 67 L. R. A.

facts which were necessary to give the court jurisdiction. Jones v. Read, 1 Humph. 335.

In a scire facias against a garnishee in an attachment execution based upon the allegation of a mortgage fraudulently purchased by the garnishee in the name of his wife, it was held that the validity of the original judgment could not be denied, or even inquired into, by the garnishee; nor could the judgment creditors themselves give any evidence in support of it. Black v. Nease, 37 Pa. 483.

But upon the general question of going behind the judgment, as for fraud, or collusion, in the ordinary case of a creditor's bill, this case is not authority. See Posten v. Posten, 4 Whart. 27, infra, III., d. 2.

In an Ohio case the rule was laid down that the complainant's judgment could not be controverted, and was conclusive that the judgment debtor owed the judgment creditor the debt for which it was rendered, at the time stated in the proceedings. Starr v. Starr, 1 Ohio, 321.

But in Swihart v. Shaum, 24 Ohio St. 432, such a judgment is held to be conclusive merely in the absence of fraud or collusion in obtaining it, and it is stated that it can make no difference whether the conveyance is fraudulent in fact or fraudulent in law.

In Salemonson v. Thompson (N. D.) 101 N. W. 320, and Bensimer v. Fell, 35 W. Va. 15, 29 Am. St. Rep. 774, 12 S. E. 1078, it is laid down that such a judgment, without allegation and proof of fraud or collusion, is conclusive of the debt and its amount, apparently without regard to the time of rendition.

And it precludes question as to whether there were irregularities or errors in the conclusion of the court, which cannot be inquired into collaterally. Moore & H. Hardware Co. v. Curry, 106 Ala. 284, 18 So. 46.

But a judgment rendered by a court without jurisdiction, or by fraud or collusion, can be impeached by a grantee of the debtor; and he may also show that the debt for which the judgment was recovered accrued subsequent to the conveyance to him, or that the plaintiff prosecuted the action against the debtor for the benefit of the debtor. Minnesota Thresher Mfg. Co. v. Schaack, 10 S. D. 511, 74 N. W. 445.

And other courts allow the grantee much greater latitude in his desire to go behind the record of the judgment.

So in Maine it is held that where a creditor relied upon his own knowledge; and, if he relies, even in part, upon the false representations made to him, the court will hear him.

14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 112; Burr v. Willson, 22 Minn. 206; Moline-Milburn Co. v. Franklin, 37 Minn. 137, 33 N. W. 323.

All that is necessary to show is that defendant was induced by material false representations to enter into a contract which he would not have entered into except for such misrepresentations.

MacLaren v. Cochran, 44 Minn. 255, 46 N. W. 408; Martin v. Hill, 41 Minn. 343, 43 N. W. 337; Fox v. Tabel, 66 Conn. 397, 34 Atl. 101; 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 122, 128, 141.

Hahl's claim, if he in fact had one, was calls in question a conveyance made by his debtor upon the ground of fraud, in an action between him and the grantee the demand of the creditor must be subject to examination in order to see whether he has a right, as such, to question the validity of the conveyance. If judgment has been obtained by him, still, as between him and the grantee, who is no party to it, it will not be regarded as precluding the latter from an examination of the grounds of it. The grantee may be allowed to show that it was obtained by fraud, or that the cause of action accrued under circumstances which would not give the creditor a right to impeach the conveyance. Miller v. Miller, 23 Me. 22, 39 Am. Dec. 597.

So the grantee, not being a party to it, is not concluded by the judgment against his grantor (Sargent v. Salmond, 27 Me. 539; Inman v. Mead, 97 Mass. 310); especially when it is subsequent to his deed (Warner v. Percy, 22 Vt. 155). Law v. Payson, 32 Me. 521, apparently holding that a judgment under such circumstances must be held valid until reversed or proved to have been obtained by collusion or fraud, does not directly declare this.

Upon a bill for an injunction filed by a married woman to protect her separate property, which had been levied upon to satisfy a judgment against her husband, the defendants maintaining that the complainant's title was fraudulent, it was held that the judgment on which the levy had been issued, no cause of action having been filed and the declaration not disclosing and stating when the cause of action accrued, was only evidence of the indebtedness of the husband to the defendant on the day of its rendition; but that no question affecting the rights of the complainant was determined by that suit, since she was neither a party nor a privy to it. Miller v. Johnson, 27 Md. 6.

b. Effect of the time of the conveyance.

It is fundamental that one who was a creditor before a merely voluntary, and so constructively fraudulent, conveyance by the debtor, may successfully attack it without showing fraud in the parties; but that one becoming a creditor after a conveyance cannot have it set aside, unless he can show actual fraud in it as against creditors.

So the fact that the debt did or did not exist 67 L. R. A.

never proved in bankruptcy proceedings. Whenever a claim is founded upon an instrument of writing, such instrument, unless lost or destroyed, shall be filed with the proof of claim.

before the time of the conveyance bears only upon the character of the proof of fraud required. Thompson v. Williamson (N. J. Eq.) 58 Atl. 602, infra, III., c. 10, (c).

Under the rule as laid down in Edmunds v. Mister, 58 Miss. 765, infra, III., c. 3, allowing the severance, or denying the doctrine of the entirety, of judgments, a court of equity will not treat as a subsequent creditor one whose judgment is rendered on an account part of which was contracted before and part after the date of a voluntary conveyance which he seeks to have set aside, and compel him thus to lose a valid claim. Chapman v. Hughes, 61 Miss. 339.

But in Maine, if the creditor of a fraudulent grantor joins together in one suit several demands accruing some before and some after the date of the conveyance which he seeks to set aside, recovers judgment upon all of them, and extends an execution, he must be regarded as a creditor subsequent to the conveyance of the land in question by his debtor, and therefore cannot impeach that conveyance except by showing actual fraud. Reed v. Woodman, 4 Me. 400, Followed in Usher v. Hazeltine, 5 Me. 471, 17 Am. Dec. 253; Miller v. Miller, 23 Me. 22, 39 Am. Dec. 597; Quimby v. Dill, 40 Me. 528; and Holmes v. Farris, 63 Me. 318.

And where the plaintiff's claim, on which he had obtained judgment, consisted of an account, all of which, except one item, accrued before the conveyance, and there was a credit in the account for more than sufficient to balance that item, although there did not appear to have been any appropriation of the payment by either party, the court was compelled to follow the general rule in such cases, and apply the credit to extinguish the oldest debt, leaving the last item uncancelled and of a date later than the conveyance; and under the rule of Reed v. Woodman, 4 Me. 400, supra, this prevented the plaintiff from attacking the conveyance without proof of actual fraud. Miller v. Miller, 23 Me. 22, 39 Am. Dec. 597.

In New York it is held that it is immaterial whether the debt was created before or after the fraudulent conveyance; the right of a creditor to impeach the act of the debtor arises out of the relation between them when the action against the grantee is begun; hence, a conveyance made to defraud subsequent creditors may be upset by them, and the fraudulent grantee cannot set up that the plaintiff was not a

A new promise, or new contract, affecting the claim upon which plaintiff relies, has been made and entered into by and between Hahl and Peter H. Dahl subsequent to the commencement of bankruptcy proceedings. This, if true, takes the matter out of bankruptcy court, and the trustee has nothing further to do in regard to that particular claim.

Lewis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In 1895 Peter H. Dahl, a resident of Brown county, Minnesota, purchased certain creditor at the time of the conveyance. Candee v. Lord, 2 N. Y. 269, 51 Am. Dec. 294.

So testimony to disprove the debt is inadmissible, although the grant in question was made before the rendition of the judgment. Burgess v. Simonson, 45 N. Y. 225.

And when a judgment for breach of promise was the basis of a creditor's action to set aside a conveyance made the year before the entering of the judgment, it was held that the grantee might inquire into the grounds of the judgment, and show that it did not give the attacking creditor a right to impeach the transfer and thus to show that the debtor was not under a contract to marry the plaintiff at the time the conveyance was made, or to show that the debt or liability was created after the transfer. Gregory v. Lamb, 101 Ky. 727, 42 S. W. 339.

But when it appeared in an action to set aside a conveyance as fraudulent that the plaintiff's debt on which he had recovered judgment was for a sale after the conveyance, it was held to be no error to allow the grantor to testify that he purchased the property as agent for his son, and that he did no business for himself. The judgment was conclusive between him and the plaintiff as to the existence of the debt and his liability for it; but, since the debt was subsequent to the conveyance, the grantor being at the time free from debt, the plaintiff could successfully assail the conveyance only by showing that it was made with the view of continuing business, and creating future debts, and saving his property from them, or for the purpose of defrauding his future creditors; and it was therefore competent for the grantee to show that the grantor did not in fact carry on any business on his own account, or actually contemplate the creation of future debts. Teed v. Valentine, 65 N. Y. 471.

Whether it is rendered before or after the gift or conveyance, a judgment against the donor or grantor is competent evidence of the debt,—of the fact that the party in whose favor it was rendered stands in a relation to be injured or affected by the gift or conveyance (Pickett v. Pipkin, 64 Ala. 520; Lawson v. Alabama Warehouse Co. 73 Ala. 289); or it is sufficient evidence of the same fact (Young v. Pate, 4 Yerg. 164).

The judgment rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction, and in the absence of fraud or collusion, though it may be conclusive evidence of the debt existing at the time of its rendition, is not evidence of an indebtedness existing at the time of the conveyance (Lynch v. Burt, 132 Fed. 417; Finch v. Kent, 24 Mont. 268, 61 Pac. 653); or at any time before its rendition (Lawson v. Alabama Warehouse Co. 73 Ala. 289); and it is not conclusive against the grantee that the grantor was a debtor, even at the time when the action was begun (Jenness v. Berry, 17 N. H. 549; Troy v. Smith, 33 Ala. 469; Sweet v. Dean, 43 Ill. App. 650).

And at all events a grantee of land from a judgment debtor is not concluded by a judgment later increased by usury under an agreement between the creditor and the judgment debtor. Bensimer v. Feil, 35 W. Va. 15, 29 Am. St. Rep. 774, 12 S. E. 1078.

And a confession of judgment, if made after the conveyance, is not sufficient proof to establish its owner as a creditor. O'Connor v. Docen, 50 App. Div. 610, 64 N. Y. Supp. 206.

In Florida no allenee, grantee, assignee, or mortgagee, is bound or affected by a judgment or decree to which he is not a party, rendered in a suit against the allenee, grantor, assignor, or mortgagor, begun after the alienation, grant, assignment, or mortgage. Austin v. Hoxsle, 44 Fla. 199, 32 So. 878. Following Logan v. Stieff, 36 Fla. 473, 18 So. 762.

And in Louisiana, in a revocatory action to annul a sale of land as fraudulent as against the plaintiff's rights, under article 1971 of the Louisiana Code, which authorizes the purchaser in such a case to controvert the demand of the plaintiff, although liquidated by a judgment, in the same manner as the debtor might have done before the judgment, the defendant denied the indebtedness of the vendor to the plaintiff, alleging that his action had been barred by prescription before the commencement of that suit, and it was held that the right of the plaintiff to attack the sale as fraudulent depended upon his showing that he was a creditor of the vendor before the date of the act; the judgment recovered against the vendor was certainly not conclusive upon his vendee, and, as the latter was not made a party, he had a right to controvert the demand, and to avail himself of every defense which might have been pleaded by the original defendant. Lopez v. Bergel, 12 La. 197. To the same effect is Dumas v. Lefebvre, 10 Rob. (La.) 399.

real estate in Texas, made a cash payment thereon, and executed and delivered his certain promissory notes, maturing from one to four years, for the remainder of the purchase price. In 1900 an action was commenced in Brown county, Minnesota, against him, to recover the amount due upon these notes, by C. W. Hahl, who was then the owner of the same. Dahl appeared and answered, admitted the execution of the notes, alleged that they were given in payment of certain Texas real estate, and that subsequent thereto the plaintiff in that action had taken back the real estate in full payment and settlement of the notes. The action came on for trial, and plaintiff made motion for judgment upon the pleadings, and it was stipulated by the parties that the judgment might be entered for plaintiff against defendant for $2,411.03. Judgment was entered accordingly on January 8, 1901. On July 17, 1900, Dahl, his wife joining, conveyed to their daughter, Amelia Dahl, 80 acres of land located in Brown county, Minnesota, which conveyance was recorded on December 19, 1900. On January 3, 1901, Dahl filed his petition in bankruptcy, and was duly adjudged bankrupt, and plaintiff was thereafter appointed trustee of his estate in bankruptcy. On January 26, 1901, Hahl, the judgment creditor, filed his claim in bankruptcy, which was duly allowed on the same day. This action was commenced by the trustee for the purpose of subjecting the 80 acres of land conveyed to Amelia Dahl to the claim filed in the bankruptcy court. The complaint alleged that Amelia Dahl was a fraudulent grantee, having

One, however, acquiring land in Louisiana since the recovering of a judgment against the grantor cannot raise against the judgment any defense that his grantor could not raise. Gal-laughter v. Hebrew Congregation, 35 La. Ann. 829.

c. As to defenses to the original action.

1. Defense by way of denial, generally.

It is sufficiently obvious that, although one may impeach a judgment in a suit to which he was not a party or privy when the court rendering it had no jurisdiction, or when it was obtained by fraud or collusion, or erroneously or unlawfully rendered to the prejudice of his rights, yet, in an action by a judgment creditor against the voluntary grantee of the judgment debtor, the grantee may not attack the original judgment merely upon the ground that the jury erred in determining a question of fact, as to matters alleged in defense of the action; and against such an objection the judgment is conclusive as to the relation of debtor and creditor between the parties and the amount of indebtedness. This would be an attempt of a stranger to retry a judgment already determined between the parties, in accordance with the forms and principles of law, and without fraud or collusion. Sidensparker v. Sidensparker, 52 Me. 481, 83 Am. Dec. 527.

Where, however, the defense set up in the later action is that the defendant in the first action failed to make a certain valid defense to it, these considerations would seem not to prevail.

On a writ of entry to recover land levied upon by an execution in the plaintiff's favor, where the judgment debtor had conveyed the land to one who again had conveyed it for a valuable consideration, to a third person, who took it with notice that it had been seized on an execution in favor of the plaintiff; and the second grantee, the defendant, offered evidence tending to show that the plaintiff's judgment was unfounded and erroneous, and that the judgment debtor was not indebted, and could have successfully resisted the plaintiff's claim, —it was held that the exclusion of this evidence was error, and that the judgment was not conclusive upon the second grantee as evidence of the indebtedness of the original defendant to the plaintiff. Inman v. Mead, 97 Mass. 310.

Where a judgment was recovered against an employee for money embezzled by him from 1841 to 1848, and execution was levied upon land conveyed by the judgment debtor in 1844 to a third person for the separate use of the grantor's wife, and the judgment creditor, having received a deed from the sheriff, brought an action against the three parties to remove the cloud upon his title, it was held that, although the judgment concluded the fraudulent grantor as to the nature and dates of the several items of indebtedness on which the recovery was had, it did not conclude the other defendants so as to prevent their showing that no such indebtedness existed at the times indicated, and, accordingly, it was error to exclude proof offered by the alleged fraudulent grantee that the deficits in the account in question were caused by the meddling and interference of the plaintiff. The court said: "We are not aware of, nor have we been referred to, any case to this [contrary] effect." Eddy v. Baldwin, 23 Mo. 588.

But in a later decision of the same court it is held that, in an action to set aside a fraudulent conveyance based upon a judgment against the grantor upon his warranty of title in a deed to land which he did not own, it cannot be shown as a defense that the defendant never executed the deed, but signed it simply as a witness, such matter being proper as a defense to the damage suit. Swinford v. Teegarden, 159 Mo. 635, 60 S. W. 1089.

In harmony with the last decision, where one conveyed his property to another upon the agreement that the grantee should pay the grantor's firm's debts, a judgment based upon this agreement, obtained by a creditor of the firm against the firm and the grantee, was held to be conclusive evidence, in the judgment creditor's action to set aside a conveyance of the same property to the grantee's wife as fraudulent, that the first grantee was indebted to the plaintiff; therefore, evidence tending to show that the first grantee was not so indebted, or that he had paid out on account of the indebtedness of the firm, in pursuance of his agreement, more money than he had or could realize from the property received by him under the contract, was immaterial. Kaiser v. Waggoner, 59 Iowa, 40, 12 N. W. 754.

In an action by a creditor of an intestate received the property without any consideration, and having full notice of the existence of the indebtedness and judgment against Peter H. Dahl. Amelia Dahl interposed a separate answer, admitting the execution of the notes, and, as a defense, alleged that the notes were without consideration, having been obtained by false representations as to the character and value of the land, all of which facts were known to the judgment creditor, Hahl. The court found that the notes had been obtained by fraudulent representation, and that Hahl had notice thereof; that the conveyance by Peter H. Dahl to Amelia Dahl was made without consideration, for the purpose of defrauding the creditors of Peter H. Dahl; and that Amelia Dahl had knowledge of the fact. Judgment was entered in favor of Amelia Dahl and against the plaintiff, to the effect that he was not entitled to the relief demanded, and from this judgment the plaintiff appealed.

The most important question presented on this hearing is whether the fraudulent grantee may, in a collateral proceeding, defend upon the same ground that was open to the judgment debtor in the previous action, in the absence of proof that such judgment was procured by fraud, collusion, through mistake, or that the court did not possess jurisdiction. It is assumed by respondent that the question was settled by this court in the case of Bruggerman v. Hoerr, 7 Minn. 337, 82 Am. Dec. 97, Gil. 264, and subsequent cases, and it will be against voluntary grantees of his property in his lifetime, a judgment against the administrator is not evidence, except in order to show that the creditor had pursued his legal remedy and had failed; and the grantee may contest the validity of the judgment and the justice of the plaintiff's demand against the estate. Alexander v. Quigley, 2 Duv. 399. (Vide infra, V.)

2. Statute of Limitations.

In Louisiana, an objection by a judgment creditor, plaintiff, to the plea of prescription set up by the grantee, that it had been set up by the original debtor himself and overruled, did not avail, since the grantee, not being a party to the original judgment, might avail himself of every defense which might have been pleaded by his grantor. Lopez v. Bergel, 12 La. 197.

And the defendant grantee may, by demurrer, set up that the statute of limitations barred the debt against his grantor before the beginning of the action on which the judgment was rendered, if the fact appears on the face of the pleadings. Davis v. Davis, 20 Or. 78, 25 Pac. 140.

The voluntary confession of judgments by a debtor long after the conveyances in question would not prevent the grantee from denying the existence of the claims, or relying upon the fact that they were barred by limitations before the judgments were confessed. Warner v. Dove, 33 Md. 579.

The opposite view is expressed in Jones v. Read, 1 Humph. 335, where it was held that the court could not in this collateral way inquire into the regularity of the judgments, and whether they might not have been defeated by the introduction of other evidence than that which was before the court, or by inserting other defenses, or whether the facts the court assumed as existing were sufficiently proved by the testimony before it. The only inquiry is, Are they valid, or are they void? And, although they may be irregular, and liable to be reversed on a writ of error to a superior court, or upon the introduction of new proof or different defenses on a writ of error coram nobis in the same court in which they were rendered, still they may be executed either by process issuing directly upon them or by a bill in equity auxiliary to them.

of the pleadings that the debt was barred by the statute of limitations, and that the suit should have been brought in the name of an administrator instead of that of a legatee, as was done, neither of these objections reached the validity of the judgment; the first being matter in bar, the second, in abatement,—defenses which the defendant might have interposed, but, when waived by him at the trial, could not be made by him or anyone else. Clark v. Anthony, 31 Ark. 546.

And it is held in McMannomy v. Chicago, D. & V. R. Co. 187 Ill. 497, 47 N. E. 712, that the defense of the statute is personal to the debtor, so that it cannot later be interposed as a defense to a creditor's bill.

3. Minority.

The grantee of land from a person who has just attained his majority, although the conveyance is attacked as fraudulent, may successfully attack the title of persons who have purchased the land under execution sale upon judgments obtained against the grantor after the conveyance, for indebtedness for goods, not necessities, sold to the grantor during his minority, although the grantor had ratified the purchases, and when sued failed to plead his minority and allowed judgments to go against him without defense. Before the rendition of the judgments the claims of the creditors against him were not valid debts, and before the judgments he had made the conveyance alleged to be fraudulent, and it was not possible for him, by then making the debts valid, to affect the title previously conveyed. It is well settled that suffering judgment to go upon a debt barred by the statute of limitations will not affect the title to property sold before judgment and after the bar was complete; and a fortiori must this be true as to minority debts which have no binding force until judgment. Edmunds v. Mister, 58 Miss. 765.

4. Set-off.

When the defendant grantee sets up as a defense that the plaintiff is indebted upon simple contract to the judgment debtor in an amount equal to the judgment on which the action in equity is based, the general rule that such a debt cannot be set off in equity against the judgment does not apply; the defendant is not seeking to set off the debt against the judgment, and, necessary to examine the decisions with some particularity. In Bruggerman v. Hoerr the plaintiff had entered into a contract with one Keck, by which he advanced certain moneys to him for the purchase of a pre-emption claim, and judgment was recovered against Keck for the amount so advanced; Keck having failed to make the defense that the contract to advance money for such purposes was void, and that there was actually no indebtedness. Prior to the entry of the judgment, Keck had transferred property to Hoerr, and the action was brought to reach the property upon the ground that the transfer was fraudulent and without consideration. After stating that it was necessary for the plaintiff to show he was a creditor of Keck at the time of the transfer of the real estate, the court said: "If he had a claim or demand which could then, or when it became due, be legally enforced against Keck, he was a creditor. But if his claim or demand was not of a character to be legally or equitably enforced, he was not a creditor, . . . and therefore, could not be prejudiced by any disposition which Keck might choose to make of his property. And if the conveyances were not invalid at the time they were executed, as a fraud upon the rights of the plaintiff, . . . it seems clear that they could not be vitiated by the subsequent act or omission of the grantor to which the grantee was not a party." And the court held that, since in fact there was no indebtedness owing by Keck which could at any if the defense is upheld, the judgment and whatever legal processes are provided for its enforcement would remain unimpaired. The plaintiff invokes the aid of a court of equity to assist him in the collection of his demand, because he says he is without remedy at law; but if in fact he is indebted to the judgment debtor in a sum equal to or greater than the amount of the judgment, the legal obstacles which he asks to remove are afflicting him with no injustice, and it is immaterial by what instrument his obligation to the debtor is evidenced. The case would be wholly different if the judgment debtor were seeking the aid of a court of equity to restrain the collection of a judgment by execution, or if, by like means, he were seeking to procure a discharge or satisfaction of the judgment. The plaintiff, prosecuting a suit in equity, must submit to any equitable defense. Lashmett v. Prall, 2 Herdman (Neb.) 284, 96 N. W. 152.

In an action of ejectment by a grantee by warranty deed against one holding under an execution sale upon a judgment against the plaintiff's grantor it was perfectly competent for the plaintiff, after the defendant had proved that the grantor was indebted to the judgment creditor at the time of the plaintiff's conveyance, the inference being that plaintiff's conveyance was therefore fraudulent, to offer evidence tending to prove that at the time of the conveyance in question the grantor had claims to a considerable amount against the judgment creditor; such evidence having a decided tendency to rebut any presumption of fraud affecting the rights of the creditor. The court said that the plaintiff was not concluded by the judgment against her grantor,—especially as it was subsequent to her deed. The judgment was conclusive as between the grantor and his creditor, but, so far as the plaintiff was concerned, the questions how far back the indebtedness extended, and what was the relative state of the mutual claims of the parties to the judgment, must be open to inquiry. Warner v. Percy, 22 Vt. 155.

When, however, the defense set up in the second action was upon notes given by the plaintiff to the debtor which it was claimed ought to have been set off or recouped against the demand on which the judgment was rendered, and the consideration of these notes was money furnished to pre-empt land, making an illegal and void transaction, this was no defense. Ferguson v. Kumler, 11 Minn. 104, 6 Ill. 62. 67 L. R. A.

5. Bankruptcy.

As to bankruptcy after the judgment, see infra, III., § 5.

In an action to set aside as fraudulent judgments in favor of the defendant, based upon judgments recovered in 1870 upon claims accruing before 1858, the defendant pleaded that the judgment debtor was discharged in bankruptcy before the rendition of the plaintiff's judgments, which were by confession, and insisted that the debts owing to the plaintiff were discharged by the proceedings in bankruptcy. It was held that it was for the debtor to insist upon that discharge when the judgments in favor of the plaintiff were taken against him, and, if he chose to waive his discharge, he was at liberty to do so, and, since he did waive it by confessing judgment the defendant could not dispute the validity of the judgments. It is not dishonest for the debtor who has been discharged in bankruptcy to waive the discharge and allow a judgment to be recovered against him for the original debt, and, if he permits a judgment to be thus recovered against him, the creditor has a right to enforce the judgment against any property of the debtor; and one who is in possession of property of the debtor, transferred with intent to defraud creditors, cannot defend on the ground that the debtor might have had a defense against the judgment if he had chosen to assert it. Dewey v. Moyer, 9 Hun, 473.

6. Estoppel.

Matters which, if available at all, might have been urged in defense to an application for a deficiency judgment, as the estoppel of the plaintiff on account of his assent to the removal of a house from the land in question, cannot be set up in defense to a creditor's suit to enforce a judgment by subjecting to the payment of it land alleged to have been fraudulently conveyed. Millard v. Parsell, 57 Neb. 178, 77 N. W. 390.

7. Payment.

This is to be distinguished from the defense of satisfaction, treated infra, III., § 8.

When, in an action to set aside as fraudulent a transfer of stock in a corporation, the defendant asked leave to file an additional defense to the effect that certain persons, as agents of the plaintiff, sold the debtor property for which time have been legally enforced against him, the conveyances were not executed in fraud of the judgment creditor; that Keck could easily have defeated the action, and that his failure to make the proper defense, whether by collusion with the plaintiff, or through indifference as to the result of the action, would be a fraud upon the grantee; that the holder of a title perfect in its inception should not be devastated at the will of another over whom he can exercise no control. And reference was made to the statute prohibiting fraudulent conveyances, which then read: "Every conveyance . . . of any estate or interest in lands . . . made with the intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors or other persons of their lawful actions, damages, forfeitures, debts, or demands, . . . shall be void." Gen. Stat. 1894, chap. 41, § 4222. It will be seen that the court placed its decision upon several grounds: (1) That there may have been collusion or fraud, from the fact that Keck did not make the proper defense; (2) that it was incumbent upon plaintiff to show that the indebtedness upon which the judgment was founded existed prior to the time of the conveyance which he attacked, and consequently that he was required to prove the actual existence of such debt, without regard to the judgment subsequently entered; (3) that the statute avoided conveyances only in favor of persons having lawful claims, and that, the claim in that case being void under the statute, the grantee might show the fact.

the note on which the judgment was taken was given, that the plaintiff refused to receive the note, and that they had paid the plaintiff the amount by a draft on a third person, there was no error in refusing leave to file the supposed defense, which did not arise after the rendition of the judgment; the transferee could not set up defenses to the action on the note which the debtor had failed to set up when sued. The only question in which he was interested was whether the stock which stood in his name should be subjected to the payment of the judgment or not. Scott v. Indianapolis Wagon Works, 48 Ind. 75.

8. Fraud in the transaction.

In a proper case a court of equity may look behind a judgment at law in order to do justice between the parties; but, where a judgment creditor who has established his claim at law seeks, in equity, to reach his debtor's property which has been fraudulently conveyed away, by having the conveyance set aside, the debtor and his grantee are in no position to contest the complainant's right to his judgment by setting up that the bond upon which judgment was rendered was obtained from the obligee by "overreaching" and fraud. Conover v. Jeffrey, 26 N. J. Eq. 36.

And evidence that the debtor was overreached in the transaction from which the indebtedness arose, and that he was induced to contract the indebtedness by false representations made by some of the complainants, so that the judgments were not equitably due to the complainants, was not proper; if any such defense existed it should have been made in the action at law. Sawyer v. Moyer, 109 Ill. 461.

To the contrary effect, however, is Faris v. Durham, 5 T. B. Mon. 397, 17 Am. Dec. 77. It was competent for an alleged fraudulent grantee to attack the plaintiff's judgment upon the ground that it was obtained upon a bond which was, by fraud, procured to be signed by the debtor in the belief that it was another instrument, that the debtor afterwards, and before judgment, denied the validity of the bond, and when sued upon it pleaded fraud, but was induced by the plaintiff, and by further fraud and artifice, to withdraw his plea and suffer judgment to be rendered against him. The court said that, since fraud undoubtedly vitiated the bond, this fraud, if insisted on by the obligor, 67 L. R. A.

would have formed a good ground in equity for relief against the judgment. It could not be a violation of any principle of equity or law to allow the defendant grantee, though he did not occupy the favored attitude of bona fide purchaser, to avail himself, in defense of the property, of that equity which originated before he obtained the deed, and which would have been an effectual shield in the hands of the grantor against the complainant's demand for relief.

In a similar case the complainant loaned $2,700, taking as security a chattel mortgage on furniture worth more than the loan, and also the borrower's note with an accommodation indorser, bearing 5 per cent a month interest, which, also, was secured by trust deed on several hundred acres of land; and he accepted, also, a note made by the borrower for $300, nominally for services as agent; and at the maturity of the principal note foreclosed his mortgage, under which the furniture was sold at a great sacrifice, and enforced the trust deed, thus realizing almost the whole amount of the loan, and later recovered judgment against the indorser, owing to the intoxication of his counsel, for almost the full amount of the note; and, having, by garnishment, obtained possession of a note for $1,350, belonging to the indorser, secured by deed of trust on land worth more than the note, bid in the note for $80, which was advertised for sale without notice of the security, foreclosed the trust deed, and so obtained title to land worth many thousand dollars; then issued execution on his judgment upon the lands in question in this action as the property of the same accommodation indorser, bought them in, and then brought this action to set aside as a cloud upon his title a warranty deed of the lands from that indorser to the defendant, his brother, who had bought in the land at a sale under a judgment rendered before the indorsement on the note was made, the allegation of the complaint being that the purchase by the brother was in pursuance of a conspiracy to defraud creditors. It was held that the judgment of the complainant against the accommodation indorser, the defendant's brother, was conclusive between the complainant and the latter as to the indebtedness, but it was not conclusive upon the defendant, a grantee before the judgment, either as to the amount of the debt, or as to the circumstances and character of the transaction out of which the indebtedness arose (the court saying that

The court was correct in so far as it was held that the judgment creditor was compelled to prove that the claim upon which the judgment was founded existed prior to the time of the conveyance, and also that, if a proper defense was not made by Keck, by reason of collusion, or in pursuance of some fraudulent purpose, then the grantee would not be estopped from setting up the real defense which might have been interposed in the original action; but in so far as the court intimated that the judgment creditor was required to establish, not only the fact of the existence of his claim prior to the conveyance, but also a legal or real indebtedness, we are of the opinion that the court was mistaken, and that the subsequent decisions referring to this case are not in conflict with this view.

In the case of Stone v. Myers, 9 Minn. 303, 86 Am. Dec. 104, Gil. 287, it was held that a creditor seeking to subject to his claim real estate paid for by the debtor, but conveyed to another, must have been a creditor at the time of the conveyance, but the case did not involve the question now raised; that is, the validity of claim of indebtedness. In Ferguson v. Kumler, 11 Minn. 104, Gil. 63, Joseph Kumler had conveyed certain property to his brother, and Ferguson, who, subsequent to the conveyance, had procured judgment against the grantor, brought an action to subject the property to the judgment upon the ground that it had been fraudulently conveyed.

"the authorities upon this question are uniform and clear"); also, that it was the duty of the court, as a court of equity, to inquire into the circumstances out of which the indebtedness was claimed to have arisen, and, if those circumstances did not show that the claim was one which, in equity and good conscience, ought to be enforced, the court would not inquire into the transaction between the judgment debtor and the defendant, but leave the parties where their legal titles had placed them; and, as the land, when sold, went to pay a prior debt of the judgment debtor, the complainant must have a very clear case for equitable interposition, before it shall be taken from the defendant and applied to the payment of another debt of his grantor. Here the complainant, exacting enormous interest and a large bonus, causing the sacrifice of several thousand dollars on the foreclosure of the mortgage, which realized only one fourth of the value of the chattels, received about one third of his money back, appropriated several hundred acres of the debtor's land, and then, by a suspicious omission in the advertisement, obtained title to a fully secured note, and afterwards, enforcing the trust deed, became the owner of very valuable property and had been paid more than in full with reasonable interest, and a court of equity should now refuse him more. Gottlieb v. Thatcher, 34 Fed. 435.

9. Forgery.

Where defendants set up that the notes on which judgment had been entered had been forged by one of the two joint makers, and that the judgment debtor was not indebted on account of the notes at the time of the conveyance, it was held (adopting the statement in Sidensparker v. Sidensparker, 52 Me. 481, 83 Am. Dec. 527, supra, III., c. 1, limiting the rule allowing collateral attack by the defendant in a creditor's bill to cases where the court had no jurisdiction, or a judgment had been obtained by fraud or collusion, or was erroneous and unlawfully entered up) that the judgment on the notes, being obtained upon due notice to both the debtor and the forger, the apparent joint makers, was conclusive against all of the defendants as to both the fact and the amount of indebtedness when the conveyance was executed. Strong v. Lawrence, 58 Iowa, 55, 12 N. W. 74.

So where the defendant insisted that the 67 L. R. A. complainant's judgment was obtained in a suit upon a forged indorsement, but did not allege that it was not obtained in good faith, merely maintaining that there was error in the litigation, he was in privity with the debtor, and so concluded by the judgment. Candee v. Lord, 2 N. Y. 269, 51 Am. Dec. 294, supra, III., a.

10. Illegal transaction.

(a) Usury.

Where fraudulent grantees attempted to impeach the judgment on which the claim was founded on the ground that the original transaction was usurious, it was held that, upon the question whether one is or is not a debtor, an adverse judgment is evidence prima facie that he is, even against strangers who claim under him property affected by the judgment. If they attempt to impeach the judgment it must be done on the ground of fraud, or by showing that a full defense was not made, and producing new proof showing that the debt is not due. So, if a court of equity could pronounce such transaction usurious upon the very same facts on which the court of law, the defense of usury being made, has pronounced it not to be usurious, then it would be virtually an appeal from the court of law to the court of equity, and the court of equity would re-examine the judgment of the court of law and virtually reverse it. This is not within the jurisdiction of a court of equity, which relieves against judgments at law, not because they were wrong, but because of some new matter which the court of law did not, or could not, pronounce a judgment upon, or which, for some just cause, the party could not bring to the consideration of the court of law. Garland v. Rives, 4 Rand. (Va.) 282, 15 Am. Dec. 756.

To admit such evidence was palpable error; it was irrelevant and could not avoid the creditor's judgment. Hislop v. Hoover, 68 N. C. 141. To the same effect is Bank of Wooster v. Stevens, 1 Ohio St. 233, 59 Am. Dec. 619.

But in Kentucky one claiming a debt under a usurious contract void in law, though he has obtained a judgment upon it, is not such a creditor as can avail himself of any objection to a gift as being in fraud of creditors; and the donee may introduce evidence tending to prove that the debt on which the judgment was obtained, being upon a note bearing 10 per cent

The grantee defended, and attempted to set off two promissory notes which had been given by Ferguson to the grantor, and which it was claimed ought to have been set off by the grantor in the action which terminated in the judgment. It was insisted in that action that the grantee was not concluded by the judgment, because the conveyance was not made with intent to hinder or delay the judgment creditor of any lawful claims, and the notes attempted to be set off were void for the reason that they had been given in pursuance of a contract to advance money to pre-empt government land; and the court said: "The judgment ought to be held good, not only against the judgment debtor, but all the world, if it was duly rendered on a sufficient cause of action.

Of course, we have no reference to a case where judgment was obtained by fraud on the part of the court or referee, or by a fraudulent collusion between the judgment creditor and debtor." The court held that the notes were void, having been given in pursuance of a contract to pre-empt government land, and for that reason they could not be set off in the original action, if that defense had been made therein, and, conceding that the grantee was not estopped by the original judgment against the grantor, his defense was not available. It will thus be seen that the court did not consider—much less, determine—whether or not the grantee would be estopped from asserting the same defense which might have been made by his grantor in the original action.

Interest, is void. Taylor v. Eubanks, 3 A. K. Marsh. 289.

(b) Sunday law.

The judgment upon a note obtained against the grantor of an alleged fraudulent grantee cannot be impeached by showing that the note was made on Sunday, since that fact did not show that the debt did not exist or that the suit was fraudulent. If the note was made on Sunday contrary to statute the maker might allege that he was not bound by it; but, if he did not see fit to make that defense, no one could make it for him, and after the judgment he could no longer take that objection himself. Jeanness v. Berry, 17 N. H. 549.

(c) Immoral consideration.

An alleged fraudulent grantee is concluded by judgments in favor of plaintiff against her husband, rendered in actions brought for nonperformance of an agreement for separation between the plaintiff and her husband by which he agreed to pay her, regularly during her life, certain sums which the plaintiff covenanted to accept in discharge of all claims upon him. Such judgments, in the absence of proof of fraud, could not be attacked upon the ground of the invalidity of the contract when that question was litigated between the parties. Carpenter v. Osborn, 102 N. Y. 552, 7 N. E. 823.

So the grantee could not go into the basis of the judgment creditor's claim upon which he obtained his judgment, and show that it was for damages for breach of promise of marriage, and that the marriage contract was based upon an immoral consideration. Salomonson v. Thompson (N. D.) 101 N. W. 320.

But in an early Massachusetts decision in an action for land the demandant relied upon a judgment against the grantor upon which an execution had been levied upon the land, contending that the deed to the defendant was fraudulent against creditors; and the defendant, having proved that the note upon which the judgment was recovered was made before the deed, was allowed to show that the note had been given upon a corrupt agreement in regard to false testimony, upon which the court declared that in such a case it was of no consequence whether the deed be fraudulent or not, that the demandant ought to come into court with clean hands, but, coming as he did, it was 67 L. R. A.

Impossible for him to maintain the action. Alexander v. Gould, 1 Mass. 165.

In Bruggerman v. Hoerr, 7 Minn. 387, 82 Am. Dec. 97, Gil. 264, which is discussed and partly overruled in the opinion in SCHMITT v. DAHL, the debt on which the judgment was granted was upon a contract to sell the debtor's pre-emption claim, and void,—a defense which was not made by the debtor. It is said that the creditor must prove a valid indebtedness when the conveyance was made, which was not possible there.

In McCanless v. Smith, 51 N. J. Eq. 505, 25 Atl. 211, the vice chancellor declared that the fraudulent grantee might defend against the fraudulent grantor, or anyone who claimed openly or secretly in his interest (as in Anderson v. Tuttle, 26 N. J. Eq. 144, infra, III., d, 2), but not against his actual creditor, no matter what might be the foundation of his debt, so long as it be a debt established by judgment in invitum; that the doctrine of merger precluded all inquiry into, or notice of, the character of the original debt, although in order to show the date of its origin such character were incidentally exposed; and the original debt with all its inequities was merged in the judgment. This was applied in a case where the wife of a judgment debtor, who had conveyed to him in fraud of creditors, was precluded from setting up the fact that the judgment on which the creditor's bill was based was itself based upon a foreign judgment of foreclosure of a mortgage which was given to secure debts incurred in stockbroking transactions on margin, alleged by the grantee to be gambling transactions.

Later, however, it was held by the court of errors and appeals, without any mention of McCanless v. Smith, that equity would not assist judgment creditors to set aside conveyances by their judgment debtor as fraudulent, in order to enforce a judgment in an action commenced after the conveyances and based upon wagering contracts made in another state for the sale and purchase of cotton upon margin, even although the defendant grantee entirely failed to set up such a defense based upon the illegal nature of the contracts; and the opinion says: "No failure on the part of the defendant to claim her personal rights can blind the court to the intrinsic impropriety, for the court's sake, of the step which it is asked to take." Minzhelmer v. Doollittle, 60 N. J. Eq. 394, 45 Atl. 611.

In Hartman v. Weiland, 36 Minn. 223, 30 N. W. 815, it was held that a fraudulent grantee of a farm has, as against the creditors of his grantor, title to the crops that he raises on the farm while the conveyance is unimpeached, and that, as against a stranger to it, a judgment is no evidence of the prior existence of the debt for which it was rendered; and the court referred to the case of Olmsted County v. Barber, 31 Minn. 256, 17 N. W. 473, 944; but the question of what was meant by the previous existence of the debt was not there considered. The next case is that of Bloom v. Moy, 43 Minn. 397, 19 Am. St. Rep. 243, 45 N. W. 715, where it is stated that the plaintiff did not prove that the debt existed at the time of the conveyance, but the court did

And a recent case covers the whole question. Stockbrokers had obtained a judgment in New York for a balance alleged to be due them from a customer on an account involving the purchase and sale of stock, the agreement between the brokers and the customer being nominally for bona fide contracts for purchase and sale, including the delivery of the stock, but with the further understanding that the agreement as to deliveries of the stock bought and sold should be abrogated, in which action the defendant put in a defense, but not upon the ground that the claim was based on a gambling transaction; and the plaintiffs having also obtained a judgment in New Jersey upon the first judgment, brought this bill in equity to set aside the conveyance of the original defendants, joining as defendant the grantee of the property through a third person. The defendant set up as a defense the allegation that the judgment in New York was founded on transactions which are, in New Jersey, held to be gambling transactions, and it was held that, as far as the judgment debtor himself was concerned, the defense was not available; but, as to the defendants who were grantees of the judgment debtor, and who were not parties to the suit in which the judgment for the defendant was recovered, the rule was settled in New Jersey that they were not concluded by the judgment from setting up that the recovery was upon gambling transactions, and therefore could not be enforced against them. In Minzesheimer v. Doolittle, 60 N. J. Eq. 394, 45 Atl. 611, supra, this defense was sustained in behalf of the wife of the debtor, and the bill seeking to set aside as fraudulent a conveyance of the debtor's property to her was dismissed without inquiring into the consideration. In that case the conveyance was made, not only before the institution of the suit and recovery of the judgment, but before the incurring of the debt on which the judgment was obtained, and in this respect differed from this case. Here the debt existed and the suit was instituted before the conveyance, but this circumstance bears only upon the character of the proof of fraud required, and in view of the ground on which the decision is based,—that is, the right of the grantee to a day in court to defend the title against all acts or judgments of the grantor after the date of the deed,—the court considered the decision as controlling this case, and also as overruling on this point McCanless v. Smith, 51 N. J. Eq. 505, 25 Atl. 211, 67 L. R. A.

not consider what is meant by the previous existence of the debt. In Pabst Brewing Co. v. Jensen, 68 Minn. 293, 71 N. W. 384, one Wagner had executed a chattel mortgage upon certain property to the plaintiff, and subsequent thereto a creditor had obtained judgment against Wagner; and the defendant, as an officer, had seized the property under execution issued upon the judgment, claiming the mortgage to be fraudulent. The mortgagee brought the action to recover possession of the property, and the officer justified under the judgment. It was there held that the judgment (the same having been entered by a court having jurisdiction) was admissible, and was competent evidence of its own existence, as against the mortgagee. The point having been made supra, in which it was held that the wife of a judgment debtor, claiming under a voluntary settlement of her husband's lands, could not question the validity of the judgment as based on an illegal gambling transaction. Thompson v. Williamson (N. J. Eq.) 58 Atl. 602.

11. Failure of consideration.

Although there may have been error or irregularity in the rendering of the judgment, or laches in making a defense against it, these matters are determined by the judgment, and cannot be retried in a collateral proceeding; and this rule includes a case where the grantee sets up as a defense the fact that the consideration of the contract on which the indebtedness was founded failed owing to the worthlessness of the property sold, of which the plaintiff knew. Minnesota Thresher Mfg. Co. v. Schaack, 10 S. D. 511, 74 N. W. 445.

So there was no error in refusing to permit the grantee to introduce testimony tending to show simply a want of valid consideration upon that judgment; the judgment could be impeached by the grantee only for fraud, notwithstanding that she was not a party to the judgment. Reid v. Brown, Wilson, Super. Ct. (Ind.) 312, following Burgess v. Simonson, 45 N. Y. 225.

Kimbro v. Clark, 17 Neb. 403, 22 N. W. 788, declares that the question of the consideration of the note on which the original judgment was based must be eliminated as immaterial.

But in Oregon, contrary to law elsewhere, the grantee may go behind the judgment and inquire into the consideration of the note on which it was rendered. Davis v. Davis, 20 Or. 78, 25 Pac. 140.

12. Lack of jurisdiction.

As was mentioned above (I.), lack of jurisdiction is always sufficient ground for impeaching a judgment.

In a proceeding to set aside a voluntary conveyance by a supposed judgment creditor, it is a sufficient defense that the justice rendering the judgment was incompetent by relationship, making the judgment absolutely void. Pierce v. Bowers (Tenn.) 3 Leg. Rep. 139.

When the right of a third person may be affected collaterally by a judgment which was procured by fraud or collusion of the parties, or which for any reason is erroneous and void, that it was necessary for the defendant to prove the existence of the debt prior to the rendition of the judgment, the court referred to the case of Bloom v. Moy, 43 Minn. 397, 19 Am. St. Rep. 243, 45 N. W. 715, and others, and stated that those cases were in line with the authorities which hold that a judgment creditor suing to set aside, as fraudulent, a conveyance by the judgment debtor, must prove the existence of the debt on which it was rendered at the time of the conveyance, and that the judgment does not prove such fact, and, after stating that the cause under consideration was not such an action, held that the judgment in that case was evidence of its own existence, and of its legal effects, as against the mortgagee. In Hoerr v. Meikofer, 77 Minn. 228, 77 Am.

St. Rep. 674, 79 N. W. 964, an action was brought by the assignee of a judgment creditor to test the validity of a fraudulent grant of certain real estate, and the point was made on the part of the defense that there was no evidence of the indebtedness prior to the entry of judgment. The point was sustained upon the ground that the proof as to the prior indebtedness was indefinite and insufficient; and, while the court referred to the cases of Bloom v. Moy, 43 Minn. 397, 19 Am. St. Rep. 243, 45 N. W. 715, and Hartman v. Weiland, 36 Minn. 223, 30 N. W. 815, the question of the nature of the indebtedness and its legal sufficiency was neither involved nor discussed. These cases are the only ones to which our attention has been called in and he cannot bring a writ of error to reverse it, he may allege and prove its invalidity in any proceeding in which it is sought to be used to his prejudice. So an alleged fraudulent grantee can attack a judgment on which an action to set aside his conveyance is based on the ground that the judgment was void for lack of jurisdiction in the court pronouncing it. Collinson v. Jackson, 8 Sawy. 357, 14 Fed. 305.

In an action by a receiver of a corporation to set aside fraudulent transfers made by it, the receiver had been appointed such in an action by a creditor to sequester its property, and based upon a judgment recovered against the corporation in a city court, which was stated in the complaint, and it was held that the defendants in this action could not attack collaterally the judgment in the sequestration action upon the ground that, the corporation not being a resident of, or doing business in, the city, the city court in the first action had no jurisdiction; the allegations of the complaint were sufficient, and, although the court might have erred in regarding the original judgment as valid, that was a question of law for the court in the sequestration action to decide, and its error, if there were such, was a judicial one to be corrected by an appeal in it. Jones v. Blun, 145 N. Y. 333, 39 N. E. 954.

And an alleged fraudulent grantee may set up that the court, in the action in which the judgment on which the creditor's bill is based was entered, lost jurisdiction of the case when the plaintiff in his attachment proceedings failed to publish notice of the proceedings within thirty days after the return day of the writ, as required by the statute; the attachment lien acquired by service of the writ on property is preserved for that time awaiting notice, but, if this next step in the proceedings fails to be taken within the time, the lien is not retained, and, as the plaintiff in attachment never obtained a valid judgment, he was never in a position as a judgment creditor to question the conveyance by the defendant. Millar v. Babcock, 29 Mich. 526.

But when the judgment upon which a creditor's suit to set aside a conveyance as fraudulent is based, has been obtained by a substituted service upon the defendant, even though the proof upon which the order for substituted service is made is sufficient to give the court jurisdiction to make the order, in the action against the defendant's grantee such proof is not conclusive as bearing upon the validity of the judgment, and the defendant grantee may prove that his grantor, the defendant in the first action, was a nonresident at the time of the service, and so not a person upon whom substituted service could legally be made. Buswell v. Lincks, 8 Daly, 518.

In a case where the plaintiff in a bill in equity had recovered judgment, actually contrary to the statute, against the defendant who was out of the commonwealth and had no notice of the suit, it was held that the alleged fraudulent grantee was entitled to impeach the plaintiff's judgment in the same manner as if it had been recovered by collusion with the debtor, on the ground that, not being either party or privy to the judgment, he was not entitled to reverse it by a writ of error. Downs v. Fuller, 2 Met. 135, 35 Am. Dec. 393.

Under the rule that a grantee from a person who died after making the conveyance may, as an executor de son tort, make any defense against the demand of a creditor of his grantor which his decedent or his rival representative could make, he can avail himself of the fact that his grantor was not a party to a probate court decree, under which the complainant in the creditor's bill to set aside his conveyance, and the grantor, were liable as co-sureties; the decree as to strangers was res inter alios acta. Means v. Hicks, 65 Ala. 241.

And it has been held that a creditor's action to set aside a fraudulent conveyance cannot be predicated upon a judgment by default when the service of process was not shown in the judgment to have been personal, the return merely stating that the summons was "executed." Heirman v. Stricklin, 60 Miss. 234.

When the judgment upon which a complainant in a bill in equity to set aside a conveyance as fraudulent was rendered jointly in favor of the complainant against two persons, one of whom was the grantor in the conveyance sought to be set aside, and the other was a nonresident of the state; and no legal service was made upon him,—the grantee might impeach the original judgment as void, since, as to the nonresident defendant, the court had no jurisdiction, and as against him the judgment was therefore void; but the judgment, being an entirety, if void in part was void in all, and the grantee, not being a party or privy to the judgment, might avail himself of any ille-which this court has, either directly or indirectly, referred to the question now under consideration. It will be observed that in no case since Bruggerman v. Hoerr was there involved the proposition that the claim upon which the judgment was predicated must be shown to have had a legal existence prior to the time of the conveyance sought to be set aside. In the case before us the question is squarely presented, and, in our opinion, must be decided contrary to respondents' contention, and to some of the views expressed in Bruggerman v. Hoerr.

It is elementary that, where the court has jurisdiction of the parties and the subject-matter of a particular case, its judgment, unless reversed or annulled in some proper proceeding, is not open to attack or impeachment by parties or privies in any collateral action or proceeding whatever. The rule is thus stated by Mr. Black in his work on Judgments, and it is firmly established by all the courts of this country and of England. It is unnecessary to refer to the Minnesota decisions in support of this doctrine. They are many, and cover nearly every phase of the question. The exceptions to the rule are also well defined, and are set forth in detail in Bump on Fraudulent Conveyances, p. 576, and there is an elaborate discussion of the subject in 1 Black, Judgments, 2d ed., commencing at § 245. Our own court, in numerous decisions, has recognized the exceptions, but we will not review them; and it is enough to state gality in It. Buffum v. Ramsdell, 55 Me. 252, 92 Am. Dec. 589.

Directly contrary to this is an old Vermont case, Tappan v. Nutting, Brayton (Vt.) 137, on stronger facts. In an action of ejectment based upon a sale upon execution which was extended upon the land as fraudulently conveyed by the judgment debtor, the defendant could not impeach the judgment against his grantors upon the ground that the files in the original action did not show that service had been made upon all of the grantors; the court saying that this was a collateral attack, and that "the judgment must be considered valid until set aside by proceedings brought directly on the judgment and for that purpose."

Where the grantor has admitted service the case would seem to be clear. The court properly sustained the plaintiff's demurrer to an amendment to the answer of an alleged fraudulent grantee, that in the action on which the present action was based the only evidence of the service of the original summons was an acceptance of service, indorsed upon it and signed by the grantor defendant; but that such acceptance was made outside the state, and that he made no appearance in the action; when in the judgment the fact that the acceptance of service was made without the state was not shown, and it was regular upon its face. The question as to the validity of the judgment was one in which the defendant grantee had no concern, and the law would not permit him to assert a claim in which he had no concern merely for the protection of the interest of another; so long as the judgment debtor is content to permit the judgment to be enforced against his property, the grantee cannot be heard to assert that the court rendering it had no jurisdiction of the person of the debtor. Wright v. Mahaffey, 76 Iowa, 96, 40 N. W. 112. See also, in connection with these cases, King v. Baer, 31 Misc. 308, 64 N. Y. Supp. 228; Johnson v. Parrotte, 46 Neb. 51, 64 N. W. 363; Parmenter v. Lomax, 68 Kan. 61, 74 Pac. 635; Denman v. McGuire, 101 N. Y. 161, 4 N. E. 278; Anderson v. Hawhe, 115 Ill. 33, 3 N. E. 566,—infra, VI., a.

d. Attack for fraud or collusion.

1. Fraud.

The fraud for which a judgment can usually be impeached by the fraudulent grantee is not fraud in the transaction which formed the basis of the judgment (as to this, see supra, III., C, 8); but it is fraud in the taking or entering of the judgment, or in inducing the defendant in that action to submit to the judgment.

Collusion, in this connection, is a fraud primarily against the grantee from the judgment debtor, and a conspiracy against his rights; fraud in the judgment, on the other hand, may be only against the judgment debtor, but such, nevertheless, that his grantee is entitled, by a collateral attack upon the judgment, to set up the fraud as a defense, when his conveyance is attacked, and when the grantor, from negligence or by reason of estoppel or insolvency, or any one of various circumstances, fails to make a direct attack upon the judgment as fraudulently rendered, and to have it vacated.

So the defendant grantee is not precluded by the judgment from showing that the plaintiff had not in fact any subsisting claim against the defendant grantor, but that the judgment was founded wholly upon fraud and injustice. Thrasher v. Haines, 2 N. H. 443.

Fraud in procuring the execution of the bond on which judgment was taken, and further fraud in persuading the obligor to suffer judgment to be taken against him, together formed a sufficient defense to an alleged fraudulent grantee. Faris v. Durham, 5 T. B. Mon. 397, 17 Am. Dec. 77. And Gottlieb v. Thatcher, 34 Fed. 435, supra, III., c. 8, upon similar facts, reaches the same conclusion.

When the defendants, in an action to set aside as fraudulent a conveyance between them, allege that the grantor, the defendant in the judgment on which the plaintiff's action is based, was induced by the persuasions and fraud of the plaintiff's husband acting for her to permit judgment to go against him by default, as an accommodation to the plaintiff, to enable her to protect her rights in another action, although the debt for which judgment was taken had already been discharged and paid, all these facts are proper evidence for the consideration of the court, and, when established, constitute a valid defense. Richardson v. Trimble, 38 Hun, 409.

In ejectment for lands upon which an execution was levied upon a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, where it appeared that the defendant's grantor had conveyed to the defend that it is generally held that judgments cannot be impeached in a collateral proceeding except for fraud, collusion, or want of jurisdiction.

The decisions above reviewed establish the rule that a judgment is not proof of the prior existence of the claims upon which it is based, in a case where the judgment creditor seeks to reach the property which was conveyed prior to the entry of the judgment. The reason of the rule is plain. It is of no consequence to the judgment creditor what the judgment debtor may have done with his property prior to the time he became a creditor. As to him, the judgment debtor may give away his property, or convey it with a fraudulent purpose. Only those creditors who became such prior to the time of the fraudulent conveyance have a right to complain; hence the necessity of showing the existence of the claim prior to the conveyance. But there is no reason why the judgment finally entered in pursuance of the litigation between the original parties should not be binding upon the grantee in all other respects the same as between the parties to the judgment. The doctrine that judgments will not be disturbed has its foundation in the necessity of bringing to an end, within reasonable limits, all questions that have arisen, or might have arisen, with respect to the controversy; and if the judgment debtor himself is cut off from again litigating or from introducing new defenses which might have been introduced in the original action, for the same reason those who take under him should be subject to the same limitation. These two thoroughly established rules of law are not inconsistent, and may be construed together, giving each equal force.

Of the authorities directly in point where the judgment was entered subsequent to the ant all his land, including that in question, in consideration of the defendant's promise to pay all his debts, including that to the plaintiffs; and that the defendant, claiming to have an offset against the plaintiff's claim, had paid half of it and released his set-off to them, the compromise being intended as a full satisfaction of the plaintiff's claim; but that later the plaintiffs sued the grantor for the unpaid half of their claim, and took judgment against him by consent, but without the knowledge of the defendant in the ejectment action, upon execution following which judgment they claimed the land,—it was held, assuming that the conveyance was fraudulent, that the judgment, being altogether inter alios and in express violation of the understanding of the compromise in agreed satisfaction of the whole, could have no effect upon the defendant, and that he was entitled to show that the defendant was paid before it was sued upon, or that the judgment was for other reasons fraudulent as to him. Ingalls v. Brooks, 29 Vt. 398.

The fact that the complainants in a creditor's bill to set aside fraudulent conveyances are the assignees in bankruptcy of the assignee of the judgments does not put them in any better situation in regard to defenses of fraud or collusion than the assignee of the judgments would have been in, since they have simply succeeded by operation of law to his rights. Anderson v. Tuttle, 26 N. J. Eq. 144.

If any part of a judgment upon which a bill in equity to set aside a conveyance of the judgment debtor as fraudulent is based, is fraudulent, the whole judgment is fraudulent, and the voluntary grantee must prevail. Curry v. Curry (Fa.) 11 Atl. 198.

But it was held in Peterson v. Farnum, 121 Mass. 476, that, under the right which a Massachusetts statute gives a judgment creditor to levy his execution upon lands "purchased, or directly or indirectly paid for, by him (the judgment debtor), the record title to which is retained by the vendor or is conveyed to a third person with intent to defeat, delay, or defraud the creditors of the debtor, or on a trust for him, express or implied, whereby he is entitled to a present conveyance,"—no such person, in whom the record title to land happens to be, has any right, as against the judgment creditor, to be heard upon the question whether the relation of debtor and creditor exists, or to what extent, other than such as the debtor himself has, and cannot, therefore, in any collateral proceeding, contest the validity or amount of the debt; and the trial judge properly refused to charge that, if the judgment was for a materially larger sum than the amount actually due, owing to false testimony, the levy was void as against the defendant.

And again, in an early New York case, upon a bill to discover property of judgment debtors and alleging fraud in assignments made by such debtors to other defendants, the vice chancellor declared that it was not necessary that he should examine the objections raised against the validity of the complainant's judgment, which now properly belonged to the court of law, where any irregularity in the manner of obtaining the judgment, or any fraudulent and collusive means resorted to for the purpose, can be examined; the court rendering the judgment was best able to determine what was irregular and how far its process had been abused. This, however, probably was regarded as merely a matter of irregularity. Hone v. Woolsey, 2 Edw. Ch. 289.

In some special cases similar decisions have been made.

A voluntary grantee was held not entitled to set up as a defense to a bill in equity that the complainant and the grantor had agreed that, in consideration of the payment by the grantor, which was done, of one half of the amount of the note, for the whole of which judgment was later taken, and which was a joint note by the grantor and his brother, the complainants would dismiss their action as to the grantor and probate their claim for the remainder against the estate of the brother, which last they had fraudulently failed to do; even if this would have been a valid defense to the action on the note, not having been made by the defendant in that action it could not be set up by his grantee; the judgment at law settled the fact of the continued existence of the debt, and also the amount of the indebtedness. Davidson date of the conveyance, see Candee v. Lord, 2 N. Y. 269, 51 Am. Dec. 294; Sidensparker v. Sidensparker, 52 Me. 481, 83 Am. Dec. 527; Scott v. Indianapolis Wagon Works, 48 Ind. 75; Strong v. Lawrence, 58 Iowa, 55, 12 N. W. 74; Minnesota Thresher Mfg. Co. v. Schaaok, 10 S. D. 511, 74 N. W. 445.

The point is made that appellant cannot maintain this action for the reason that the Hahl claim was never proved in the bankruptcy proceedings, and that the trustee does not represent the creditor. It was found by the court that the claim was filed, and allowed by the referee. The claim necessarily included the notes and judgment, although not specifically mentioned. We think this is sufficient, and respondent is not in position to take advantage of any irregularity, if any there was, in the filing of the claim. The trustee in bankruptcy is authorized by the bankrupt act to take such proceedings as may be necessary to protect the creditors of the estate; and the claim having been allowed, and the trustee having assumed jurisdiction by the commencement of this action, it is immaterial in what particular form the claim may have been proved up. This action is based upon the judgment. It is admitted in the answer that the notes were executed and the judgment rendered. The court so found, and the respondent is not permitted to raise any question in reference to the manner or method of entry of the judgment,—whether upon confession or by stipulation. In the absence of evidence to show that it was fraudulently entered, he is bound by it as a claim in bankruptcy, the same as in all other cases.

Judgment reversed, with directions to enter judgment for appellant for the relief demanded in his complaint.

v. Burke, 143 Ill. 149, 36 Am. St. Rep. 367, 32 N. E. 514.

And where a creditor under a judgment in a state court acquired two other judgments rendered in the same court against the same judgment debtor, and all of the judgments were for sums less than $2,000, but the aggregate of them was for more than $3,000; and the judgment creditor sued in the same court on all three judgments and recovered judgments in his own name, on which executions sued out were returned nulla bona; and he then filed a bill in a Federal district court to vacate alleged fraudulent conveyances from the debtor to his wife and son,—It was held that the defendant grantee's plea to the jurisdiction on the ground that the complainant held the judgments which it had bought only colorably and fraudulently, but sued and secured judgment on them together in order to raise the amount so as to give the United States court jurisdiction, was invalid, since the judgment of the state court was conclusive as to the judgment debtor, and because, in the absence of allegations of lack of jurisdiction in the state court as to either the parties or the subject matter, and of any collusion or fraud in the obtaining of the judgments, it is also conclusive upon the judgment debtor's grantees in a creditor's bill to set aside their conveyances. Alkire Grocery Co. v. Richesin, 91 Fed. 79.

2. Collusion.

An alleged fraudulent grantee may attack the judgment on which his grantor's judgment creditor seeks to have the conveyance set aside, on the ground that the judgment was obtained by covin or collusion. Carter v. Bennett, 4 Fla. 283; King v. Tharp, 26 Iowa, 288. The same thing is intimated in Hafner v. Irwin, 26 N. C. (4 Ired. L.) 529; Minnesota Thresher Mfg. Co. v. Schaaok, 10 S. D. 511, 74 N. W. 445; and Pabst Brewing Co. v. Jensen, 68 Minn. 293, 71 N. W. 384.

Upon trustee process it was held that the trustee and the claimant, who had joined with the principal defendant in a fraudulent arrangement, void as to bona fide creditors of the defendant, might show before the commissioner 67 L. R. A.

that the plaintiff was not a bona fide creditor of the defendant, but had prosecuted his action and obtained his judgment for the sole benefit of the defendant, and to enable him by the trustee process to reach the funds claimed to be in the trustee's hands. Boutwell v. McClure, 30 Vt. 674.

Although equity will not ordinarily look behind the judgments and assignments of judgments on which creditors' bills are based, nevertheless, where the bill is filed in order to have property to which other persons have title declared to be the property of the judgment debtor, to be held in trust for him and to be sold to pay the amount due the complainant; and where it appears from the evidence that the judgments against the debtor were assigned to the complainant to the judgment debtor's knowledge and connivance, and that he is the real complainant,—the court will not aid the fraudulent debtor to do by indirection what it would not assist him to do directly, namely, to set aside his own conveyances; and the assignee in such case stands in no better position than the judgment debtor himself. Anderson v. Tuttle, 26 N. J. Eq. 144.

In an action of ejectment by one holding under a voluntary deed against a purchaser on an execution sale on a judgment against the voluntary grantor, the judgment under which the defendant holds is not conclusive upon the plaintiff, but he may be allowed to go into evidence that there was no debt existing from the defendant to the plaintiff in that action at the time the judgment was taken. In such a case if this were not so the plaintiff's land might be sold under a judgment confessed subsequently to his deed for a debt alleged to be prior, although he could prove that the debt was feigned, and the judgment covinous and fraudulent as to him. This is certainly not the rule of law, nor of justice. If a judgment between other persons be given in evidence to affect the rights of the third person, neither party nor privy to the judgment, he may show that it was set on foot by covin, and thus avoid it. The plaintiff here was neither party nor privy in respect of land which he held by a previous deed. Posten v. Posten, 4 Whart. 27.

But in a creditor's bill to set aside a fraudulent conveyance, when the plaintiff offered in evidence in support of the justice of his claim at law no evidence other than the record and judgment in the suit at law, although the defendants maintained that the demand upon their grantor was not just, and that the judgment at law was obtained by the collusion and fraud of the plaintiff and of the administrator of the grantor, judgment was for the plaintiff. Chamberlayne v. Temple, 2 Rand. (Va.) 384, 14 Am. Dec. 786.

A defense setting up that, owing to the negligence of the debtor, judgment was recovered for a larger amount than was due the creditor, was immaterial except in so far as the matter thus set up tended to show collusion or fraud; and the conclusiveness of this evidence is not affected by the fact that the judgment was recovered after the making of the conveyance. Swihart v. Shaum, 24 Ohio St. 432.

e. Attack for irregularity.

In a very few cases a successful attack has been made upon the judgment upon the ground of irregularity; but for the most part mere irregularity will not avail the grantee.

So, on a creditor's bill to subject to a judgment property fraudulently transferred, an objection made to the regularity of the judgment cannot be decided by a court of equity. Suydam v. Beals, 4 McLean, 12, Fed. Cas. No. 13, 653; Barnard v. Darling, 1 Barb. Ch. 218; Williams v. Hubbard, 1 Mich. 446.

And the defendant cannot attack the judgment on which the bill is brought as for lack of jurisdiction in the court, when the ground of the attack is not that the tribunal had no power to enter upon the inquiry, but merely that its methods were not regular, its findings right, or its conclusion in accordance with the law. Johnson v. Miller, 50 Ill. App. 60; Moore & H. Hardware Co. v. Curry, 106 Ala. 284, 18 So. 46.

The grantee cannot impeach the judgment because it appears by the record that there was one special count in the declaration upon the note sued upon, and the common counts, and that on the default the court ordered the clerk to assess the damages upon the count on the note without any withdrawal of the common counts. Newman v. Willits, 60 Ill. 519.

The complaint is sufficient as to the debt upon which the judgment was recovered, although it has not the definiteness required in a complaint to recover the debt, if it alleges that the judgment was rendered in an action pending; the statement that the judgment was rendered "duly" need not be used, for the regularity of the judgment, or its freedom from error, cannot be collaterally called in question. Scanlan v. Murphy, 51 Minn. 536, 53 N. W. 799.

So the grantee cannot effectually object to the judgment because no affidavit of the authority of the attorney is annexed to the offer of judgment, this being a mere irregularity of which third parties cannot take advantage. St. John Woodworking Co. v. Smith, 82 App. Div. 348, 82 N. Y. Supp. 1025.

And it cannot be impeached because, although it purports to be by default, the defendant in the action has in fact duly answered and tendered material issues for trial. Dreyfuss v. 67 L. R. A.

Charles Seale & Co. 18 Misc. 551, 41 N. Y. Supp. 875.

The grantee cannot avail himself of the defense that the judgment is void for being irregularly entered upon a warrant signed in blank and afterwards filled up after the signature by the magistrate; and, even if a party to the judgment could directly avail himself of this as an error, he could not, and much less can third persons, question the sufficiency of the judgment incidentally. Hafner v. Irwin, 26 N. C. (4 Ired. L.) 529.

The objection to a judgment that it is against two persons named, "partners doing business as," etc., and is against the firm, and not against the individual defendants, will not avail. First Nat. Bank v. Sloman, 42 Neb. 350, 47 Am. St. Rep. 707, 60 N. W. 589.

The defendant grantee cannot object that the record of the original judgment did not show that the case had been redocketed in the trial court. Quinn v. People, 146 Ill. 275, 34 N. E. 148.

But in a case where a judgment of an Iowa district court was not properly recorded in the index of liens, as was required by law in order to make it an effective lien upon the judgment debtor's real estate, the defendant, in an action to set aside as fraudulent a conveyance of land to him from the judgment debtor was entitled to judgment. State Ins. Co. v. Prestage, 116 Iowa. 466, 90 N. W. 62.

In accord with this is National Bank v. Levy, 17 N. Y. S. R. 529, 2 N. Y. Supp. 162, deciding that, where the original judgment in an action to set aside a fraudulent conveyance of land is not shown by the complaint to have been entered or docketed in the county where the real estate was situated, the complaint must be dismissed.

But in a later case of equal authority the contrary is upheld, and it is said to be enough that the plaintiff has recovered judgment, that execution has issued upon it, and that it has been returned unsatisfied. Lanahan v. Caffrey, 40 App. Div. 124, 57 N. Y. Supp. 724.

Although it is generally true that an erroneous judgment is to be avoided only by a writ of error, this rule does not apply to cases where a party has a right to impeach a judgment illegally rendered, and yet has no right to reverse it by a writ of error; if the judgment has not been obtained by collusion with the debtor, or with any fraudulent design, yet, if it was unlawfully recovered, to the injury of a third person, who cannot reverse it for error, not being a party thereto, he can avoid it in the same manner. Thus, where the basis of the plaintiff's claim was a judgment, the execution on which was presented as evidence to commissioners in insolvency in support of the claim, which was thereupon allowed and reported, an order of distribution being made; but the defendant grantee was a party neither to the judgment nor to the proceedings before the commissioners,—the grantee, if he could successfully impeach the judgment, might also impeach the allowance of the plaintiff's claim based upon it; and since in the original action, one of the defendants having died, the other one having obtained his certificate in discharge in bankruptcy directed counsel to appear no further in the action, in which an appeal had been taken, and the appeal was dismissed, damages being entered without direction of the court or notice to the surviving defendant or the administrator of the deceased,—it was held that, the judgment not having been obtained on a verdict or default, and there being nothing to show that the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict, nor any adjudication by the court, when it was agreed that the defendant's plea should be recorded bad, the defendant grantee could not be bound by the agreement on which the judgment was rendered; for "persons injuriously affected by a judgment, though not recovered by collusion of the parties, have a right to avoid it." Caswell v. Caswell, 28 Me. 232.

So in Sargent v. Salmond, 27 Me. 539, it is held that the grantee is entitled to impeach the judgment in the creditor's action upon the ground that it appears from the whole record of the judgment that the plaintiff took judgment for a sum larger than that to which he had a just claim.

See also, in connection with these cases, Epstein v. Ferst, 35 Fla. 498, 17 So. 414, and Wilhelm v. Locklar (Fla.) 35 So. 6, infra, VI., a.

f. Unintentional default in the original action.

A judgment for money against one making a voluntary settlement is conclusive in respect to the parties to it, and it cannot be impeached collaterally or questioned upon a creditor's bill, upon the ground, merely, that the judgment was rendered by default, and that the settlor, the defendant in the judgment, had intended to defend, and could have done so successfully, but was prevented by extreme illness. Mattingly v. Nye, 8 Wall. 370, 19 L. ed. 380.

g. Attack for matters arising since the judgment.

1. Dormancy.

This defense should be distinguished from that of the statute of limitations, which was a defense to the original action, and is treated supra, III., c. 2.

A petition which alleges that the plaintiff has recovered a judgment against one of the defendants, which is unsatisfied, and that a sale from that defendant to another defendant was in fraud of the right of the plaintiff, and asking that that other defendant be declared to be the creditor of the first defendant, and to compel the other defendant to render an accounting for the goods conveyed to him, and that the property be subjected to the payment of the plaintiff's judgment, is a creditor's bill, and the plaintiff's right to the relief sought depends entirely upon the existence of the judgment. Such a proceeding is entirely ancillary to the judgment and in aid of the execution upon it, and if, during the pendency of the action, the plaintiff's judgment becomes dormant by statutory limitation so that execution can no longer be issued upon it, the action must entirely fail. Miller v. Melone, 11 Okla. 241, 56 L. R. A. 620, 67 Pac. 479.

And when the plaintiff, instead of reviving his judgment in the way pointed out by the statute, merely obtains a written consent of the original defendant, this will not help him. Ibid.

The owner of a dormant judgment, on which, under the statute, after ten years, no scire facias can issue to revive it, and no execution can be issued, has no status as a judgment creditor to set aside a fraudulent conveyance of the debtor. Moreover, he cannot be said to have exhausted his legal remedies until he has sued on the judgment, renewed it, taken out his execution, and levied upon any legal or equitable interest of the judgment debtor. Mullen v. Hewitt, 103 Mo. 639, 15 S. W. 924.

Since the statutory lien of the judgment on the real estate in question is the predicate on which a court of equity will intervene in aid of the judgment as by removing clouds upon the title or setting aside a fraudulent conveyance of the land, so it will altogether refrain from intermeddling if the lien has expired and no longer binds the property; accordingly, a demurrer is sustained, upon the ground that seven years had passed since the rendition of the judgment on which the creditor's action is based before the second action was brought. Partee v. Mathews, 53 Miss. 140.

The principle of Partee v. Mathews, 53 Miss. 140, was later followed, and it was declared that in the case of a fraudulent conveyance which is recorded the doctrine of concealed fraud will not apply so as to prevent the running of the statute against the creditor. Fleming v. Grafton, 54 Miss. 79.

But in Postlewait v. Howes, 3 Iowa, 365, it is held that an alleged fraudulent grantee cannot attack the plaintiff's judgment upon the ground that it is dormant, in that execution is not issued upon it within five years of the date of its rendition, when the judgment remains a lien on the real estate of the judgment debtor for ten years, and the statute of limitations cannot be successfully pleaded to an action brought upon it until after the lapse of twenty years. This is true although the judgment creditor could not after the lapse of the five years, even after obtaining his judgment in the creditor's suit, obtain execution upon his first judgment without reviving it by a scire facias.

In Texas, where a judgment lien is not necessary to the action (see Arbuckle Bros. Coffee Co. v. Werner, 77 Tex. 45, 13 S. W. 963), the filing of a creditor's bill to set aside a fraudulent conveyance, after the return nulla bona of the execution on the original judgment, fixes a claim in the nature of an equitable lien upon the property sought to be subjected to the judgment, so that the judgment cannot become dormant, and it is not necessary to proceed further in the original action by keeping up the issuance of the executions; the action to avoid the conveyance and subject the land to the debt affords a basis for full relief. Cole v. Terrell, 71 Tex. 549, 9 S. W. 668.

So the objection that the lien of the judgment on which a creditor's bill was based had expired by limitation of the statute before the entering of the decree on the creditor's bill does not avail, for the reason that the filing of the bill itself created a lien in equity upon the effects of the judgment debtor, amounting to an equitable levy. Davidson v. Burke, 143 Ill. 149, 36 Am. St. Rep. 367, 32 N. E. 514.

2. Waiver or estoppel.

The case of a judgment creditor suing to set aside a conveyance as fraudulent cannot be attacked upon the ground that, from his forbearance for a long time to enforce his rights, he must be held to have waived, or is estopped to set up his claim. Sidensparker v. Sidensparker, 52 Me. 481, 83 Am. Dec. 527, Distinguishing Sargent v. Salmond, 27 Me. 541, infra, VI., 1, 2.

3. Satisfaction.

A demurrer was sustained to a complaint, in an action to set aside a conveyance as fraudulent, alleging that the judgment upon which it is brought has been fully paid by an execution sale of personal property taken by the sheriff as the property of the judgment debtor, although it also alleges that the fraudulent grantee has obtained a judgment against the sheriff who enforced the writ of execution for the value of the property levied upon, and that, the sheriff having obtained a stay of proceedings, if the judgment against him is not set aside, but entered against him, the plaintiff in this action will move the court for an order setting aside the sheriff's return of the writ of execution. The foundation of the plaintiff's case is destroyed by the allegation that the property has been sold under execution, and that the execution is satisfied in full; and the further allegation that, if the litigation between the sheriff and the fraudulent grantee is finally determined in favor of the latter, it is the plaintiff's intention to move to set aside the sheriff's return and to reinstate the judgment, is not a statement of any fact, but a mere assertion of intent. Minneapolis Threshing Mach. Co. v. Jones, 89 Minn. 184, 94 N. W. 551.

Where two judgments were entered against the grantor as maker upon two notes, one of which was collateral to the other, and one had an indorser, the judgment upon the collateral note was satisfied by the satisfaction of the judgment on the principal note; and, an execution and sale after the satisfaction of the principal judgment being unauthorized, this fact would avail the grantee. Lynch v. Burt, 132 Fed. 417. And see the case of Gottlieb v. Thatcher, 34 Fed. 435, supra, III., c. 8.

But, on a petition to set aside a voluntary conveyance of land as made to defeat a personal deficiency judgment on foreclosure. It is no objection to the petitioner's right to a decree that he bought the premises on foreclosure at a figure much below their actual value. Bohde v. Lawless, 33 N. J. Eq. 412.

4. Intervening judgment in favor of a stranger.

In an action to determine the adverse claims of the parties to real estate the plaintiff claimed under a statutory foreclosure sale, the defendant alleging the assignment to him of a judgment against the defendant in foreclosure in favor of a third person, and that under that judgment the defendant redeemed the land from the foreclosure sale, receiving a sheriff's certificate of redemption; alleging, also, that a stranger had obtained a judgment against the plaintiff setting aside the foreclosure sale under which he claimed, and adjudging the title to be in the stranger. The plaintiff, in reply, denied the validity of the judgment which had been assigned to the defendant and under which the alleged redemption was made, and alleged collusion between the original defendant and the person obtaining the judgment against him. It was held that the judgment in favor of the stranger against the plaintiff, declaring the foreclosure and the sale to the plaintiff under it void, did not affect this defendant, who was 67 L. R. A.

not a party to that action; that he acquired no rights through that judgment, and stood in no relation of privity with the prevailing party in that action; the judgment could no more operate as an estoppel in his favor and against the plaintiff than it could have prejudiced him if the judgment had declared the foreclosure valid; and that the title to the land was in the plaintiff. Maloney v. Finnegan, 40 Minn. 281, 41 N. W. 979.

So the defendant in an action to set aside his conveyance as in fraud of the grantor's creditors cannot defend upon the ground that the plaintiff's deed to the property, for the rent of which she had recovered her judgment against the grantor, had been set aside as fraudulent, for the reason that the defendant was not a party to the action in which the plaintiff's deed was set aside, nor a creditor of the plaintiff's grantor, and he cannot be heard to complain of the deed to the plaintiff. Yetzer v. Yetzer, 112 Iowa, 162, 83 N. W. 889.

5. Intervening bankruptcy.

A discharge in bankruptcy of a judgment debtor does not affect a lien of judgments against him, so as to be a bar to a bill to set aside his voluntary conveyance. The bankrupt is discharged personally from judgments; but the lien of a judgment against him, which had attached to property before the adjudication in bankruptcy, is still a lien. The appointment of an assignee, and the assignment to him in pursuance of the law, vest in him the property of the bankrupt, but in the precise condition it was in at the time of the adjudication. He stands in the shoes of the bankrupt, and takes property subject to all liens and equities which could have been enforced against it if bankruptcy had not occurred. Davis v. Lumpkin, 57 Miss. 506.

A discharge in bankruptcy, obtained during the pendency of an action begun after a fraudulent conveyance by the insolvent, is no bar to a bill in equity based upon the judgment obtained after the discharge and seeking to set aside the fraudulent conveyance. This is true although it was the duty of the assignee in bankruptcy to bring an action to set aside the fraudulent conveyance on behalf of creditors. State v. Williams, 9 Baxt. 64.

A creditor who has obtained a valid judgment, after the discharge of his debtor in bankruptcy, upon a pre-existing claim, may proceed against any property rightfully subject to his debt; the bankrupt cannot object to the bill, having lost all his property, and the fraudulent vendee is in no danger of two recoveries for the same cause of action, since the property is the subject of the litigation, and cannot be recovered from him a second time. Ibid.

6. Pendency of other proceedings.

The defendant grantee in an action to set aside a conveyance fraudulent as against creditors cannot set up as a bar to the action the fact that proceedings supplementary to execution have been instituted on the original judgment. Faber v. Matz, 86 Wis. 370, 57 N. W. 39.

IV. Status of the grantee as affecting his right to attack the judgment.

In order to entitle a creditor to impeach a conveyance of his debtor for want of consideration where there is no fraud, it must appear that he was a creditor, and a judgment in his favor against the grantor is not conclusive against the grantee who is no party to it, and he may, as a general rule, show that the judgment was collusive and not founded on actual indebtedness or liability; but where the grantee defended the action on which the creditor's bill is based, not only as agent of his grantor, but also in his own behalf to protect the property conveyed to him by the defendant in that suit, he cannot be permitted to try again the question of indebtedness, and to prove that at the time of the conveyance to him no actual indebtedness existed from his grantor to the plaintiff in the later action. Church v. Chapin, 35 Vt. 223.

But where two persons submitted a controversy as to an account to arbitrators, who made a report, upon which a judgment was entered, and the successful party sought to subject to this judgment land which the other party had in the meantime conveyed to a third person, who had been present at the arbitration and had managed the case for his grantor, it was held that the grantee, as defendant in equity, was not precluded from attempting to show that at the time of the recovery by the plaintiff he had not in fact any subsisting debt against the grantor, but that the judgment was founded altogether upon fraud and injustice. The grantee was not in the proper sense of the terms either a party or privy to the judgment, and it had never been decided that he was to be precluded merely because he was the agent for the unsuccessful party; although he was the agent, his principal might have neglected to furnish him the means and to give him proper instructions for resisting the claim, and the reference or arbitration might have been entered into, not only without consulting him, but even against his will. Thrasher v. Haines, 2 N. H. 443.

The parties to an action and the persons in privity with them cannot collaterally attack or impeach a judgment for fraud, and any attack must be regarded as collateral which is made in any proceeding which is not instituted for the express purpose of annulling, correcting, or modifying the judgment or decree. Thus, where a corporation, for the purpose of defrauding judgment creditors, made a conveyance to the president of the corporation, the latter cannot set up fraud in the procurement of the judgment, which the defendant corporation negligently failed to have reversed; the corporation could not now set up the invalidity of the judgment, and the defendant grantee, being in privity with it, can occupy no better position than it does. Johnson v. Stebbins-Thompson Realty Co. 167 Mo. 325, 66 S. W. 933.

Grantees from a decedent in his lifetime, who are also his heirs, are not concluded from attacking an allowance of the plaintiff's claim against the administrator, to which he only was a party defendant, for the reason that they took counsel and considered the advisability of employing attorneys to aid the administrator in resisting the claim. Willett v. Malli, 65 Iowa, 675, 22 N. W. 922.

According to a special rule, a plaintiff in a creditor's action against the fraudulent grantee of a person since dead, to have the conveyance set aside, must proceed as if the grantee were an executor de son tort, and the grantee, as such executor, can make any defense against the demand with which he is sought to be charged which the decedent or his rival representative could make. Means v. Hicks, 65 Ala. 241.

Where a bill to set aside as fraudulent a conveyance of a person since dead was dismissed as to certain of the complainants and some other creditors who had come in by petition, upon the ground that their claims had been barred by the statute of limitations, but an appeal by some of the complainants who had been brought in by petition was allowed, and the cause remanded, it was held that the fact that the administrator of the deceased grantor had in the meantime confessed judgments in favor of those creditors as to whom the bill had been dismissed on the plea of the statute did not change the condition of these claims in any way; the administrator had no power to waive the grantee's defense of limitations, nor could he, by such waiver, establish the claims of the complainants. McDowell v. Goldsmith, 24 Md. 214.

Voluntary grantees of an intestate may contest the validity of a judgment taken against their grantor's administrator, and the justice of the plaintiff's demand against the estate. Alexander v. Quigley, 2 Duv. 399.

In Chamberlayne v. Temple, 2 Rand. (Va.) 384, 14 Am. Dec. 786, supra, III., d, 2, however, grantees from a deceased person were not allowed to impeach on the ground of collusion a judgment against the administrator of their grantor.

V. How the objection to the judgment must be made.

The defendant grantee may set up that the statute of limitations barred the debt against his grantor before the beginning of the action on which the judgment of the complainant in a creditor's bill was rendered; but this objection, unless made by demurrer or answer, is waived, it being necessary to take the objection by a demurrer if the fact of the bar appears upon the face of the proceeding, otherwise it must be taken by answer. Davis v. Davis, 20 Or. 78, 25 Pac. 140.

But in Clark v. Anthony, 31 Ark. 546, it is held that the objection of the statute, or as to the parties to the original action, cannot be made by demurrer.

VI. The sufficiency of the judgment pleaded, to support the action.

a. Generally.

The question what judgments, as pleaded, may be made the basis of an action to set aside a fraudulent conveyance, is necessarily involved with that of the sufficiency of judgments as a foundation for creditors' bills, generally, which is a subject not intended to be covered by this note. It is believed, however, that all the cases involving judgments used as foundation for the action to set aside fraudulent conveyances are considered in this note, although it is not suggested that in most of the cases treated the principles involved are peculiar to that particular action or distinct from those governing creditor's bills generally.

The basis of every creditor's bill is an unimpeachable judgment, and the plaintiff is required to plead and prove his ownership of a valid and unsatisfied judgment; but this condition is not satisfied by a petition showing the rendering of a verdict in plaintiff's favor and the granting of an order setting it aside, and the appeal from that order to the supreme court, which reversed it and rendered in favor of the plaintiff a personal judgment, which he now owns and which is unsatisfied, since, under the Nebraska statute, the supreme court acquired no jurisdiction of an appeal from the order of the lower court granting a new trial, that order not being a final order; and hence the judgment was void for lack of jurisdiction. Johnson v. Parrotte, 46 Neb. 51, 64 N. W. 363.

A judgment entered by confession, which did not especially authorize the clerk to enter it, made without service of process when no suit was pending, and without any appearance by the defendant or any proof that he executed such a confession, when entered merely by the clerk, is invalid; and a creditor's bill to set aside as fraudulent a conveyance from the apparent judgment debtor cannot be maintained upon it. Epstein v. Ferst, 35 Fla. 498, 17 So. 414; Wilhelm v. Locklar (Fla.) 35 So. 6.

Naturally, a decree setting aside a fraudulent conveyance must be reversed, and the action dismissed, when based upon a judgment which, pending an appeal from the creditor's bill, was reversed. Kudrna v. Ainsworth, 65 Neb. 711, 91 N. W. 711.

When a creditor recovers judgment against the administrators of his debtor only for the amount of the assets found to be in the hands of the administrators, which are less than his claim, and for the rest of the claim judgment is entered for the administrators, he is not entitled, on the basis of his judgment, to proceed in equity against donees of his deceased debtor to have their conveyances set aside as fraudulent, since the judgment on which he bases his suit in equity is in favor of the administrators. Bridges v. Moye, 45 N. C. (Busbee, Eq.) 170.

And such a creditor's bill cannot be maintained upon a judgment void because the creditor had no jurisdiction, there being no personal service on the debt, although the action was commenced by an attachment, and an appearance was made by an attorney, who had no authority. Anderson v. Hawhe, 115 Ill. 33, 3 N. E. 566.

But upon a judgment obtained for a money demand on service by publication against the defendant, who was a nonresident and absent from the state, and by attachment of the defendant's land, which had been before conveyed to third persons, it was held that an action in the nature of a creditor's bill could be maintained to set aside the conveyances made by the debtor. The judgment obtained on service by publication was valid in all respects so far as the property seized was concerned. If this remedy were denied to the plaintiff he could get no relief against the alleged fraudulent conveyance made by his debtor so long as the latter and his grantees avoided personal service of process. Parmenter v. Lomax, 68 Kan. 61, 74 Pac. 635.

In a collateral attack by the defendant grantee, in an action to set aside his conveyance as fraudulent, upon the attachment and judgment in the original action against the grantor, in which jurisdiction was obtained by service of summons by publication, these proceedings should be upheld unless absolutely void for jurisdictional defects,—especially when the merits of the controversy have been decided against the fraudulent grantee, and even though there was unusual carelessness in the conduct of the proceedings, so that a court considering a motion made by the original defendant to set them aside might well hesitate to uphold them. This principle was applied in a case where it was objected that the affidavits upon which the order of publication was granted did not show that any effort had been made to serve the summons within the state, or that the plaintiff had used reasonable diligence to ascertain where the defendant would receive matter transmitted through the postoffice; and where the notice attached to the summons published did not state where the summons was filed as required by the Code. Denman v. McGuire, 101 N. Y. 161, 4 N. E. 278, Affirming 17 N. Y. Week. Dig. 504.

So the objection that the judgment on which the action is based was recovered upon service of the summons on only one of two partners is without merit, the return unsatisfied of the execution against the firm property under the judgment so obtained being sufficient to support an action by the judgment creditors to set aside the firm assignment and to reach firm assets. King v. Baer, 31 Misc. 308, 64 N. Y. Supp. 228. As to impeaching for lack of jurisdiction, vide supra, Ill., c. 12.

A judgment creditor's action to set aside a conveyance as fraudulent is permissible when based upon a judgment obtained by the same plaintiff against the alleged fraudulent grantor and his son, to set aside as fraudulent another conveyance from the son to the father, although the only basis of the second action is a judgment for the costs and disbursements in the first action, and although the second conveyance was made while the first action was pending and before the defendant's liability was fixed. McLaggan v. Smith, 35 Misc. 564, 71 N. Y. Supp. 1121.

Although the doctrine is well settled that, until he has exhausted his remedy at law, a court of equity will not assist a creditor to the satisfaction of his debt out of property fraudulently conveyed by the debtor, yet, when creditors are shut out by any reason from pursuing their remedy in a court of law, as when the debtor is dead and his estate is insolvent; and the law forbids a suit by a creditor against the personal representative; and they have established their claims by proof and registration in the chancery court as required by the statute, but have no judgment lien upon the property fraudulently conveyed,—they have a sufficient standing to maintain the action in equity. Hamilton v. Mississippi College, 52 Miss. 65.

But the allowance of a claim by commissioners of insolvency, and the report upon it and the order of distribution, can have no greater validity to the prejudice of a stranger than the judgment of another court; he has an equal right to impeach their proceedings by the same kind of evidence and in the same mode. Caswell v. Caswell, 28 Me. 232.

In an action to subject to the payment of the debt of a deceased person real estate which it is alleged the decedent conveyed to his heirs in his lifetime to defraud creditors, an allowance of the plaintiff's claim against the estate in the probate court in a proceeding in which only the administrator was actually before the court as a defendant is not even prima facie evidence of the correctness of the claim as against the heirs. Willett v. Malli, 65 Iowa, 675, 22 N. W. 922.

A creditor's bill may be maintained in a Federal court in New York to set aside a fraudulent transfer of a life-insurance policy assigned while the owner was insolvent, and based merely upon a decree in equity against the assignor and the grantee in the Florida Federal court, by which decree the amount of the complainant's debt was determined and the debtor adjudged to be entirely insolvent. Etna Nat. Bank v. Manhattan L. Ins. Co. 24 Fed. 769.

The judgment of another state cannot be the basis of a creditor's bill to set aside a fraudulent conveyance, but the judgment must be sued upon in the state in which the bill is brought before it becomes a judgment for any purpose. Before that is done it ranks as a simple contract debt, and equity will not assist the owner of such a judgment until he has exacted his remedy at law. Claflin v. McDermott, 20 Blatchf. 522, 12 Fed. 375, Following Tarbell v. Griggs, 3 Paige, 207, 23 Am. Dec. 790, and Davis v. Bruns, 23 Hun, 648. And in this respect judgments of Federal courts are in the same case as those of courts of sister states. Tarbell v. Griggs, 3 Paige, 207, 23 Am. Dec. 790.

So in an action in South Carolina to set aside as fraudulent a gift of an intestate, a judgment rendered in Georgia against the ancillary administrator there is not evidence of the indebtedness of the intestate's estate. King v. Clarke, 2 Hill, Eq. 611.

Under Mo. Rev. Stat. § 376, one who has not obtained a judgment in a court of law, but has received from the assignee of his debtor a certificate showing that the assignee has adjusted his claim,—ascertained and allowed the amount due,—has obtained an adjudication which is as final as if rendered by a court, having all the force, effect, and attributes of a judgment, and entitles him to maintain a suit to set aside a fraudulent conveyance of the assignor. Roan v. Wiun, 93 Mo. 503, 4 S. W. 736.

As to the question of the sufficiency, as a basis for a bill to set aside a fraudulent conveyance, of a judgment upon claims part of which are subsequent to the conveyance, vide supra, III., b.

b. Tort claims.

SCHMITT v. DAHL, by making recovery depend upon a "claim" existing before the conveyance, very properly includes tort claims; and this is in harmony with the cases, where there is a particular intent to defeat recovery on the claim.

So a deed made with intent to defeat a recovery by a third person of damages in an action of tort, and before trial and judgment, is fraudulent and void to the same extent as a conveyance to hinder and delay existing creditors. Johnson v. Wagner, 76 Va. 587, Following Jackson ex dem. Van Buren v. Myers, 18 Johns. 425; Greer v. Wright, 6 Gratt. 154, 52 Am. Dec. 111, and in accord with Mountford v. Randle, 2 Keble, 499.

The objection of an alleged fraudulent grantee that the claim upon which the plaintiff's suit is founded was one in tort, and so could not be regarded as a debt of the grantor, and the judgment was not taken upon it until after the date of the conveyance alleged to be fraudulent, will not avail when the deed in question was made in pursuance of an express intention on the part of both grantor and grantee to defeat the collection of the claim which the plaintiff at the time was prosecuting. Had the fraud no other object than to defeat existing creditors, defendant's position might be reasonable. But when its purpose is specific to defeat a claim for damages on account of tort, chancery will not permit it to triumph upon the ground that the claim was not regarded as a debt at the time the fraud was consummated. It has been held that a deed cannot be impeached for fraud if made before the debt sought to be enforced was contracted; but, if the conveyance was executed with a view to defraud one who would become a creditor in a transaction contemplated at the time, it will be set aside, and the claim will be enforced against the property. Miller v. Dayton, 47 Iowa, 312.

And especially one accepting a conveyance from another, who expressly avows his intention of defeating any recovery under a pending action for tort, cannot attack the judgment as rendered subsequent to the conveyance. Lillard v. McGee, 4 Bibb, 165.

But in Hill v. Bowman, 35 Mich. 191, and Hall v. Sands, 52 Me. 355, a disputed claim for damages in tort before it has been reduced to judgment, not being liquidated and a debt, is held not to make its owner a creditor so as to allow him to attack a voluntary conveyance as fraudulent. But here there is no mention of a particular intent to defeat the claim.

corporation to require licenses for the sale of intoxicating liquors, within 4 miles of its corporate limits, does not deprive citizens of their constitutional property rights, or of the privileges and immunities protected by the Federal Constitution.

(November 20, 1904.)

As to power of municipal corporations to prohibit screens or inclosures in saloon, or to require curtains to be raised, or prescribe hours when saloon shall be closed, etc., see Paul v. Washington, 65 L. R. A. 903, and footnote thereto.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Vanderburgh County convicting him of violation of a municipal ordinance requiring a license for the sale of intoxicating liquors. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. J. Greshaw for appellant.

Mr. Albert W. Funkhouser, for appellee:

A license to retail intoxicating liquor is a mere revocable, personal permit to carry on an odious business, subject to police regulations and restraints; a license fee paid for this privilege is not a compulsory tax, and its exaction is not a violation of any of the constitutional rights or privileges of the licensee as a citizen.

The statute giving the city of Evansville jurisdiction 4 miles from its corporate limits to license, tax, and regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors does not contravene or conflict with any right guaranteed appellant by the Constitution of the United States or of the state of Indiana.

Lutz v. Crawfordsville, 109 Ind. 466, 10 N. E. 411; Emerich v. Indianapolis, 118 Ind. 279, 20 N. E. 795; Indianapolis v. Bieler, 138 Ind. 30, 36 N. E. 857; Falmouth v. Watson, 5 Bush, 660; Flack v. Fry, 32 W. Va. 364, 9 S. E. 240.

Whether the legislature should or should not empower the city of Evansville to exact a license from liquor dealers within its limits, or within 4 miles thereof, involves the exercise of legislative discretion, and is not subject to review by the courts.

Monks, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was commenced in the police court of the city of Evansville against appellant to recover a penalty for the violation of an ordinance of the city requiring a license to retail intoxicating liquors within 4 miles of the corporate limits. A trial of said cause resulted in a finding and judgment in favor of appellee. From this judgment appellant appealed to the court below, where he was again convicted.

The statute authorizing appellee to pass the ordinance under which appellant was convicted reads as follows: "3927. General Power of Council. The common council shall have power to enact ordinances for the following purposes: . . . To license, tax, and regulate the selling or giving away of any spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors, and to tax, license, and regulate places . . . where such liquors, or either of them, are to be used on the premises when given away, sold, stored, or manufactured; but such license shall not exceed the amount provided for by the laws of this state for other interests thereof. For the purposes 47 L. R. A.

of this section, jurisdiction is given such city for 4 miles from its corporate limits." Section 3927, Burns's Anno. Stat. 1901. Appellant insists that said section is in conflict with the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and with §§ 21 and 23 of article 1 of the Constitution of this state. These are the only questions presented by this appeal. The validity of such a statute is not an open question in this state. In Lutz v. Crawfordsville, 109 Ind. 466, 10 N. E. 411, the appellant was convicted on a charge of violating an ordinance requiring a license to retail intoxicating liquors within 2 miles of the limits of the city of Crawfordsville, and it was held that the legislature had the power to designate the limits over which the jurisdiction of the municipal corporations shall extend, and that its judgment upon the question is conclusive on the courts. The court said (pp. 470, 471, 109 Ind., pp. 413, 414, 10 N. E.): "The legislature has power to determine what the territorial jurisdiction of the political subdivisions of the state shall be. Judge Dillon says: 'With the exception of certain constitutional limitations presently to be noticed, the power of the legislature over such corporations is supreme and transcendent. It may erect, change, divide, and even abolish them at pleasure, as it deems the public good to require.' 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 3d ed. § 54. It is certainly within the power of the legislature to declare that no unlicensed dramshop shall be kept within a designated number of feet of the corporate limits; otherwise all that need be done to evade the law would be to keep a foot or two beyond the corporate boundaries. If the legislature has any power at all to designate limits over which the jurisdiction of a municipal corporation shall extend, then, necessarily, the subject must be within its discretion, and, if this be so, its judgment upon the question must be conclusive." "Limitations upon the legislative power are to be sought for in the Constitution, and, if not found there, they do not exist. Eastman v. State, 109 Ind. 278, 58 Am. Rep. 400, 10 N. E. 97; Robinson v. Schenck, 102 Ind. 307, 1 N. E. 698; Hedderich v. State, 101 Ind. 564, 51 Am. Rep. 768, 1 N. E. 47. There is nothing in the Constitution prohibiting the legislature from fixing the jurisdiction of municipal corporations, and the judiciary cannot supplant the judgment of the legislature with its own. . . . The power to exact a license is a police power vested in the sovereign, and may be delegated to instrumentalities of government, such as municipal corporations are. The purpose of exacting license is to limit and regulate the business, for, if licenses were not required, all persons might, under the rules of the common law, freely engage in the business; but by imposing a restriction in the form of a license the traffic is regulated and limited. The principle upon which the power rests is a very ancient one, and is the same as that which for hundreds of years has sustained the right to restrict the business of hawking and peddling by exacting licenses." In Emerich v. Indianapolis, 118 Ind. 279, 20 N. E. 795, the same question was involved, and the court said (p. 280, 118 Ind., p. 795, 20 N. E.): "The legislature has the power, as was demonstrated in Lutz v. Crawfordsville, 109 Ind. 466, 10 N. E. 411, to determine over what territory the jurisdiction of a municipal corporation shall extend. . . . The law in exacting a license fee does not grant a privilege that did not before exist, but, on the contrary, lays a special tax upon a pursuit which, but for the statute, might be followed without paying any special tax. There is therefore no just reason for affirming that a person who can secure no benefit from the municipal government should be exempt from the special tax imposed upon those who engage in the business of selling liquor." See also Robb v. Indianapolis, 38 Ind. 49. It has been held in other states that the legislatures thereof have the power to delegate to municipal corporations the right to exercise police power beyond and within a prescribed distance of the municipal limits. 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1148; Falmouth v. Watson, 5 Bush, 660; Flack v. Fry, 32 W. Va. 364, 9 S. E. 240; Van Hook v. Selma, 70 Ala. 361, 45 Am. Rep. 85; Chicago Packing & Provision Co. v. Chicago, 88 Ill. 221, 30 Am. Rep. 545; State ex rel. Humphrey v. Franklin, 40 Kan. 410, 19 Pac. 801. The power to regulate the liquor traffic is found in the police power of the state, and it should be remembered, in considering all statutes on that subject, that no one possesses an inalienable or constitutional right to keep a saloon for the sale of intoxicating liquors. "To sell intoxicating liquors at retail is not a natural right to pursue an ordinary calling." Black, Intoxicating Liquors, § 48; Bloomershire v. Ulne, 159 Ind. 500, 503, 65 N. E. 513; State v. Gerhardt, 145 Ind. 439, 462, 33 L. R. A. 313, 44 N. E. 469; Sherlock v. Stuart, 96 Mich. 193, 21 L. R. A. 580, 55 N. W. 845; Cooley, Const. Lim. 7th ed. pp. 845-851. Neither is the right to sell intoxicating liquors one of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States which the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States forbids the states to abridge. Bartemeyer v. Iowa, 18 Wall. 129, 21 L. ed. 929; Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273; Crowley v. Christensen, 137 U. S. 86, 67 L. R. A.

S. 657, 37 L. ed. 599, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 721, involving the constitutionality of the laws regulating the sale of liquors in Texas, Mr. Chief Justice Fuller (p. 661, 148 U. S., p. 601, 37 L. ed., p. 723, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep.) said: "But it is contended that the act conflicts with the provisions of the 14th Amendment that 'no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.' The privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States are privileges and immunities arising out of the nature and essential character of the national government, and granted or secured by the Constitution of the United States, and the right to sell intoxicating liquors is not one of the rights growing out of such citizenship. Bartemeyer v. Iowa, 18 Wall. 129, 21 L. ed. 929. The amendment [14] does not take from the states those powers of police that were reserved at the time the original Constitution was adopted. Undoubtedly it forbids any arbitrary deprivation of life, liberty, or property, and secures equal protection to all under like circumstances in the enjoyment of their rights; but it was not designed to interfere with the power of the state to protect the lives, liberty, and property of its citizens, and to promote their health, morals, education, and good order." In Crowley v. Christensen, 137 U. S. 86, 34 L. ed. 620, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 13, the Supreme Court of the United States, by Mr. Justice Field (p. 91, 137 U. S., p. 623, 34 L. ed., p. 15, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep.) said: "The sale of such liquors in this way has heretofore been at all times, by the courts of every state, considered as the proper subject of legislative regulation. . . . It is a question of public expediency and public morality, and not of Federal law. The police power of the state is fully competent to regulate the business, —to mitigate its evils or to suppress it entirely. There is no inherent right in a citizen to thus sell intoxicating liquors by retail. It is not a privilege of a citizen of the state or of a citizen of the United States. . . . The manner and extent of regulation rest in the discretion of the governing authority. . . . It is a matter of legislative will only. As in many other cases, the officers may not always exercise the power conferred upon them with wisdom or justice to the parties affected. But that is a matter which does not affect the authority of the state, nor is it one which can be brought under the cognizance of the courts of the United States." In Danville v. Hatcher, 101 Va. 523, 526-531, 44 S. E. 723, the court (p. 527, 101 Va., p. 724, 44 S. E.) said: "It is there said: 'That the regulation of the sale of intoxicating liquors is within the police power of the state is established, if not literally, by all the cases where the subject has been considered; certainly by an overwhelming array of authority.' It has been repeatedly decided that the subject is wholly within the power of the legislature, and that the traffic is not one of the privileges or immunities of citizenship guaranteed and protected by the United States Constitution or the 14th Amendment thereto. It may be entirely prohibited; and its regulation, when permitted, is absolutely within the discretion of the several states. These principles are sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States in a long line of decisions, rendered both before and after the adoption of the 14th Amendment. Bartemeyer v. Iowa, 18 Wall. 129, 21 L. ed. 929; Boston Beer Co. v. Massachusetts, 97 U. S. 25, 24 L. ed. 989; Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273; Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S. 1, 32 L. ed. 346, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 232, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 6; Hucless v. Childrey, 135 U. S. 662, 34 L. ed. 304, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 972; Crowley v. Christensen, 137 U. It is evident that the statute involved in this case is not in conflict with either the state or Federal Constitution.

The judgment of the court below is therefore affirmed.

(.....Ind. Terr.....)

A check on an open bank account does not constitute an assignment of the fund, or take precedence of a subsequent attachment levied on the fund before the check is presented for payment or brought to the notice of the bank. If such presentment is not made, or notice given, within a reasonable time.

(October 19, 1904.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for the Southern District in favor of interpleader in an attachment proceeding to reach the deposit account of the defendant Stock Exchange in the First National Bank of Ardmore. Reversed.

Statement by Gill, J.:

January 23, 1899, appellant, L. H. Love, began his action for debt, and filed in the office of the United States commissioner, southern district. at Ardmore, complaint and affidavit for attachment against the Ardmore Stock Exchange, without alleging whether defendant was a corporation or a partnership. Attachment bond, in due form on same day, was also filed and approved. February 2, 1899, the commissioner allowed plaintiff, by interlineation, to amend the affidavit showing that defendant is composed of W. D. Peak and John S. O'Mealy. Judgment before the commissioner was obtained February 8, 1899, in favor of plaintiff, Love, against defendants Peak and O'Mealy, composing the Ardmore Stock Exchange, for $300, besides interest upon the demand, sustaining the attachment, and fixing the liability of the First National Bank of Ardmore, Indian Territory, as garnishee, at $346.46, and directing the garnishee to pay amount of judgment and costs against defendants into court, and judgment that W. P. Poland recover nothing by reason of his interplea. From this judgment, Poland appealed to the United States court, southern district, at Ardmore, where and before whom on the 16th day of February, 1901, a trial de novo was had, resulting in a judgment in favor of L. H. Love, appellant, against Ardmore Stock Exchange and W. D. Peak for $300, principal, and interest from January 23, 1899, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, and all costs except the cost of prosecuting and defending the interplea of W. P. Poland, which was adjudged against plaintiff; and judgment in favor of Poland, interpleader, that he is entitled to the money in hands of the garnishee to credit of John S. O'Mealy, manager, and directing the garnishee to pay the money to the interpleader, to which judgment appellant duly excepted. The court below found his conclusions of fact separately from his conclusions of law, and, as there is no controversy as to the evidence, the conclusions of fact only need be considered. They are, in substance, as follows:

"(1) That on January 23, 1899, plaintiff filed suit in commissioner's court against the Ardmore Stock Exchange for $300, due upon open account, and at same time filed proper affidavits and bond, and caused order of attachment to issue against defendant, and writ of garnishment to issue, which was served upon the garnishee January 23, 1899; that the affidavit for attachment and garnishment, as originally filed, did not disclose the individual names of the Ardmore Stock Exchange, but on February 2, 1899, said affidavits were amended in the court below, alleging defendant is composed of W. D. Peak and John S. O'Mealy; and that, on the day the judgment was rendered in the United States court, plaintiff dismissed the cause as to John S. O'Mealy, and amended the affidavits so as to show W. D. Peak alone composed the Ardmore Stock Exchange.

"(2) I find from the evidence that at and prior to the filing of this suit the said W. D. Peak resided in Ft. Worth, Texas, and owned and run a business in Ardmore, known as the Ardmore Stock Exchange, with John S. O'Mealy as manager; that all dealings had with plaintiff were in the name of Ardmore Stock Exchange, with John S. O'Mealy as manager; and that plaintiff had no notice that Peak run said business in any other name.

"(3) That defendant was indebted to the plaintiff upon open account on January 23, 1899, in the sum of $300, exclusive of interest, and is entitled to judgment against defendant Ardmore Stock Exchange and W. D. Peak in the sum of $300, with interest thereon from January 23, 1899, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, and that the attachment herein as against defendant must be sustained on the ground that W. D. Peak is a nonresident of the Indian territory.

"(4) I find that the money deposited in the bank in the name of John S. O'Mealy, manager, was deposited by W. D. Peak, by O'Mealy as manager, and that O'Mealy made all deposits for Peak in said bank in his (O'Mealy's) name, as manager.

"(5) I find that the check which John S. O'Mealy, manager, gave to interpleader on the said bank, coupled with the agreement between the said O'Mealy and interpleader 47 L. R. A.

that the money in bank, and to be deposited therein, was for the benefit of the interpleader, together with all the circumstances attending the creation and delivery of said check, constituted an equitable assignment of the fund in bank as between the interpleader and O'Mealy and defendant, and as against the claim of L. H. Love as plaintiff in garnishment."

The check drawn by O'Mealy, as manager, upon the bank in favor of Poland, is as follows:

No. 5.

Ardmore, I. T., Jany. 9, 1899.

First National Bank,
Ardmore, I. T.

Pay to W. P. Poland or order Three hundred sixty-four 41/100 Dollars, $364.41.

[2-cent revenue stamp canceled.]

1-11-19.

J. S. O'M.

Indorsed. "W. P. Poland," and in lead pencil, "1-25-1899."

The court pronounced judgment upon its findings of fact as follows: "It is therefore considered, adjudged, and decreed by the court that the plaintiff, L. H. Love, do have and recover of the defendant Ardmore Stock Exchange and W. D. Peak the sum of $300, principal, with interest thereon from January 23, 1899, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, together with all costs herein expended or incurred, except the cost of prosecuting and defending the interplea herein, for which plaintiff may have his execution, and that the attachment herein, as against said Ardmore Stock Exchange and W. D. Peak, be, and the same is hereby, sustained, but that the attachment as to John S. O'Mealy be, and the same is hereby, dissolved. It is further considered, adjudged, and decreed by the court that the interpleader, W. P. Poland, is entitled to the money on deposit in the First National Bank of Ardmore, Indian territory (garnishee), to the credit of J. S. O'Mealy, manager, and said bank is directed to pay said money to said interpleader, and that the plaintiff, L. H. Love, recover nothing of the garnishee and interpleader by reason of this action, and that said garnishee and interpleader recover of the plaintiff all costs by them in their behalf expended or incurred, for which they may have their execution, to which judgment of the court the plaintiff, at the time of the rendition thereof, in open court, duly excepted, and still excepts."

Plaintiff filed his motion for a new trial, which was overruled by the court, exception duly taken, and the cause stands before this court upon appeal. The motion for new trial is as follows (caption omitted):

"Now comes the plaintiff, and moves the court to set aside, vacate, and hold for naught the judgment rendered herein, and grant him a new trial and as ground therefor he alleges: (1) The judgment of the court is contrary to law. (2) The judgment of the court is not supported by sufficient evidence, and is contrary to the evidence. (3) The court erred in holding that the giving of the check by John S. O'Mealy, manager, upon the First National Bank, in favor of W. P. Poland, the interpleader, with a secret agreement between O'Mealy and Poland that the money in, or to be deposited in, said bank to the credit of John S. O'Mealy, manager, without notice to plaintiff or the garnishee of such secret agreement, constituted an equitable assignment of said funds, binding in law upon plaintiff and garnishee."

Messrs. Potter & Potter, for appellees:

The giving of the check and the agreement of the parties at the time constituted an assignment.

Gill, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant makes the third and last assignment of error in his motion for new trial as his specification of error relied on in this court. The case was tried in the court below without the intervention of a jury, and the court made its certain specified findings of fact from the testimony, and, among them, it found that the check which John S. O'Mealy gave to the interpleader on the garnishee bank was coupled with an agreement between said O'Mealy and the interpleader that the money in bank, and to be deposited therein, was for the benefit of the interpleader, and that, taken with all the circumstances attending the creation and delivery of said check, this constituted an equitable assignment of the fund in bank as between the interpleader and O'Mealy and defendant, and as against the claim of L. H. Love as plaintiff in the garnishment. In the case at bar the intervener, Poland, had had transactions with the Ardmore Stock Exchange, composed, as the evidence showed, of one W. D. Peak, who resided in Ft. Worth, Texas, and that one J. S. O'Mealy managed the business of said firm at Ardmore in his own name as manager; that the intervener and sundry persons were dealing through said stock exchange in buying and selling futures of cotton and other products; that said W. D. Peak was indebted to plaintiff on account in the sum of $300; that said Peak was a nonresident of the Indian territory; that, being so indebted to the plaintiff, he had said transactions with the intervener, and, in settlement of a certain transaction between Peak and intervener, Peak deposited to his general bank account, in the ordinary way of closing such transactions, certain moneys in bank, and, through his manager, had advised the intervener that he had so deposited such money, and gave to the intervener, through his said manager, a check to the amount of $364.40 on the 9th day of January, 1899; that the intervener, instead of presenting said check for payment, and without notifying the bank, held it for two weeks before presenting it for payment, presenting it first on the 25th day of January, 1899, and two days after the attachment had been run and the bank garnished: that the amount in said bank to the credit of Peak stood in the name of O'Mealy as manager, and did not equal the sum named in the check given at the time of its presentment, but that intervener offered to accept same in full payment of the check.

We have examined with care the opinion in Fourth Street Nat. Bank v. Yardley, 165 U. S. 634, 41 L. ed. 855, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 439. In the Yardley Case the Fourth Street National Bank advanced $25,000 to the Keystone National Bank to enable it to meet its debtor balance in a Philadelphia clearing house. The president of the latter bank represented to the officials of the Fourth Street Bank that his bank owed a balance at the clearing house, which it could not meet, because its funds were in the city of New York, and exhibited a memorandum showing a balance to the credit of the Keystone National Bank in the Tradesman's National Bank of New York, of about $27,000, stating that his bank wished to draw against it and get clearing house certificates, and asked the Fourth Street Bank to accept the draft of the Keystone Bank for $25,000 against this reserve account in the New York bank. Relying upon these representations and statements, supported by the memorandum that the Keystone Bank had in the New York bank the specified fund against which it proposed to draw, the Fourth Street Bank gave to the president of the Keystone Bank, for its present use, clearing house gold certificates to the amount of $25,000, and took its draft. The books of the Keystone Bank show that on March 19, 1891, it had to its credit in the Tradesman's Bank of New York the sum of $26,907.32, and on that day an entry was made in said books charging against that credit the said draft of $25,000 it had given to the Fourth Street National Bank. This draft for $25,000 was forwarded to New York for collection, and presented for payment to the Tradesman's National Bank on the morning of March 20, 1891. Payment thereof was refused upon the ground that the drawee had not in hand funds of the drawer sufficient to pay the same. In fact, the Tradesman's Bank had in cash the collection items for the Keystone Bank the sum of $26,907.32. On March 20, 1891, by order of the Comptroller of Currency of the United States, the Keystone National Bank was closed, and thereafter Robert M. Yardley was appointed receiver thereof. After this the money in the Tradesman's National Bank of New York to the credit of the Keystone National Bank was paid over to Robert M. Yardley, who received out of the cash and collection items the sum of $25,825.62. The case at bar is altogether different from the Yardley Case, in this: That the transaction between the Ardmore Stock Exchange and W. P. Poland, the interpleader, at the time the check was given, and for which it was given, was wholly past, and the check was not given for an inducing, present consideration passing between the parties. Interpleader took the check, and held it for many days without presentation, and without notifying the bank on whom the check was drawn, in any way, that he had such check. No sufficient amount of funds to meet the check was on deposit in the bank at the time the check was given. Interpleader accepted such check, relying upon representations of its maker that he would have funds on hand in bank sufficient to meet it when the same should be presented. The check was given against the general account of its maker, which account was at sundry times after giving said check, and before its presentation to the bank, checked against by its maker; and the fund in the hands of the bank had been attached, and the bank garnished, prior to its presentation. In the Yardley Case the assignee of the drawing bank sought to claim the fund checked upon as general assets of the drawing bank, and the Supreme Court held that the funds on deposit by the checking bank belonged to the payee bank by virtue of an equitable assignment.

It may be well, in this connection, to examine the circumstances of the giving of the check.

John O'Mealy testified in the case as follows:

Q. Do you recollect of giving a check to W. P. Poland on the 9th day of January, 1890, for about $364?

A. I do.

Q. For what was that check given?

A. For the balance due him at the time from W. D. Peak & Company.

Q. At the time the check was given, did W. D. Peak & Company have the money in the bank to pay the check?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long had it been there?

A. About an hour.

Q. Had you placed the money in the bank about an hour before the check was given, or had you merely given a call for the money to the bank on the Ft. Worth Bank, or Peak's bank?

A. I made a call on W. D. Peak & Company. They had the money wired to this bank at Ardmore—the First National Bank—by the First National Bank of Ft. Worth.

Q. Did you call for all the money necessary to pay the Poland check, or did W. D. Peak & Company have any part of it with the bank at the time?

A. A hundred dollars of this amount was deposited that day as margin on a trade. The balance of $265 was wired to the bank here at my request.

Q. For what purpose did you have that money sent to the bank at Ardmore?

A. For the purpose of paying W. P. Poland the amount due him.

Q. Did you intend, when that money was placed in the bank at Ardmore, to use it, or to draw against it for another purpose than the payment of the Poland check?

A. I did not.

Q. Did W. D. Peak & Company know, when they sent the money from Ft. Worth, for what purpose it was to be used?

A. I stated to them, in my call for the money, that it was to be paid to the party who had closed out his trade the day before, which is, I believe, the day that Poland closed out the trade.

Q. Did you inform them of what customer had closed out his deal, or just a customer had closed out his deal?

A. Mr. Poland's name was not mentioned to W. D. Peak & Company. I referred only to the trade which had just been closed out.

Q. Did W. D. Peak & Company afterwards use the money which you say that was placed in the bank to pay the Poland check for any purpose, or did it remain there until the failure of W. D. Peak & Company?

A. It was not used by W. D. Peak & Company for any purpose.

Q. Can you explain how it is that your check to Poland was for $365 and the amount of money remaining in the bank to meet the check was less than the amount of the check?

A. The account was overdrawn before the money to pay this check was deposited.

Cross-examination:

Q. You issued this check to W. P. Poland?

A. I did.

Q. You have said that this deposit in the bank which is now in controversy was placed there for the special purpose of paying this check which was held by Mr. Poland?

A. I did.

Q. Wasn't $100 of that amount the identical money paid to you on the 9th day of January, 1899, by T. A. Thurmond?

A. It was.

Q. What was that $100 paid you by Mr. Thurmond for?

A. As margin on a trade executed for him that day.

Q. What was the consideration for the check given you as manager to W. P. Poland?

A. For balance due Mr. Poland from W. D. Peak & Company.

Q. What was that balance for?

A. It was margin which he had deposited to W. D. Peak & Company and the profits accruing from a trade made through them.

Q. Mr. Poland, you are the interpleader in this case, are you?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you have any business transactions with W. D. Peak & Company during the fall and winter of 1898 and 1899?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you recollect at what time you closed out with that concern?

A. I think it was on the 10th day of January.

Q. 1899?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. At the time you closed out with them, what amount did they owe you, if anything?

A. They owed me $364.41.

Q. Well, now, did you get a check on that day or the next day?

A. I got it on the 11th day,—banking day. All the banks here, I understand, closed on the 11th. That is the way I understand the stamp was canceled the 11th and my deal closed on the 10th. I closed it just prior to 12 o'clock, and this check was given in the afternoon, so I suppose he canceled it on the banking day, as I understand they close their banking hours at 12 o'clock here.

Q. Well, what is the reason he didn't give you the check at the time you closed out your business,—that he gave you that statement?

A. He told me he didn't have any money here, and that Peak & Company kept no money here, and that when the deal was closed out they had the bank here wire the bank, or rather wire Peak, to forward the money here, and I told him that was all right, and he told me he would give it to me in the afternoon. I was sick at the time, and went to my dinner, and remained there all that afternoon until about 5 o'clock, and I came up to the office, and there I found O'Mealy, and he said, "I have got your money for you; it has been sent to the bank." And so I left on that afternoon train,—I think it left here then about 6 o'clock,—and I went down to Texas, where my family was, and was sick as I told you, and I was in bed down there for a week or ten days, and I wasn't thinking about the check, and I put the check in my pocket and kept it.

Q. What day did you ever present it, if you did present it, to the First National Bank of Ardmore for payment?

A. On the 25th day of January, 1899.

Q. Why wasn't it paid?

A. Because Mr. Love had garnished the money as the Ardmore Stock Exchange, and they couldn't pay it.

Q. Was there then in the bank a sufficient amount to pay your check?

A. No, sir; not quite. Three hundred and forty-seven dollars in there, I think.

Q. Did you offer to surrender the check for that amount of money?

A. I did.

Q. When you got back to Ardmore, had the stock exchange, or had W. D. Peak & Company failed?

A. Yes, sir; they had failed. I suppose they had failed.

Q. Was this check given on the day before or the day it was written?

A. This check was given the day after it was written. I mean by that, he must have been mistaken.

Q. He must have antedated the check?

A. He must have done it.

Q. I want to read the check. (Reading check heretofore referred to as exhibit A.)

You didn't present that check to the First National Bank until after you had held it several weeks, did you?

A. No, it wasn't two weeks.

Q. Two weeks.

A. It wasn't two weeks. I got it on the 11th or 10th day, and I presented it on the 25th. Well, just two weeks; yes.

Q. How long after this attachment suit with Mr. Love, before you presented the check for payment?

A. I think it was the next day or two days afterwards, I am not sure. I came right up here when I found that Peak had failed. I think I got here the next day.

Q. Did you ever notify the bank or any of its officials that you held this check, until after Peak & Brother failed?

A. Yes, sir; I wired them from Marshall, where I was, that I held the check.

Q. What day did you wire them?

A. I don't recollect, but it must have been on the 23d, but it may have been on the 22d. Whatever day they failed on, then is when I notified them.

Q. That was after you were apprised of the failure?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. That was after this attachment and garnishment was rendered?

A. I couldn't say.

Q. The garnishment and attachment was rendered on the 23d of January, 1899. Can you state to the court that you advised them that you held this check on that bank before this garnishee was served upon the bank?

A. That I held the check?

Q. Can you state that you advised the bank that you held a check upon the bank prior to the service of the writ of garnishment upon the bank?

A. Yes, sir; I held the check before then.

Q. That isn't the question; but did you advise the bank that you held it prior to the time that this garnishment was rendered?

A. I couldn't say. I don't know whether I did or not.

Q. Don't you know as a fact that you didn't, Mr. Poland?

A. I got an answer from the bank. I didn't know when I advised them, though, but they wired me back that Mr. Love had garnished the money,—the Ardmore Stock Exchange.

Q. In reply to your telegrams?

A. Yes, sir.

The bank's statement of the account of John S. O'Mealy, manager, is as follows:

This statement shows that on the 12th day of January, 1899, there was a credit to the depositor of the difference between $375 and $21.22, an overdraft existing on January 9, 1899. It shows that on the 14th day of January, 1899, there was a further deposit of $200 and two checks paid to the amount of one of $200 and the other of $5; that on the 16th of January another check of $5 was paid; that on the 17th day of January another check of $17.80 was given and paid; that on the 20th of January a deposit of $100 was made; that on the 21st of January a deposit of $135 was made, and on that day two checks were given,—one for $134.10, and the second for $79.42; and that on the 27th day of January a balance was due the depositor of $347.46, which had so remained from the 23d day of January. It would seem from the evidence that the check given to the interpleader by the Ardmore Stock Exchange, or by J. S. O'Mealy, manager of W. D. Peak & Company, was upon a general account on deposit in the First National Bank of Ardmore; that between the time of the giving of the check to the interpleader and the presentation of the check some fourteen days had elapsed, during which period the money on deposit in the bank had varied from day to day as the business demands of the concern represented by O'Mealy had made deposits and drawn checks thereon; and that on January 23d—the date of the garnishment of the bank by the plaintiff—the general balance in favor of the depositor was $347.46. The funds in the bank garnished on January 23d were not the funds in bank on January 12th at all. If there was an equitable assignment of the balance in bank on January 12th, the funds in bank January 23d were not the funds assigned at all, because on January 12th the balance in favor of the depositor was only $343.78, and this was all that could possibly have been assigned. The depositor checked out of bank by January 23d the sum of $410.32, being all of this fund claimed to have been assigned, as well as other funds.

It is our opinion that the case at bar presents an altogether different question from the question so ably decided in Fourth Street Nat. Bank v. Yardley, 165 U. S. 634, 41 L. ed. 855, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 439, or any of the cases cited in the opinion of said court. It is certainly true that at any time during the two weeks intervening between the delivery of the check to the intervener and its presentment that O'Mealy could have checked against this fund, and his check been honored; and in fact the testimony shows that he did check against his account in said bank during this time. It is a general rule of law that a check is not intended for acceptance, but for prompt presentment and payment; and it is the further rule that the check must be presented within a reasonable time after receiving it. Benjamin's Chalmers's Dig. arts. 256, 257. In the Yardley Case the payee bank forwarded the check made immediately upon its receipt for payment. In the case at bar the intervener, by his own statement, allowed fourteen days to elapse before presenting his check for payment, and only presented said check for payment upon learning of the impending failure of the maker thereof, and after an attachment had been run against the general funds of the maker on deposit in the bank. Mr. Justice White, in his opinion in the Yardley Case, 165 U. S. 634, 41 L. ed. 855, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 439, says: "As between a check holder and the bank upon which such check is drawn, it is settled that, unless the check be accepted by the bank, an action cannot be maintained by the holder against the bank;" citing National Bank v. Millard, 10 Wall. 152, 19 L. ed. 897; First Nat. Bank v. Whitman, 94 U. S. 347, 24 L. ed. 232. And he further says: "It is also settled that a check drawn in the ordinary form does not, as between the maker and payee, constitute an equitable assignment pro tanto of an indebtedness owing by the bank upon which the check has been drawn, and that the mere giving and receipt of the check does not entitle the holder to priority over general creditors in a fund received from such bank by an assignee under a general assignment made by the debtor for the benefit of his creditors;" citing Florence Min. Co. v. Brown, 124 U. S. 385, 31 L. ed. 424, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 531, and Laclede Bank v. Schuler, 120 U. S. 511, 30 L. ed. 704, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 644. And he further says that, "whilst an equitable assignment or lien will not arise against a deposit account solely by reason of a check drawn against the same, yet the authorities establish that if, in the transaction connected with the delivery of the check, it was the understanding and agreement of the parties that an advance about to be made should be a charge on and be satisfied out of a specified sum, a court of equity will lend its aid to carry such agreement into effect as against the drawer of the check, mere volunteers, and parties charged with notice." By the expression "mere volunteers," used by the court, can only be meant one who has received something from the debtor without consideration therefor. It cannot certainly be successfully contended that an attaching creditor undertaking to secure a valid subsisting indebtedness is a volunteer in the sense used by the learned judge.

An examination of the authorities shows that there is considerable conflict in the decisions, even where no attaching creditor has intervened, as to whether a check drawn in the ordinary form would constitute an equitable assignment or not; and, except in one case,—that of the National Bank v. Indiana Bkg. Co. 114 Ill. 483, 2 N. E. 401,—which has been called to the attention of the court, where an attaching creditor has intervened, is it held that a prior unaccepted check acts as an equitable assignment upon a general account of a depositor in bank. The general rule is, and the consensus of authorities holds, that checks drawn in the ordinary form, not describing any particular fund, or using any words of transfer of the whole or any part of the account standing to the credit of the drawer, but containing only the request directed to the bank to pay to the order of a payee a certain sum of money, are not, in the absence of acceptance, an assignment of the funds of the drawer. National Bank v. Millard, 10 Wall. 152, 19 L. ed. 897; Florence Min. Co. v. Brown, 124 U. S. 385, 31 L. ed. 424, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 531, and a long line of cases cited in the American Digest, Century ed. vol. 4, cols. 1247, 1248. The Federal courts hold that a check operates as an equitable assignment pro tanto as between the holder and the assignee in insolvency of the drawer, where it is made and delivered prior to the assignment, and not presented for payment until after the drawee is notified of the assignment by the assignee. German Sav. Inst. v. Adee, 1 McCrary, 501, 8 Fed. 106. But where some particular creditor attached funds in the general bank account of such maker the consensus of authorities seems to hold that the attachment lien takes priority over a check given against such general fund. In Pennsylvania it is held: On an attachment against B, A issued execution against C Bank, as garnishee of a fund on deposit belonging to B. Previously to this B had given to D a check upon the bank, of which the bank had no notice at the time the attachment was served on it, and which was not presented until after the attachment. The court held that the check did not operate as an assignment of the fund in the hands of the bank, and that D, the payee, had no claim or lien upon said funds. Kuhn v. Warren Sav. Bank, 20 W. N. C. 230, 11 Atl. 440. And to like effect it was held in New York: Where the balance due a depositor in a bank is levied upon under an attachment against the depositor the bank is not authorized to deduct an outstanding check given by the depositor to a third person, and which had not, prior to the levy of the attachment, been presented and accepted, since without such acceptance the check did not operate as an equitable assignment of the fund against which it was drawn. Duncan v. Berlin, 60 N. Y. 151. In Massachusetts it is held: A bank check for more than the amount of the drawer's deposit does not operate as an assignment of the actual balance until the bank has agreed to pay the check pro tanto. Dana v. Third Nat. Bank, 13 Allen, 445, 90 Am. Dec. 216. And to like effect is Bullard v. Randall, 1 Gray, 605, 61 Am. Dec. 433.

Upon the whole, a careful examination of the various decisions of the different courts upon this question of what constitutes an equitable assignment of the funds of a depositor in a bank, where the depositor has given a check on such fund, we are forced to the conclusion that before a check on such funds would become an equitable assignment thereof, in a case where attaching creditors have reached such funds, one of three things must appear: First, the check must, on its face, show the intention to appropriate the fund on deposit; or, second, the depository bank must have had notice in some way of the drawing of such check; or, third, the check must have been made against a particular fund on deposit, and for the whole of such fund,—neither of which conditions appears in the evidence or in the findings of fact by the court in the case at bar. We are of the opinion that, where a party has a check in ordinary form on general funds in bank, it is his duty to present such check within a reasonable time, and if, before presentation of his check, a third party has attached or garnished the moneys in proper legal action, that the payee of the check must stand the consequences of his failure to get his claim in in time for payment. 2 Shinn, Attachment & Garnishment, § 582, and cases cited thereunder.

The judgment of the court was erroneous in adjudging that the intervener was entitled to the money on deposit in the garnishee bank, and in directing said bank to pay said money to the intervener, and that the plaintiff (appellant) recover nothing of the garnishee and interpleader, and awarding judgment for costs against appellant in the garnishment proceedings.

The judgment of the court below is reversed and remanded, with directions to proceed in a regular manner with the case in accordance with the views herein expressed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

R. E. HODGE et al., Appts.,
v.

(121 Iowa, 482.)

1. Provisions of a mulct tax law relating to the remission of the tax as well as the provisions for its enforcement are incorporated in a statute imposing a tax upon property devoted to a business different from that to which the law is primarily applicable, by a provision that the new tax shall be assessed and collected in the same manner as in the former law, although the sections relating to the remission are not specifically mentioned in the later statute.

2. No notice of the assessment or levy need be given to the one engaged in the business in case of the imposition of a specific tax upon the business of selling cigarettes.

3. Opportunity for contesting in the ordinary courts of justice a charge imposed upon property where cigarettes are sold is sufficient to uphold the tax as against the owner of the property without notice to him of its assessment, although he may not be directly engaged in the business.

4. Taxes imposed as a deterrent against the transaction of a certain business need not be collected through judicial proceedings, but may be enforced by distraint or tax sale.

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the District Court for Muscatine County in favor of defendants in a suit to enjoin the collection of a tax. Affirmed.

Statement by Deemer, J.:

Suit in equity to enjoin defendants from assessing, levying, or collecting a cigarette mulct tax, upon the property of plaintiff Tabor, which was used by plaintiff Hodge for the purpose of retailing tobacco and cigars, on the ground that the provisions of the "mulct law" authorizing such tax is unconstitutional and void as applied to the owner of property which has been leased to another. The trial court dismissed plaintiffs' petition, and they appeal.

Two elements are necessary to the validity of a tax law,—notice and an opportunity for a hearing.

It is only by a strained construction of the law that the appellate proceedings provided by the liquor mulct law, defective as they are, can be held applicable at all to proceedings against cigarette dealers.

Stuart v. Palmer, 74 N. Y. 183, 30 Am. Rep. 289; Com. v. Albro, 1 Gray, 49, 61 Am. Dec. 381.

Deemer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

As the case involves the constitutionality of certain statutes, it seems necessary, although they are familiar to the profession, to set some of them out in extenso. Section 5006 of the Code forbids in general terms the manufacture, sale, exchange, or disposition of cigarettes or cigarette paper. Section 5007 reads as follows:

"Tax on Sale. There shall be assessed a tax of $300 per annum against every person, partnership, or corporation, and upon the real property, and the owner thereof, within or whereon any cigarettes, cigarette paper, or cigarette wrapper, or any paper made or prepared for use in making cigarettes, or for the purpose of being filled with tobacco for smoking, are sold or given away, or kept with intent to be sold, bartered, or given away under any pretext whatever. Such tax shall be in addition to all other taxes and penalties, shall be assessed, collected, and distributed in the same manner as the mulct liquor tax, and shall be a perpetual lien upon all property, both personal and real, used in connection with the business; and the payment of such tax shall not be a bar to prosecution under any law prohibiting the manufacturing of cigarettes, or cigarette paper, or selling, bartering, or giving away the same. But the provisions of this section shall not apply to the sales by jobbers and wholesalers in doing an interstate business with customers outside the state."

The sections referred to in § 5007, relating to the "assessment, collection, and distribution" of the taxes provided for therein, are, in substance (before amendment by the 29th general assembly), as follows:

"Sec. 2433. In the months of December, March, June, and September of each year and before the 20th day of each of said months the assessor shall return to the auditor a list of persons liable to the tax and a description of the real property whereon the business has been carried on."

"Sec. 2436. On the 1st day of January, April, July, and October of each year there shall be due and payable from each person so returned to the county auditor a quarterly instalment of the mulct tax herein provided for, which shall be a lien upon the real property wherein such business is returned as being carried on, whether the person carrying on such a business, or maintaining such place, is correctly described or not. If such instalment is not paid within one month after it becomes due and payable, a penalty of 20 per cent attaches together with 1 per cent per month thereafter until it is paid. The person so assessed is liable for at least one quarterly instalment whether he quits the business or not.

"Sec. 2437. On the last day of December, March, June, and September of each year the county auditor shall certify to the county treasurer a complete list of the names returned to him by the assessor, with a description of the real estate and the names of the occupant, and the owner or agent of such property.

"Sec. 2438. The county treasurer shall thereupon enter upon the book known as the mulct tax book a quarterly instalment of the mulct tax as due and payable by the person carrying on such business, as a lien and charge upon and against the real property wherein or whereon such business is carried on.

"Sec. 2439. After the expiration of one month from the date of when such tax becomes due, if not paid it shall be delinquent and collectable by the treasurer in the same method as that in which other delinquent taxes are collectable and all the provisions as to collection of other delinquent taxes shall apply. Tax sales for said delinquent taxes shall also be made on the first Monday in June of each year.

"Sec. 2440. At any time after a quarterly instalment of such taxes becomes delinquent, the treasurer may collect the same by seizing and selling any personal property used in connection with the business or in maintaining the place."

These are all the provisions of the mulct liquor law with reference to the assessment and collection of the liquor mulct tax. The following provisions of the liquor law with reference to the remission of taxes assessed erroneously are claimed to be applicable to the cigarette business, and in view of such claim we give an abstract of such provisions:

"Sec. 2441. At the meeting of the board of supervisors next following the listing as aforesaid, application may be made to the board to remit the tax by petition duly verified and filed with the county auditor at least eight days before the time set for the consideration of the case, and notice for the same length of time must be served on the county attorney in writing. The averments of the petition shall be deemed denied, and witnesses may be examined, oath being administered by the chairman of the board with the same effect as to penalties for testifying falsely as if administered in court.

"Sec. 2442. The owner of the property may be heard in support of his application and evidence of the general reputation of the place shall be admissible. If it be found by a majority vote of the board that the tax is proper it shall stand; otherwise it shall be remitted. Either the petitioner or the county attorney may appeal to the district court and, if the petitioner appeals, he shall be required to give bond for costs accrued and to accrue, whereupon the auditor shall file a transcript in the office of the clerk."

"Sec. 2444. On appeal the trial shall be conducted as an equitable cause."

Appellants contend that § 5007 is void, because it deprives, or may deprive, citizens of their property without due process of law, in that: (1) The law contains no provision for notice to either dealer or real-estate owner. (2) The charge imposed by § 5007 is in the nature of a criminal penalty, and the measures provided for its enforcement and collection are not adapted to the ends sought. (3) The attempt to enforce a criminal penalty through the taxing machinery of the state is revolutionary, and contrary to the established principles of justice. (4) The principles embodied in the law in question are arbitrary, unusual, and unknown to "the law of the land," as that term is used and intended in all constitutions. The petition also challenged the act because it was an attempt to regulate interstate commerce, and therefore void. This point is not insisted upon, for the reason, we suppose, that, under a substantially similar state of facts, it was held in Cook v. Marshall County, 119 Iowa, 384, 93 N. W. 372, that there was no merit in the contention. That case also holds the act in question was properly entitled, and that it is uniform in its operation. The objections now made to the enactment, as stated by counsel in the quotation made from their brief, nearly all revolve around the central thought that it amounts to taking of plaintiff's property without due process of law, and is contrary to the law of the land. Incidental to this is the claim that §§ 2441-2442 and 2444 do not apply to the case. This is bottomed on the notion that § 5007 does not refer to these sections either in express terms or by necessary implication. The reference to the mulct liquor tax law is as follows: "Such tax . . . shall be assessed, collected, and distributed in the same manner as the mulct liquor tax." Sections 2441 et seq. are found in this mulct liquor tax law, and it seems to us they refer to the assessment and collection of that tax. They are a part of the proceedings with reference to the assessment and collection of the mulct tax, and are as much a part of the proceedings as if written out at length in § 5007, before quoted. A section which relates to the remission or revocation of the tax when embodied in the act authorizing its assessment, and evidently forming one of the inducements to the passage of the act, is as much a part of the law relating to the assessment and collection of the tax as that part expressly authorizing the levy and collection thereof. And in determining the constitutionality of a statute imposing a tax it would be unjust and unreasonable to divorce it from other provisions of the same law which gave to the person against whom the tax is to be assessed, and from whom the tax is to be collected, a remedy for avoiding that tax. The whole act relating to this subject and germane to the purposes and objects thereof should be considered in arriving at its constitutionality. These sections of the mulct liquor tax law relating to what may be called the remission of the tax really relate to its enforcement or assessment, and should be considered in determining the constitutionality of § 5007. With this conclusion in mind, we now go to the points made by counsel against the validity of the law.

It differs from the liquor mulct tax in that the payment thereof does not constitute a bar to prosecutions under § 5006, which absolutely prohibits the sale of cigarettes. In this it is peculiar, and this peculiarity constitutes the basis of the attack made upon it. The tax imposed by the mulct liquor law has been held to be a charge or license exacted for the privilege of carrying on the business of vending liquors. Smith v. Skow, 97 Iowa, 640, 66 N. W. 893. And in Re Smith, 104 Iowa, 199, 73 N. W. 605, it is held that, as the tax is assessed and levied by virtue of a general law upon all premises and persons which come within the provisions of the act, the persons liable to the same must appear and pay the same without notice. In the opinion it is said: "No notice to the lot owner of the assessment and levy was necessary. . . . There was no more necessity for notice to the property owner than in case of taxes generally." In Ferry v. Deneen (Iowa) 82 N. W. 424, it is said: "It is apparent, taking all the provisions of this act together, that the amount imposed, while called a 'tax,' is at the same time a penalty. We do not think all the rules governing ordinary taxes should control here. . . . The levy is made by law, . . . [and], as used in the act, means scarcely anything more than a formal approval." As to the vender of either cigarettes or liquors, no notice of the assessments or levy of the tax is necessary. The tax is specific, and operates alike upon all who engage in the business. The amount is fixed, and there is nothing left to inquire into and determine. Ferry v. Campbell, 110 Iowa, 294, 50 L. R. A. 92, 81 N. W. 604; Gatch v. Des Moines, 63 Iowa, 718, 18 N. W. 310. But it is contended that the owner of property, who is not directly engaged in the unlawful business, is entitled to notice, and an opportunity to be heard, before a tax may be legally levied against his property; and that, as the law does not require such notice, it is invalid. In order to solve this question, it is necessary to investigate a little more closely into the nature of the tax imposed by § 5007. It is clearly not a license, for it does not grant permission to do an act which, without such permission, would be invalid. State v. Hipp, 38 Ohio St. 206; Chilvers v. People, 11 Mich. 43. It is manifestly a tax upon the traffic which the legislature saw fit to impose, not for the purpose of giving countenance to the business, but as a deterrent against engaging therein. It confers no right, but imposes an impediment to the transaction of the business. It is clearly a tax on that business, levied to meet the burdens imposed upon the general public by what is thought to be the result upon the human race, and particularly upon children, of the use of cigarettes. Indemnity and protection to the public against evils resulting from the nature and character of the business is the central thought. It also partakes of the nature of a police regulation, but it is not to be wholly so regarded. Indeed, we think it may be fairly said to be a tax upon the business. That a tax is imposed for the double purpose of regulation and revenue is no reason for declaiming it invalid. 2 Desty, Taxn. 1384. Being a tax, it was competent for the legislature to prescribe the proceedings and processes for its collection. From the beginning the people of this country have collected taxes through administrative officers, and there has been no suggestion that ordinary judicial processes were necessary to meet the constitutional guaranty of "due process of law." Cooley, Taxn. 49. Power of taxation is inherent in sovereignty, and this power, it has been said, "in its nature acknowledges no boundary." As said by the great chief justice in McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 428, 4 L. ed. 607: "The only security against the abuse of this power is found in the structure of the government itself. In imposing a tax the legislature acts upon its constituents. This is, in general, a sufficient security against erroneous and oppressive taxation." The term "due process of law" is often misapprehended or misapplied. Indeed, it seems impossible to give a definition which is at once perspicuous and satisfactory. When applied to taxation, regard must be had of the nature of the power. As said in Hagar v. Reclamation Dist. No. 108, 111 U. S. 701, 28 L. ed. 569, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 663: "The power of taxation possessed by the state may be exercised upon any subject within its jurisdiction, and to any extent not prohibited by the Constitution of the United States. . . . 'It may touch property in every shape, . . . and the amount of the taxation may be determined by the value of the property, or its use, or its capacity, or its productiveness. It may touch business in the almost infinite forms in which it is conducted, . . . unless restrained by provisions of the Federal Constitution, the power of the state as to the mode, form, and extent of taxation is unlimited, where the subjects to which it applies are within her jurisdiction.'" Following this principle, it has been held that a statute of the state of Michigan, authorizing the treasurer to levy by distress, and sell any goods or chattels found in the possession of the tax debtor, and that no claim of property made thereto by any other person should be available to prevent the sale, was valid. Sears v. Cottrell, 5 Mich. 251. See also Sheldon v. Van Buskirk, 2 N. Y. 473. We need not go to this extent in the case now before us, although we have recognized the principle as applied to innkeepers' liens in Brown Shoe Co. v. Hunt, 103 Iowa, 586, 39 L. R. A. 291, 64 Am. St. Rep. 198, 72 N. W. 705. On the authority of the Supreme Court of the United States, we do hold that, as to the person actually engaged in the business, it is not necessary that he be present, or that he have an opportunity to be present, when the assessment is made. McMillen v. Anderson, 95 U. S. 37, 24 L. ed. 335; State Railroad Tax Cases (Taylor v. Secor) 92 U. S. 575, 23 L. ed. 663. As to the owner of the property, if any notice or opportunity to be heard be necessary, it is sufficient if he be given an opportunity for contesting the charge in the ordinary courts of justice, with such notice to the person, or such proceeding in regard to the property, as is appropriate to the nature of the case. Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 24 L. ed. 616.

The Supreme Court of the United States has uniformly adhered to the doctrine that a tax law which provides for a board of revision authorized to hear complaints respecting the justice of an assessment, and prescribes the time during which and the place where such complaints may be made, meets all constitutional requirements. Palmer v. McMahon, 133 U. S. 660, 33 L. ed. 67 L. R. A.

772, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 324, and cases cited; Glidden v. Harrington, 189 U. S. 255, 47 L. ed. 798, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 574 (which sustains a similar provision to the act in question). See also Towns v. Klamath County, 33 Or. 225, 53 Pac. 604; Paulsen v. Portland, 149 U. S. 30, 37 L. ed. 637, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 750. We have heretofore given our adherence to this doctrine. In Griswold College v. Davenport, 65 Iowa, 634, 22 N. W. 904, we said: "It seems to be agreed, therefore, that property taken for the nonpayment of taxes is not taken without due process of law if the taxpayer is afforded an opportunity to be heard in relation to the tax, though it be only before the officers clothed with power to assess." See also Yeomans v. Riddle, 84 Iowa, 147, 50 N. W. 886. Indeed, the rule seems to be elementary. State Assessors v. Central R. Co. 48 N. J. L. 146, 4 Atl. 578; Lent v. Tillson. 72 Cal. 404, 14 Pac. 71; Spencer v. Merchant, 100 N. Y. 585, 3 N. E. 682. An act very similar to the one in question was sustained by the supreme court of Ohio in Adler v. Whitbeck, 44 Ohio St. 539, 9 N. E. 672. We are constrained to hold that §§ 2441 et seq. save the act from the claim of unconstitutionality because of want of notice and opportunity to be heard. The regular meetings of the board are fixed by law, and of these all persons must take notice.

What we have said, and the authorities already cited, answer most of the other contentions made by appellants. There is no requirement of law that such taxes must be collected through judicial proceedings. They may be enforced through summary processes, such as distraint or tax sale. This is well established by the cases already cited. The two cases relied upon by appellant—McBride v. State Revenue Agent, 70 Miss. 716, 12 So. 699, and Chaurin v. Valiton, 8 Mont. 451, 3 L. R. A. 196, 20 Pac. 658—are not in point. The first involved a law imposing a fine or penalty for doing an illegal act, which was to be assessed and collected as a tax. This was held invalid because not due process of law. In the second the legislature of Montana undertook to make a license a lien on property, and to provide for the collection thereof by summary process. This was held invalid because of want of notice or opportunity to be heard. In that case the owner of the property was not given an opportunity to contest the charge.

The unreasonableness of the act is not a matter for our consideration. There is nothing arbitrary in a statute which provides for the collection of a tax by summary process. Such proceedings are necessary to secure prompt payment. They existed long before the Constitution was formed, and are in accord with the law of the land. The trial court was right in sustaining the demurrer to the petition, and its judgment is affirmed.'

(.....Iowa.....)

A fee in the first taker is not created by the rule in Shelley's Case by a conveyance to one for her natural life with provisions for forfeiture in case of attempt to encumber, or nonpayment of taxes, "and at her death to her children or to their lineal descendants;" and it is immaterial that, under the forfeiture clause, in case of compliance with the conditions the land was to pass to the lineal descendants of the life tenant.

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a decree of the District Court for Wayne County sustaining a demurrer to the complaint in a suit to quiet title to certain real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Will B. Barger and Miles & Steele for appellants.

The rule in Shelley's Case has never been held to be the law in this state, and, if ever applied, it was in exact accordance with the evident intent of the party as shown by the context of the instrument in question.

Wescott v. Binford, 104 Iowa, 648, 65 Am. St. Rep. 530, 74 N. W. 18.

In arriving at the intention, the modern rule requires the consideration of the deed as a whole, rather than any particular clause or part thereof, the theory being that the parties had the same general purpose in view throughout the whole instrument.

Beedy v. Finney, 118 Iowa, 276, 91 N. W. 1069; 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 4.

It was the plain intention of Sarah Ann Campbell in the deed in controversy to vest a life estate only in Angelina Brown with a remainder in fee to her children living at her death.

Deemer, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiffs and the defendants are the children and heirs at law of one Angelina Brown, who died testate in November of the year 1902. By the terms of her will she devised her real estate to the plaintiffs, and gave to the defendants each a small legacy, as and for their full share of her estate. Plaintiffs contend that at the time of testatrix's decease she was the owner in fee of the real estate in question, in virtue of a deed therefor from her mother, Sarah Ann Campbell, of date September 23, 1886, the material parts of which read as follows: "I, Sarah Ann Campbell, widow, of Morton, Tazewell county, state of Illinois, for love and affection do hereby convey to as a free gift, said gift being in value $5,000.00, to Angelina Brown, my daughter, during her natural life, and at her death to her children, or to their lineal descendants [the land in controversy]. This conveyance is made upon the condition that the said Angelina Brown shall not lease except annually, or otherwise encumber said land and premises, or any part thereof during her natural lifetime; that the said Angelina Brown personally or by agent, shall annually pay the taxes on said land as they accrue and send the receipts thereto [the said receipts being in the name of the said Angelina Brown] to the grantor or to her appointee, said receipts to be forwarded to the grantor Sarah Ann Campbell or her appointed agent, at least four weeks prior to the tax sale in the said county of Wayne, for the year such receipts cover, during the life of said Angelina Brown. Upon a breach of all or any one of either of the foregoing conditions, this conveyance shall be absolutely void, and the grantor or her heirs, executors, or administrators, shall have the right to take possession of said land without being liable for any improvement that may be put thereon in the meantime, but if the said grantee Angelina Brown shall fully keep and perform each and all of the above-expressed conditions during her lifetime, then at her death the title to said land shall hereby vest absolutely in the lineal descendants of said Angelina Brown."

Plaintiffs contend that under the rule in Shelley's Case this deed vested a fee-simple title in their mother, and that they took the same title under her will; while defendants argue that the rule in Shelley's Case is not in force in this state, and that, if it is in force, the facts do not bring it within that rule; and that they, as children of Angelina Brown, are entitled to a share of the estate under and by virtue of the terms of Sarah Ann Campbell's deed.

The issues of law thus defined are sharp and clear and the case must be solved by interpreting the deed to Angelina Brown which we have just set forth. The conveyance on its face is of a life estate to Mrs. Brown, and at her death to her children, or to their lineal descendants; and in the clause referring to conditions subsequent it is provided that, if kept and performed by the said Angelina Brown during her lifetime, at her death the property should vest absolutely in her lineal descendants. It was also provided that she should not lease except annually or otherwise encumber the lands, and that she should pay the taxes thereon.

It is apparent that the grantor did not intend to vest a fee in Angelina Brown, and that her object and purpose were to convey a life estate to her, and to so protect the lands that Mrs. Brown's children or their lineal descendants should take the remainder after the life estate in fee.

Whether or not the rule in Shelley's Case is in force in this state is a question upon which the members of this court are not agreed; but, conceding, arguendo, that it is, the point remains, Is the language used in the deed from Mrs. Campbell such as to bring the case within that rule? The conveyance is plainly of a life estate to Mrs. Brown, and at her death the land was to go to her children, or to their, and not her, lineal descendants. True, in the last clause of the deed it is said that if she should not fail to comply with the conditions that the land should pass to her (Mrs. Brown's) lineal descendants. The modern rule requires a consideration of the whole deed, and a finding of repugnancy will be avoided whenever all the provisions of the instrument may, without ignoring accepted canons of construction, be given force and effect. Beedy v. Finney, 118 Iowa. 276, 91 N. W. 1069.

Applying this rule, it is apparent that there was no intention on the part of the grantor to enlarge the estate granted by the words used in the habendum clause. That the granting clause may be controlled by the habendum we freely concede; but the intent of the maker to do so must be clear, especially where, as in this case, the effect would be to enlarge the estate granted to the first taker.

These clauses may all be easily harmonized, and when read together it is apparent that the grantor did not intend to convey the fee to Mrs. Brown. So that we are brought down to this precise inquiry: Does a grant to one for life, and at her death to her children, or to their lineal descendants, convey a fee to the first taker?

The rule announced in Shelley's Case is a technical one, and generally, or at least 67 L. R. A.

often, thwarts the grantor's intent, and for this reason is almost everywhere strictly construed. Under that rule, if the first taker is given a life estate, and the inheritance passes to his heirs, or to the heirs of his body, either mediately or immediately, the first taker receives the whole estate. In such cases the words "heirs" or "heirs of the body" are regarded as words of limitation, and not of purchase. But the word "heirs" is essential to justify the application of the rule, just as it was at common law to create an estate in fee simple.

The rule does not apply when the limitation is to "children," for such word is one of purchase. Re Utz, 43 Cal. 200; Cannon v. Barry, 59 Miss. 289; Gourdin v. Deas, 27 S. C. 479, 4 S. E. 64; Myers v. Anderson, 1 Strobb. Eq. 344, 47 Am. Dec. 537; Wilson v. McJunkin, 11 Rich. Eq. 527; Carrigan v. Drake, 36 S. C. 354, 15 S. E. 339; Gernet v. Lynn, 31 Pa. 94; Tyler v. Moore, 42 Pa. 374, 1 Monaghan (Pa.) 529, 17 Atl. 216; Jackson v. Jackson, 127 Ind. 346, 26 N. E. 897.

Nor does it apply when the limitation is to the heirs or issue of the first taker and to their heirs; for in such cases there is evinced a purpose to create in the heirs of the first taker an estate in fee simple. Smith v. Collins, 90 Ga. 411, 17 S. E. 1013; McIntyre v. McIntyre, 16 S. C. 290; Myers v. Anderson, 1 Strobb. Eq. 344, 47 Am. Dec. 537; Dott v. Cunningham, 1 Bay, 453, 1 Am. Dec. 624. It is almost universally held that the word "children" is a word of purchase, and not of limitation. May v. Ritchie, 65 Ala. 602; Burns v. Weesner, 134 Ind. 442, 34 N. E. 10; Chapin v. Crow, 147 Ill. 219, 37 Am. St. Rep. 213, 35 N. E. 536; Baskett v. Sellars, 93 Ky. 2, 19 S. W. 9; Adams v. Ross, 30 N. J. L. 505, 82 Am. Dec. 237; Rogers v. Rogers, 3 Wend. 503, 20 Am. Dec. 716; Hague v. Hague, 161 Pa. 643, 41 Am. St. Rep. 900, 29 Atl. 261; Ford v. Flint, 40 Vt. 382; Riggin v. Love, 72 Ill. 553; Rupert v. Penner, 35 Neb. 587, 17 L. R. A. 824, 53 N. W. 598; Bodine v. Arthur, 91 Ky. 53, 34 Am. St. Rep. 162, 14 S. W. 904. Indeed, the word "issue" has been held one of purchase. Jones, Real Prop. § 578. Occasionally the word "children" has been held the equivalent of the word "heirs," but only where it was the manifest intent of the grantor that it should be so construed. Chapin v. Crow, 147 Ill. 219, 37 Am. St. Rep. 213, 35 N. E. 536. Prima facie the word is one of purchase. Chrystie v. Phyfe, 19 N. Y. 344; Guthrie's Appeal, 37 Pa. 9; Anderson v. Anderson, 164 Pa. 338, 30 Atl. 304; Williams v. Knight, 18 R. I. 333, 27 Atl. 210. The instrument in this case does not indicate that the grantor used them in any other sense. As used in the deed ir question, it is descriptive of a class who is to take the fee, or who in fact do take either a contingent or vested remainder by purchase. These rules are settled by the great weight of authority, both ancient and modern, and are in accord with sound principles of construction. Under them Mrs. Brown did not take an estate in fee, but a life estate; and this she could not dispose of by will. The defendants as her children took a share of the property under the deed from Mrs. Campbell, and it is not material now whether that share was a vested or contingent one; hence we do not pass upon that proposition. There are a few cases which lend support to plaintiffs' theory, but they seem to turn upon peculiar facts, or to be ruled by a too strict construction of the rule in Shelley's Case. The statement as to the consideration for the deed, and as to the valuation put upon the property has no significance. Of course, if Mrs. Brown took a fee any restraints upon its alienation would be void; but these restraints are strongly indicative of the grantor's intent, and lend support to the conclusion that she did not use the word "children" as the equivalent of "heirs."

The ruling on the demurrer was correct, and the judgment is affirmed.

MODERN BROTHERHOOD OF AMERICAN ICA, Appt.

(.....Iowa.....)

A Pott's fracture, consisting of the breaking of one bone of the lower leg between the knee and ankle joint, and a severance of the malleolus process of the other one so as to effect a complete solution of the continuity of both bones, is not covered by a policy providing indemnity in case of the breaking of the shafts of both bones between the knee and ankle joints.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Calhoun County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a certificate of membership in a fraternal insurance company as specific indemnity for the breaking of a leg. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Blythe, Markley, & Rule for appellant.

Mr. C. O. Longley, for appellee:

The terms of an insurance contract "are to be understood in their plain, ordinary, and popular sense, unless they have generally, in respect to the subject-matter, as by the known usage of trade or the like, acquired a peculiar sense, distinct from the popular sense."

May, Ins. § 173.

An agreement ought to receive that construction which will best carry out the intention of the parties, this intention being gathered from the whole agreement, and not from detached portions thereof.

If the defendant desires to limit its liability to the breaking defined, and no other, such limitation should be made specific and without doubt or question.

Deemer, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

As the case involves less than \$100, a certificate of appeal was allowed by the trial judge, and the case comes to us in virtue of this certificate. The certificate or policy issued by the defendant company provides that, should the member, while in good standing, accidentally break his leg or arm, he should receive one tenth of the amount his beneficiary would be entitled to recover in case of the death of such member. It also provided: "The breaking of a leg is defined to be the breaking of the shaft of the thigh bone between the hip and knee joints, or the breaking of the shafts of both bones between the knee and ankle joints." The plaintiff sustained what is known to the medical profession as a "Pott's fracture" of the right leg, which, as usually defined, is the breaking of one bone between the knee and ankle joints, and the dislocation of the other, or, as described in this particular case by the physicians who gave testimony, as the breaking of the fibula $1\frac{1}{2}$ to 2 inches above the joint, and of what is known as the "malleolus process." The physicians further said that there was "complete solution of the continuity of both bones." The contention of appellant is that the language of the certificate limits the breaking of a leg, for which an indemnity is to be paid, to such breaking as is described in the language of the certificate, and that there was not in this case a breaking of the shafts of both bones, within the definition set forth in the contract, because the term "shaft" or "shafts" excludes the extremities of the bones and the malleolus process, which is in reality a protuberance from the head of the bone. That there is a manifest distinction between the shaft of a bone and its extremities is too clear for argument. But appellee insists that the language used in the certificate should be so construed as to cover the injury above described; relying upon the proposition that it is the duty of the court to construe the terms of every policy of insurance or benefit certificate most strongly against the insurer, and to resolve every doubt or ambiguity in favor of the insured. There is no doubt about the rule for which he contends, but the difficulty is in its application. If the language used in the certificate is ambiguous, or is reasonably capable of two or more constructions, that construction should be given which will afford the insured protection under his certificate. But the parties have the right to make contracts for themselves, and there is no authority for the court to change such contracts. To take away from parties or from persons or corporations this undeniable right of contract, or to make contracts for parties, is not within the province of courts of justice. In the instant case, had there been no attempt at definition of what was meant by the breaking of a leg, there would be no doubt that plaintiff's injury was covered by his certificate; but here there is a definition given which is clear and unambiguous, and there is no reason why the parties may not define any term they see fit to use in their engagements one with the other. The certificate plainly says that the breaking of the shaft of both bones between the knee and ankle joint is what is meant by the term "breaking of a leg." We have no means of knowing what the insured thought when he received this certificate, and it matters little what his thoughts were in this connection, if it be found that the language used is plain and susceptible of but one construction. True, when the terms of an instrument have been intended in a different sense by the parties to it, that sense is to prevail against either party in which he had reason to suppose that the other understood it. Code, § 4617. But in construing this statute, which is simply declaratory of the common law, we have held that, if the language is plain, it cannot be used for the purpose of making the contract conform to the notions of one of the parties executing it. Congower v. Equitable Mut. Life & Endowment Assn. 94 Iowa, 499, 63 N. W. 192. In another case we said that the provision is applicable only where the writing involved is fairly susceptible of different meanings. Rouss v. Creglow, 103 Iowa, 60, 72 N. W. 429. See also Field v. Eastern Bldg. & L. Assn. 117 Iowa, 185, 90 N. W. 717.

The pivotal question in the case, then, is, Is the definition of the "breaking of a leg," used in the certificate in suit, fairly susceptible of different meanings? This all depends upon what effect shall be given the use of the words "shaft" and "shafts." Looking to the derivation of these words, we find that they mean "handle or haft; a shaven or smoothed rod." In the definition as given in the contract it is the shafts of both bones between the ankle and knee joint. This clearly excludes the heads of the bones, the joints themselves, or the process attached to these heads, which have distinct and definite names. Treating the words as technical, as they no doubt are, the plaintiff is in no better position. Technical words are to be interpreted as usually understood by persons in the profession or business to which they relate. Gauch v. St. Louis Mut. L. Ins. Co. 88 Ill. 251, 30 Am. Rep. 554; Dana v. Fiedler, 12 N. Y. 40, 62 Am. Dec. 130. The medical profession are agreed that the shaft of a bone is something entirely distinct from the malleolus process. There is no room for any doubt as to what these words mean to the medical profession, and nothing in the record suggests that the parties did not use them in a technical sense. Even if there be a popular meaning of the term "shaft," it has not been disclosed to us; and, taking the full definition as given in the certificate itself, there are, as it seems to us, no two constructions to be put upon the language used. There was, it is conceded, no breaking of the shafts of both bones, unless we say the protuberance from the head of one of the bones known as the "malleolus process" is a part of the shaft of the bone between the knee and ankle joint. Manifestly this protuberance is not so located. It projects from the end of the head of the bone downward toward the heel. Doubtless the accident is more serious than if both shafts had been broken, and plaintiff needs his insurance just as badly as if they had been, but this is no reason for changing the terms of his certificate. The defendant company had the right to narrow its liability, to define the terms used in its certificates, to remove from the field of debate the character of a particular injury, or, in other words, to make its own contract. Having made its contract, it is not within the province of a court of justice to change its terms to meet the equities of a particular case. Our views find support in the following cases: Stevens v. People's Mut. Acci. Ins. Asso. 150 Pa. 132, 16 L. R. A. 446, 24 Atl. 662; Gentry v. Standard Life & Acci. Ins. Co. 6 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 114, 5 Ohio N. P. 331; Maryland Casualty Co. v. Hudgins (Tex.) 64 L. R. A. 349, 76 S. W. 745.

The injury does not come within the terms of the certificate issued by the defendant association, and the court was in error in rendering judgment against it. For the reasons pointed out, the judgment must be, and it is, reversed.

Weaver, J., dissenting:

Among the most familiar rules of the law of insurance is that which requires the courts to construe every ambiguous and doubtful provision of the policy most strongly against the insurer. The company itself frames the instrument in language of its own choosing, and it brings to that effort the skill born of experience and the aid of learned and astute counsel. The average man to whom that contract is tendered is unlearned in such matters, and he accepts it for what it seems to say; relying upon the company, or upon the agent, who is usually his neighbor, to act in good faith and furnish him the indemnity for which he pays. It is to the credit of the great majority of the companies engaged in this most necessary and useful line of business that the confidence of the insured person is not often abused, and when he suffers loss within the apparent terms of the contract his claim is promptly adjusted and paid. Unfortunately, however, this rule is not universal, and not infrequently the courts are required to deal with policies which appear to have been designed with a deliberate purpose to deceive and mislead the holders. Buried in verbiage, ambushed in small type, obscured in technical terminology, are conditions, warranties, forfeiture clauses, and restrictive definitions without limit, which no one ever reads, nor are they intended to be read or understood, until a loss occurs, when they are summoned forth from their native darkness to defeat a recovery by the assured, or to serve as a menace by which to force him to a compromise of his claim. Ordinarily the courts, when called upon, are prompt to thwart such injustice, though sometimes, as in the case at bar, they reach the conclusion that the arm of the law is too short to arrest the accomplishment of an admitted wrong. The principle stated at the outset of this dissent has been often and effectively applied, and, in my judgment, should be invoked in the present controversy.

In Meyer v. Fidelity & C. Co. 96 Iowa, 378, 59 Am. St. Rep. 374, 65 N. W. 328, the accident policy sued upon excepted from its operation injuries caused by "disease or bodily infirmity," and the company defended upon the theory that the cause of Meyer's death was within the exception. There was evidence tending to show that he was seen to sway and stagger as if seized with sudden illness, and fell, striking his head upon the pavement, receiving a fatal injury. On the trial of the case the company insisted that the word "disease" should be given its strict technical meaning,—"any derangement of the functions or alteration of the structure of the animal organs,"—thus necessarily including the slightest and most temporary, as well as the most serious and inveterate, ailments. To this contention we refused to yield, saying: "When speaking of an 'infirmity,' we generally mean the state or quality of being infirm physically or otherwise,—debility or weakness; and by . . . 'disease' we desire to convey the impression of a morbid condition resulting from some functional disturbance or failure of physical function which tends to undermine the constitution. . . . In using either of the words we do not, as a rule, refer to a slight and mere temporary disturbance or enfeeblement. If this is true of our ordinary speaking and writing, it is certainly clear that the words should be given no broader meaning when we find them used by an insurance company in a clause of its policy which it relies upon to defeat a recovery thereon. The language used is made up of words framed by the company or its legal advisers in an attempt to limit as narrowly as possible the scope of the insurance, and it is a universal as well as a fair rule, adopted by the courts everywhere, to construe the terms of the policy most strongly against the assurer, and to resolve every doubt or ambiguity in favor of the assured and against the assurer." This certainly is a most wholesome doctrine, and one which, I trust, has not yet "lost its savor." The language which I have italicized in the foregoing quotation states, with a force not to be improved upon, the proposition of law which in my judgment controls this case,—that in a policy of accident insurance the company will not be allowed to escape liability by a technical construction of any word or phrase in the contract, but, for the purpose of preserving the policy holder's indemnity, such words and phrases will be given their popular meaning, as employed in ordinary speaking and writing. Apply that rule to the present case, and the right of plaintiff to recover is too clear for argument. The appellant is here relying upon the identical proposition by which the company in the Meyer Case sought to avoid recovery. It insists, and the majority opinion sustains its contention, that what is meant by the "shafts of both bones between the knee and ankle joints" must not be sought in common usage, or in our everyday speaking and writing, but we must delve in the maze of medical and anatomical nomenclature, and observe the minute lines of demarcation by which a learned profession has mapped and charted each particular bone of the human frame into subdivisions too small to permit the inscription of their ponderous Latin names. The opinion tells us that in ordinary parlance the word "shaft" is commonly the equivalent of "handle or haft"—"a shaven or smoothed rod." We find it applied also to an architectural column; to the trunk or the main stem of a tree; to the central stem or body of a feather; to an arrow; to the revolving bar or beam by which force or power is conveyed from an engine to various kinds of working machinery. It has many other applications, but those stated are enough to indicate that to the ordinary mind the word "shaft" conveys in a general way the idea of a body having considerable length in proportion to its diameter, more or less rounded or cylindrical in form, and continuous from end to end. Now, every person of ordinary intelligence knows that he has two bones in each lower leg; that those bones are more or less rounded in form, are comparatively straight, and continuous from knee joint to ankle joint; and, if he hears them spoken of as "shafts," his knowledge of the ordinary application of the term to other objects enables him to appreciate its aptness, but, in the absence of a technical education, he has no suspicion that the protection afforded by a policy which insures him against a breaking of these shafts can by any process of interpretation be limited to a mere fraction of the bones supposed to be thus designated. Indeed, until disaster arrives, and in his innocence he asks payment of indemnity, he will never dream that his shin bone is a "tibia," and its lower extremity nothing but a worthless "malleolus." Even if we assume the correctness of the definition and of the illustration given in the majority opinion, I am at loss to understand how it can be fairly said that the reference in the policy to the shafts of the bones between the knee and ankle joints "clearly excludes the heads of the bones, and processes attached to these heads, having distinct and definite names." The bone is one continuous, solid structure from its upper extremity at the knee joint down to and including the extreme tip at the ankle joint, and the last inch of the tip is no less a part of the bone than is any other inch throughout its length. The long bones of the leg, when denuded of flesh, are shown to be somewhat larger at the ends than at intermediate points, and it is these enlarged ends to which I understand the opinion refers as "heads." The proposition last quoted is, in effect, that by the word "shafts" the parties must be presumed to have meant that the company should be liable for no fracture except such as might occur in the smaller part of the bones, between the enlarged ends; and, had plaintiff sustained a complete fracture of both bones through both heads "between knee and ankle joints," his leg would still be unbroken, for the purposes of this case.

It is said by the majority, also, that "the distinction between the shaft of a bone and its extremities is too clear for argument." That there is a difference between a yardstick and the ends of a yardstick is admittedly evident to the dullest intellect, but just how to effect a "complete solution" of either "extremity" of a yardstick, and leave that ancient standard of measure unbroken and unimpaired, is beyond my comprehension. It appears, however, that the appellant is the discoverer of a method by which the seemingly impossible may be accomplished. Nor can I appreciate the conclusiveness of the argument based upon the thought that the so-called malleolus is a mere process or protuberance from the head of the bone, and is known to physicians and surgeons by a distinctive name. Cape Colony is none the less a part of Africa because it constitutes the small end of the continent, and has a name of its own. Moreover, the policy itself clearly indicates that the word "shaft" was used as applicable to the entire bone. In speaking of a fracture of the "shafts of both bones between the knee and ankle joints," it, in substance and effect, describes the bones to which it refers as extending from joint to joint, or, in other words, the bones entire from one extremity to the other. That is the meaning which would be given it by the average reader, and the insurer must be held to have meant the phrase in the sense in which it would appeal to such reader. The company will not be permitted to assume that the insured person knows the technical meaning of terms employed in the policy. Potter v. Phenix Ins. Co. 63 Fed. 382.

That both bones of the plaintiff's leg were in fact broken, there is no dispute. The physician describes the injury as a "fracture of the tibia of the right leg, broken across the malleolus, and of the fibula 3 inches above the joint; a complete solution of the continuity of both bones." This I understand to mean that there was a complete breaking and severance of each of both bones into two separate fragments. The fact that the lower fragment of the tibia was small, as compared to the entire bone, is a matter of no moment. The breaking was complete, and plaintiff's cause of action was perfect. There is a noted precedent in fiction for the thought that the smallness of the fruit of transgression may be pleaded in extenuation of the fault, but the time has not yet arrived when we can safely recognize it as a principle of law.

Illustrating the tendency of courts to construe policies of insurance broadly and liberally, in the interest of the assured, I call attention to a few of the many precedents. Under a policy insuring against the accidental loss of "two entire feet," a recovery was had on proof that the assured received a gunshot wound in the back, producing total paralysis of both legs and feet. Sheanon v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. 77 Wis. 618, 9 L. R. A. 685, 20 Am. St. Rep. 151, 46 N. W. 799. Under an insurance against a like loss of an "entire hand," recovery was sustained on proof that a "little over one-half the hand, anatomically speaking," had been lost by an accidental injury. Sneck v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 88 Hun, 94, 34 N. Y. Supp. 545. Under a similar policy, it was shown that the assured had lost three fingers wholly, and part of the fourth, and that the joint of the thumb was destroyed. Contending for the literal construction of the policy, the company insisted that it required the amputation of the member at or above the wrist, to constitute the loss of an entire hand; but the court held that this "would be too much of a refinement upon language for practical purposes," and sustained an instruction submitting the question to a jury. Lord v. American Mut. Acci. Asso. 89 Wis. 19, 26 L. R. A. 741, 46 Am. St. Rep. 815, 61 N. W. 293; Supreme Court of Honor v. Turner, 99 Ill. App. 310. Bearing in the same direction, see Corbett v. Spring Garden Ins. Co. 85 Hun, 250, 32 N. Y. Supp. 1059. A condition against liability of the company for death or injury by the "inhalation of gas" has been held to refer solely to a voluntary inhalation, and recovery upheld for the death of a policy holder by suffocation by gas in a well. Pickett v. Pacific Mut. L. Locomotive Engineers' Mut. Life & Acci. Ins. Asso. 16 Utah, 145, 67 Am. St. Rep. 602, 51 Pac. 259. In the last case cited the court says: "The terms of the by-law in question must be interpreted liberally and reasonably, and, as they appear to be susceptible of two constructions, that must be adopted which will more nearly carry out the benign object of the association and sustain the claim of the injured. The provision will not be scrutinized for the purpose of enabling the organization to escape liability to any of its members." Insurance against injury by which the assured is "totally disabled; absolutely, necessarily, and continuously confined to the house"—will sustain a recovery on proof of total disability for labor, although the injured person remained most of the time in the open air. Scales v. Masonic Protective Asso. 70 N. H. 490, 48 Atl. 1084. The court there argues that it was unreasonable to suppose that company intended its language to be understood literally, and adds: "Such supposition cannot be entertained without an accompanying inference that the defendant intended to deceive." Under a policy insuring against death by "external, violent, and accidental means," and excluding all "injuries from poison or anything accidentally or otherwise taken, administered, absorbed, or inhaled," a petition alleging that the assured came to his death by swallowing hard, pointed, resistant substances of food, which perforated his intestines, already weakened by disease, was held to state a good cause of action. Milner v. Fidelity & C. Co. 97 Fed. 836. A real-estate and loan broker, who held a policy against loss of time which shall "immediately and wholly disable and prevent him from prosecuting any and every kind of business pertaining to his occupation," suffered the dislocation of a shoulder. He was able to go to his office every day and give orders, and directions to his assistant, but did no other work. It was held there was no error in submitting the claim to a jury. Turner v. Fidelity & C. Co. 112 Mich. 425, 38 L. R. A. 529, 67 Am. St. Rep. 428, 70 N. W. 898. See also Young v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 80 Me. 244, 13 Atl. 896. In the Turner Case the court restates the familiar rule as follows: "Where a stipulation or exception to a policy emanating from the insurer is capable of two meanings, the one is to be adopted which is the most favorable to the insured." The policy should "be framed with such deliberate care that no form of expression by which, on the one hand, the party insured can be caught, or, . . . on the other, the company can be cheated, should be found on the face of it."

The foregoing are a few of very many cases, all of which deny the right of an insurance company to escape liability on its policy by strict or technical interpretation of its language. In not one of the cases referred to could the policy holder have recovered, had the court permitted the contract to be interpreted strictly and technically, according to its literal terms, as this court proposes to interpret the policy now before us. In all of the decisions which it has been my privilege to examine upon this subject, I have failed to find a single example in which the facts called more loudly for the application of the rule thus approved than does the one at bar. This controversy involves but a trifling sum of money, and would not justify the time here given to its attention but for the precedent which it establishes. It is a matter of common notoriety that in the wake of legitimate insurance, which is the development of centuries, there has sprung up within recent years a countless horde of unsubstantial schemes, represented by swarms of persuasive agents and promoters, by whom a very large proportion of the people has been wheedled into purchasing so-called indemnity against all the ills to which flesh is heir. Many millions of dollars have been expended upon these glittering schemes by wage earners and small property holders, only to find concealed within their contracts some unsuspected condition which renders them valueless in the hour of misfortune, or, if perchance the contract be perfect in form, to find that the entire assets of the insurers are represented by an office desk filled with finely engraved stationery and advertising matter, describing with florid laudation the benevolent, fraternal, and unselfish character of the enterprise. I do not wish to be understood as placing the appellant company in this class. The record before us is very brief, disclosing but few facts, and the company is entitled to the benefit of the general presumption of good faith which attaches to all ordinary business transactions. This charitable presumption in which the law indulges also compels us to assume that, in framing its contract, the appellant used the words which we have been considering in the sense in which it must have known the plaintiff would understand them, and not in the technical sense in which it now asks the court to interpret them. To adopt any other theory would make necessary the inference that it deliberately intended to deceive.

The suggestion in the majority opinion that the company had the right to make its own contract is true in a restricted sense only. In few, if any, lines of business have legislatures and courts gone further in restricting and regulating contract rights and relations than in matters pertaining to insurance. The peculiar nature of the business has not only justified, but compelled, the interposition and exercise of this power of regulation and supervision for the protection of the public, and we should be careful not to relax our insistence upon every rule by which that protection is made effectual.

In my opinion, the judgment of the district court should be affirmed.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

CINCINNATI, LAWRENCEBURG, & AU-RORA ELECTRIC STREET RAILROAD COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

George J. LOHE, Admr., etc., of William Lohe, Deceased.

(68 Ohio St. 101.)

*1 An interurban electric railroad is classed as a street railroad by the statutes of this state.

2. While such interurban railroad companies are subject to the same regulations and have all the powers of street railroad companies, so far as applicable, the law of negligence governing the standing on a platform of a moving street car in a municipality is not applicable to the case of standing on such platform of a moving interurban car in the open country.

3. The law of negligence governing the standing on a platform of a moving interurban car outside of a municipality is the same as in the case of steam cars; and where a rule of the company prohibits passengers from standing on the platform, and notice thereof is properly posted, or where the passengers, upon request, refuse to enter the car, there being in either case vacant seats, they remain on the platform at their peril.

4. In a contract for safe carriage, there is an implied agreement that the passenger will obey the reasonable rules of the carrier; and where the passenger purposely violates such rule, and is thereby injured, he cannot recover damages from the carrier in an action on the contract.

*Headnotes by the Court.

(March 3, 1903.)

NOTE.—Is an interurban railroad company controlled by the general railroad law in regard to the operation of railroads as carriers of passengers?

The cases are very meagre on this question. Many cases have arisen in which the rule might have been determined, but the question was not discussed. For instance, in cases against street railroad companies for injuries to passengers the rule of contributory negligence is generally applied, and to substantiate that rule the court often cites cases that were actions against steam railroad companies operating under the general railroad law, without attempting to distinguish between those cases. Such cases are not cited in this note. The rule is stated in CINCINNATI, L. & A. ELECTRIC STREET R. CO. V. LOHE that an interurban electric railroad is classed as a street railroad by the Ohio Statutes, and subject to the same regulations; yet, the law of liability is that of a general railroad for injuries received by a passenger outside of the city limits. This seems to be sound. A few cases which appear to have been those of interurban railroads, but were not technically classed as such by the courts, incidentally discuss the duty of the carrier to the public.

In New York the question of applicability of the general railroad law to a horse railroad was raised, but in two cases it was held that the defendants did not bring themselves within the terms of the statute.

As in Lehr v. Steinway & H. P. R. Co. 26 N. Y. Week. Dig. 433, 8 N. Y. S. R. 813, Affirmed in 118 N. Y. 556, 23 N. E. 889, which was an action against a railroad company using horse cars, for injuries caused to a passenger who was crowded off the front platform, the defendant claimed that it was exempt under N. Y. Laws 1850, chap. 140, § 46 (general railroad law), providing: "In case any passenger on any railroad shall be injured while on the platform of a car, or on any baggage, wood, or freight car, in violation of the printed regulations of the company posted up at the time in a conspicuous place inside of its passenger cars then in the train, such company shall not be liable for the injury: Provided said company at the time furnished room inside its 67 L. R. A. passenger cars sufficient for the proper accommodation of its passengers." It was held that at this time there was no seat furnished him in the car, and therefore the statute invoked by the defendant had no application.

So in Nolan v. Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. 87 N. Y. 63, 41 Am. Rep. 345, which was an action by a passenger for injuries received by being jolted off the front platform of a street car, drawn by horses, by reason of the driver whipping one of the horses, it was contended that the defendant was exempt under New York Laws 1850, p. 211, § 46, supra. It was held that this act relieved companies from liability where they posted in their cars a warning against riding on the platform, and furnished a seat for the passenger within the car; but the notice in this case was: "Passengers are forbidden to get on or off the car while in motion; or on or off the front platform; or on or off the side, except nearest the sidewalk." This was held not to forbid the riding on the front platform.

In an action against a horse railroad, the court distinguished between the difference in the care required of a passenger and that of one on a railroad train, holding that the general rule of contributory negligence arising from riding on a platform, applicable in a steam railroad case, does not apply to a horse railroad.

This was in Meesel v. Lynn & B. R. Co. 8 Allen, 234, which was an action for injuries sustained by a passenger, riding on the front platform of a horse railroad car, being thrown from the car by a jerk. The court referred to cases discussing the law of care required in railroad cases, and said: "In the cases above cited, it ought to be known by all persons who have anything to do with railroad trains that it is hazardous and inconsistent with the exercise of ordinary care to leave the seats provided for passengers and stand upon the platform, or attempt to leave the train while it is in motion, or to sit with an elbow projecting beyond the external surface of a window, or to cross a moving train by passing between the cars. But, in respect to the facts stated in this report, there is no such general knowledge as enables the court to say that ERROR to the Circuit Court for Hamilton County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Reversed.

Statement by Burket, Ch. J.:

The plaintiff in error, the Cincinnati, Lawrenceburg, & Aurora Electric Street Railroad Company, is the owner of an inter-urban electric street railroad, extending from Cincinnati to Lawrenceburg and Aurora, with a branch extending from Cleves to Harrison. The road is constructed with heavy rails laid on cross-ties, and equipped with large coaches, with seats on each side of the aisle, two compartments,—one a smoker,—a vestibule at each end, with steps leading to the ground, and propelled in the ordinary manner by electricity. On July 4, 1900, William Lohe was received as a passenger at Cleves to be carried to Harrison, paid his fare, and took a position on the rear platform or vestibule, where he remained, smoking a cigar, until the car became derailed and fell on its side, and he was killed. It was a rule of the company that passengers were not allowed on the platform, and a notice was posted on the platform where he stood: "Passengers not allowed on the platform." His attention was called to this notice by the conductor, and he was ordered to go into the car, as there were empty seats there for his accommodation. He refused, and said that he did not care about going in, as he was smoking a cigar. Shortly thereafter the assistant conductor requested him to step inside the car, but he remained on the platform until the car became derailed in going around a curve, and he was killed. Those in the car were not injured, except one man, whose leg was slightly injured. The petition of the plaintiff below avers that, in consideration of the fare so paid, the railroad company undertook to safely carry the deceased as a passenger from Cleves to Harrison, and the plaintiff did not use due care. On the contrary, it is well known that the highest speed of a horse railroad car is very moderate, and the driver easily controls it, and stops the car by means of his voice, his reins, and his brake. In turning around an angle from one street to another, passengers are not required to expect that he will drive at a rapid rate; but, on the contrary, might reasonably expect a careful driver to slacken his speed. The seats inside the car are not the only places where the managers of the train expect passengers to remain; but it is notorious that they stop habitually to receive passengers to stand inside till the car is full, and then to stand upon the platforms till they are full, and continue to stop and receive them even after there is no place for them to stand except on the steps of the platforms. Neither the officers of these corporations, nor the managers of the cars, nor the traveling public, seem to regard this practice as hazardous; nor does experience thus far seem to require that it should be restrained upon the ground of its danger."

In Alabama a dummy line was held to be a railroad, and the railroad law in regard to trains stopping at an intersecting crossing was held applicable. One of the reasons given was that this application would protect human life.

In Birmingham Mineral R. Co. v. Jacobs, 92 Ala. 187, 12 L. R. A. 830, 9 So. 320, which was an action for the death of an engineer on a dummy line between Birmingham and Ensley City, against a railroad for failure to stop at intersections, thereby causing the death of the intestate, it was held that a dummy line was a railroad, under Ala. Code, § 1921, providing that such corporation shall have power to construct, maintain, and use a street railroad upon the streets, and upon the lines, and between the termini named in the certificate, in any city or town, upon such terms and in such manner as may be authorized by the proper authorities. The court said: "A railroad organized under this act of the legislature, running beyond the corporate limits of any city or town and through counties, is not and necessarily cannot be a street railway, within the meaning of the Constitution, and the provisions of the Code in regard to street railways. Except as to its termini, it is entirely independent of municipal control. It derives its corporate powers and existence under the act of the legislature, after leaving the city boundaries, by contract with the counties through which it runs. There is no limitation to the extent of such a road. Under its provision, a road could be constructed from Huntsville to Mobile,—traversing the entire length of the state. There is no limitation upon the power and character of the propelling force, or the business to be conducted. It is common knowledge that railroads incorporated under this act, having in use heavy dummy engines, run from Birmingham to Bessemer City, and to other parts of the state, traversing wide scopes of country with regular stations, soliciting patronage, and competing with other railroads in carrying both freight and passengers. The very act itself, in the second section, no longer designates railroads organized under its provisions, after they leave the corporate limits, as street railways, but as 'railroad companies.' They are engaged in the same business as other roads, propelled by the same dangerous power of steam, and attended with the dangers incident to the operation of other railroads. Is there any reason why such roads should not provide comfortable depots for passengers in the country, and have their freight rates regulated, where they carry freight, and be taxed as other railroads, engaged in like business? Is there any reason why they should not be required to put up sign boards, and ring signal bells, and stop their trains at public road crossings and at railroad crossings, and observe all the safeguards required of other railroads, to prevent collisions and for the protection of human life? Is it reasonable to hold that, because of the structure of dummy engines, many of these regulations can be observed and complied with by those in control of them more easily than other engines: therefore they shall not obey them at all? After leaving the city limits, as we have shown, they are no longer that by the negligence of the company the car was thrown from the track, and, without any fault on his part, he was thereby killed. The railroad company answered, and denied all negligence on its part, and denied that his death was caused without any fault on his part. Upon a trial before the court and a jury, a verdict was returned in favor of the administrator and against the company. A motion for a new trial was overruled, and judgment entered on the verdict, to all of which proper exceptions were saved. The circuit court affirmed the judgment, and thereupon a petition in error was filed here by the railroad company, seeking to reverse the judgments of the lower courts. The errors complained of arise upon the charge as given, and upon refusal to charge as requested, and these will be noted in the opinion.

Messrs. Peck, Shaffer, & Peck and Shepherd & Shaffer, for plaintiff in error.

By reason of violation of the rule, deceased ceased to be entitled to the protection due a passenger, and was only entitled to the exercise of that degree of care which would protect him against wilful or reckless injuries.

Interurban electric traction lines more nearly resemble steam roads as to construction and equipment and service than street railroads, and the rules of law governing the conduct of passengers on steam railroads should be applied to them.

The general rule with reference to steam-railroad cars is that, if a passenger elects, to ride upon the platform without any necessity, real or apparent, for taking that position, and while so riding is injured under street railways, subject to municipal regulations, and, if not railroads within the meaning of the general law, we may well inquire, What kind of railroads are they, and by what laws are they governed? Can it be presumed that the legislature intended to provide for the incorporation of a species of railroad companies sui generis, not subject to any law except the common law, for common carriers, while the duties and liabilities of all other railroad companies are regulated and controlled by statutory enactments? We are of the opinion that the Ensley Railway comes directly within 'railroad companies,' as defined by § 1173 of the Code of 1886, and which is as follows: 'Section 1173. Meaning of "Railroad Company." Unless clearly otherwise apparent from the context, the term "railroad company," as used in this chapter, includes any person or corporation owning or operating a railroad.'

The protection of passengers traveling on electric cars is said to be governed by the general railroad law, in Alabama.

This rule is stated in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Anchors, 114 Ala. 492, 62 Am. St. Rep. 116, 22 So. 279, which was an action against a railroad company for killing a conductor on an electric car, the complaint alleging that the defendant ran its trains in the city without signals and at excessive speed, contrary to the city ordinance. The court said: "Section 1145 of the Code of 1886 provides as follows: 'When the tracks of two railroads cross each other, engineers and conductors must cause the trains of which they are in charge to come to a full stop within 100 feet of such crossing, and not proceed until they know the way to be clear; the train on the railroad having the older right of way being entitled to cross first.' The demurrer raises the question as to whether the railroad of the Oxford Lake Line, an electric railroad running from Anniston to a point beyond the corporate limits of the city, upon which the plaintiff's intestate was conductor, is a railroad, within the meaning of said § 1145. In the case of Birmingham Mineral R. Co. v. Jacobs, 92 Ala. 199, 12 L. R. A. 830, 67 L. R. A.

9 So. 320, we had occasion to consider §§ 1145 and 1173. The question in that case was whether railroads using dummy engines, and operated beyond city limits, are subject to these provisions. After careful deliberation, this court reached the conclusion that railroad corporations organized under and by virtue of §§ 1918 and 1921 of the Code of 1886, as amended by act of February 25th, 1887 (Acts 1886, 1887, p. 144), were not strictly street railways, as contemplated in the statute providing for the organization and operation of street railroads (§§ 1603-1612, Code 1886), and that railroads organized under the act of February 25th [1887] supra, using dummy engines, were subject to said statutory provisions. The question now is whether a railroad upon which electricity is used as the moving power is a railroad, within the provisions of the statute. The statute itself makes no distinction, and, in considering the purposes intended in the adoption of these regulations, we are unable to see any good reason why persons traveling upon electric cars are not entitled to the same protection as those traveling upon cars propelled by steam. Public necessities, even within city limits, demand increased facilities for travel over the horse car; and many decisions of courts applicable to street railways operated by horses could not be applied without manifest injustice to trains operated by steam or electricity. The speed, economy, and convenience afforded by electricity commend its use, even for commercial purposes, as well as travel, as superior in some respects to any other motive power thus far applied. A railroad within the provisions of the statute does not cease to be such railroad because it may discontinue the use of steam, and substitute that of electricity. The change in the motor power may relieve it from some provisions of the statute, but those which are needful for the protection of life and property continue in force. Jacobs's Case, 92 Ala. 199, 12 L. R. A. 830, 9 So. 320, and authorities cited; Birmingham R. & Electric Co. v. Baylor, 101 Ala. 498, 13 So. 793."

And the same rule was applied in Missouri.

Messrs. Isaac B. Matson and Alfred B. Benedict for defendant in error.

Burket, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Counsel for the railroad company requested the court to give the following charges to the jury:

"(1) If the jury should find from the evidence that William Lohe was standing upon the platform of defendant's car at the time when the car was derailed, and that he had been notified by the conductor to go inside the car, and that there was room within the car, where he might have been seated, and that said William Lohe failed or refused to comply with said request, but remained upon the platform, and that his death was due to the fact of his remaining in that position, your verdict should be for the defendant.

"(2) If the jury should find from the evidence that the defendant company had established a rule forbidding passengers to stand upon their platforms, and had posted notices of such rule upon the platforms of its cars, and that there was such a notice upon the platform of the car upon which William Lohe was riding upon the 4th day and along the streets of a city or town for the carriage of persons from one point to another in such city or town, or to and from its suburbs. It is peculiarly an institution for the accommodation of people in cities or towns; its tracks are ordinarily laid to conform to street grades; its cars run at short intervals, stopping at street crossings to take on and discharge passengers, and in its business is confined to the carriage of passengers, and not freight. Booth, Street Railways, § 1; Elliott, Roads & Streets, p. 557; Williams v. City Electric Street R. Co. 41 Fed. 556; Funk v. St. Paul City R. Co. 61 Minn. 435, 29 L. R. A. 208, 52 Am. St. Rep. 608, 63 N. W. 1099. The road in question is quite a different thing from that just described. It is not strictly local in its character; it is not used to carry passengers from corner to corner, or from one section or portion of a city to another, or to transport persons from 'down town' to and from the suburbs; it pays little attention to streets and roads, but takes its course through the country just as any other railroad. It is a means of transporting persons from one city to another.—Its western terminus being at or near the eastern limits of Kansas City, and its eastern terminus the public square at Independence. It is rural rather than urban."

But in the case that arose in that state the electric railroad succeeded to the charter privileges of a steam railroad, and it was held to have taken the obligations of a railroad in acquiring its privileges.

This was held in Hannah v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 81 Mo. App. 78, which was an action against an electric railway company operating between Kansas City and Independence for damages for killing stock where the right of way was unfenced. It was held that it was liable because it succeeded to the rights of a railroad company organized under the general railroad law. The court said that it assumed the obligations, "among which was to maintain and operate said railroad, and to observe, also, the statutory regulations required for the protection of stock along the road and guard the safety of the traveling public,—that is, maintain fences along its right of way to the like extent as required of its predecessor. . . . That defendant has changed the motive power from steam to electricity can make no difference; it still remains a railroad within the meaning of the act. . . . The law was intended as a protection to stock and to human life." The court said: "A street railway has been variously defined. As the name indicates, the primary meaning of street railway, or street railroad, is one constructed and operated on 67 L. R. A.

of July, 1900, and that William Lohe was standing upon the platform at the time the car left the track, and that he had been requested to leave said platform and go inside the car, and that there was room for him within the car, and said William Lohe disregarded said notice and remained upon the platform; and if the jury further find that if he had gone into the car, and had not remained upon the platform, he would not have been injured,—then the verdict of the jury should be for the defendant in this action."

The court refused both of said charges, and proper exceptions were saved.

After attempting to so clearly define "proximate cause" and "contributory negligence" as to enable the jury to understand the same, the court charged the jury as follows:

"Let us now apply these rules to the case at bar. It is not denied that the deceased, William Lohe, was standing on the rear platform of the car in question immediately before the car was derailed. It is not contradicted by the evidence that the deceased was warned or requested to go into the car, and that, as a matter of choice, he preferred to remain outside, on the platform; that the company's employees did not further attempt to enforce the rule that passengers should remain inside of the car. The deceased was found dead, with a part of his body underneath the car or the vestibule. How he got there—whether by falling or jumping or by being jolted off—is disputed. A passenger who is not coerced or induced by the railroad company or its employees to stand upon a platform, or who stands upon the platform, not as a matter of necessity, but simply from choice, although it may be caused by the discomfort of a crowded car, assumes the risks and hazards which ensue from that position. The deceased therefore assumed the risks and hazards incidental and usual to that position. Whether the company, through its employees, posted such warnings upon the car, or whether prior to that time the defendant company failed at all other times, or only occasionally, whether such rule was disregarded by passengers at other times, will be immaterial in this case, because of the actual notice given him by the employees.

"The deceased, William Lohe, by his position, therefore, assumed the risk of being jolted off the platform by collision with teams, vehicles, or other obstructions upon the highway, or of being jolted off by the turning of sharp curves, or the sudden or quick stoppage of the car in case of emergency. The deceased did not, by the fact of standing upon the platform, assume the risk of a derailment or upsetting of the car. The fact that he stood on the platform was a condition, and not a cause, of the derailment or upsetting of the car. Therefore the mere act of standing upon the platform could not be a proximate cause of the injuries and death of the deceased. But whether by any other act alone, or connected with the act of standing upon the platform, was the proximate cause of the injuries and death of the deceased, is for you to determine."

The correctness of this charge and of these requests depends to some extent upon the character to be assigned to the interurban railroad upon which the accident occurred. The law of negligence, or, rather, of contributory negligence, of one riding upon a platform of a street railroad car, is not the same as of one riding upon the platform of a steam railroad car. The legislation in this state as to railroads and street railroads has been kept separate and distinct. For a full consideration of the subject, see Massillon Bridge Co. v. Cambria Iron Co. 59 Ohio St. 179, 52 N. E. 192. Interurban railroads, such as the one in question in this case, are classed by the general assembly as street railroads. § 2780-17, Bates's Anno. Stat. The construction and operation of such railroads are authorized by the act of May 17, 1894 (91 Ohio Laws, p. 285), and carried into Bates's Annotated Statutes as §§ 3443-8 to 3443-13. Section 6 of that act is as follows: "Such companies shall be subject to the same regulations now provided for street railroads, in so far as the same are applicable, and shall have all the powers, in so far as they are applicable, that other street railroad companies have."

It seems reasonably clear that, while operating the cars of an interurban railroad within a municipality, the regulations and powers of a street railroad company are applicable; but when it comes to running cars of such railroads in the open country, upon a track substantially the same as the track of a steam railroad, and at a high rate of speed, it would seem that the same rules as to negligence and contributory negligence should prevail as are applicable to steam railroads, and that a passenger standing upon the platform of an interurban car in the open country should be held to the same rules as if he were standing on the platform of a steam car. The danger is the same in either case, and where there is no difference in danger there should be no difference in the care required, nor in the rights and liabilities flowing from the neglect to observe the proper care. For an injury received by a passenger on a steam railroad by reason of a collision or derailment while standing upon the platform, in violation of the known rules of the company, there being vacant seats in the car, there can be no recovery against the railroad company. The authorities as to this seem to be uniform. Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Miles, 40 Ark. 298, 48 Am. Rep. 10; Hickey v. Boston & L. R. Co. 14 Allen, 429; Kentucky C. R. Co. v. Thomas, 79 Ky. 160, 42 Am. Rep. 208; Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Moneyhun, 146 Ind. 147, 34 L. R. A. 141, 44 N. E. 1106; Palmer v. Pennsylvania Co. 111 N. Y. 488, 2 L. R. A. 252, 18 N. E. 859; Wills v. Lynn & B. R. Co. 129 Mass. 351.

There are cases in which a recovery has been allowed where the passenger rushed to the platform to escape some other danger. Such was the case of Mitchell v. Southern P. R. Co. 87 Cal. 62, 11 L. R. A. 130, 25 Pac. 245, where an express messenger became alarmed at the rate of speed of the train while descending a steep grade, and, fearing a derailment, he rushed to the platform, intending to jump off into the sand. It was held that he could not be held to any particular course of conduct while attempting to avert a present threatened danger. In the case at bar the deceased was ordered into the car by the conductor, and requested to go in by the assistant conductor; there were vacant seats inside; a sign was up, "Passengers not allowed on the platform;" and yet he remained on the platform because he wanted to smoke a cigar. He remained there at his peril, and, even though the company may have been negligent in not preventing the derailment, he was also negligent in standing upon the platform. Those inside the car escaped without injury, and, if he had gone inside when ordered to do so, the presumption is that he, too, would have escaped. It is a case where it required the negligence of both himself and the company to bring about the disaster, and, where the injury is brought about by the combined negligence of both, both are without remedy. Pittsburgh & W. Coal Co. v. Estievenard, 53 Ohio St. 43, 57, 40 N. E. 725, and cases there cited.

In view of the law as above stated, it is clear that the court of common pleas erred in the charge as given, and also in refusing to charge as requested, and that the circuit court erred in affirming the judgment.

There is another reason why there can be no recovery in this case upon the facts appearing in this record. The action is for a violation of the contract of safe carriage. Such a contract has implied therein that the passenger will obey the reasonable rules of the carrier. The rule against standing on the platform was a reasonable one, and this the deceased deliberately, persistently, and purposely violated, and that violation aided in causing the injury of which complaint is now made. Having himself first violated the contract, and that violation having brought about the injury, he has no cause of action against the company for violating a contract by the terms of which he first refused to be bound. As he, if alive, would have no cause of action, his administrator has none. It is urged that the action might have been in tort. This is true. He could sue either in tort or contract. He elected to sue upon the contract, and he is bound by his election.

The controlling facts of the case seem to be conceded, and the case seems to be one that might well be dismissed by this court after reversing the judgments below; but it may be safer to remand the case to the court of common pleas for further proceedings according to law and this opinion, and it is so ordered.

Judgments reversed and cause remanded.

Where a municipality puts into execution a scheme of improvements by which surface water is collected from a large area, and is carried by artificial means from where it would naturally be discharged, and made to flow onto the land of an abutting landowner, in ease of the lands of others, an actionable wrong is committed.

Messrs. Deford & Deford for defendants in error.

Cunningham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiffs' action was for the purpose of obtaining damages for injuries suffered by the alleged illegal diversion of surface water thrown upon their land by defendants, and for a mandatory injunction restraining the farther continuance of such injuries. The case is before us upon a transcript containing only the pleadings, the findings of fact made by the trial judge, the conclusions of law, and judgment. So as to the facts we have no light except what is disclosed by these findings. From them we ascertain that the plaintiffs were the owners of certain lands, which they used and occupied as their homestead, lying south of a public highway extending east and west along its north boundary, and had been such owners for several years prior to the commission of the wrongs of which they complained. During this time there was a natural water course entering the plaintiffs' land on its north side, and extending in a southerly direction nearly the full length of the land. This natural water course is spoken of as the west draw, and drains an area of about 38 acres on the north side of the highway. About 35 rods east of the point where this west draw crosses the highway is a surface-water drain, and about 27 rods still farther east is another surface-water drain. These two drain an area of about 48 acres, and are known as the middle and east draws, respectively. At the time the plaintiffs became the owners of the land occupied by them as aforesaid, and for some time prior thereto, culverts had been maintained across the middle and east draws at the point where the highway intersected them. These were of small dimensions, being 8 x 12 inches on the inside. There was also a bridge across the highway at the point where the west draw intersected it. We presume that ordinarily the surface waters coming down the middle and east draws passed through their respective culverts, and over and upon the plaintiffs' lands to the south in no defined channels, except that their general course was south and east. These waters finally falling into what is spoken of as Middle creek. The natural water course known as the west draw fell into Middle creek some distance west of the point where the middle and east draws joined it. In 1895 one John Blocklinger, who was then the duly elected, qualified, and acting road overseer of the road district in which this highway was located, for the purpose of improving the same, caused it to be graded up and a ditch dug along its entire north side, emptying into the west draw at its west end. He also removed the culverts which had theretofore intersected the highway at the middle and east draws. The effect of this was to collect all of the surface water which had theretofore passed down through these draws into this ditch, and by means of it to be carried westward and emptied into the west draw, thereby increasing the volume of water therein. It is of this increase of volume, and the damage caused to them thereby, that the plaintiffs complain. The court specifically found that "the digging of said ditch, the closing up and removal of said culverts, and the grading of said highway was a substantial improvement to the highway, and it was done with good faith, and with no other intention than to improve it;" and, further, "that the water carried along said ditch on the north side of said highway and emptied into said draw flows in and upon plaintiffs' farm to their injury;" further, "that, had such ditch along the north side of said highway not been constructed, the waters accumulating in said middle and east draws could not have gotten into said west draw, nor onto the land of plaintiffs, and this would be true even though the culverts at the intersection of said middle and east draws with the highway were removed; that the plaintiffs have suffered damages to their said farm by reason of the said surface water being collected from said middle and east draws into said ditch, and cast in a body upon their said farm; . . . and that they will continue to so suffer from said cause so long as said ditch is permitted to remain as it was when said action was begun and is now." As a conclusion of law the court held as follows: "The surface water having been accumulated in an artificial ditch and cast in a body upon the land of Mr. Baldwin, the defendants would be enjoined, were it not for the fact that it was cast upon the farm of the plaintiffs by means of a natural water course." Thereupon judgment was rendered against plaintiffs for costs, to reverse which they are now here.

Several reasons are urged by defendants in error for the affirmation of this judgment, other than the one given by the court. We prefer, however, not to give these reasons attention, but to discuss the matter entirely from the standpoint taken by the court below. We shall assume that the party responsible for the making of the ditch and the improvement of the highway, whether such party was the township, township officers, or the road overseer, occupied 67 L. R. A.

the same relation to the plaintiffs as would a private owner, and that they had a right to dispose of surface water coming upon the highway in the same manner and to the same extent as would the private owner of a dominant adjoining estate. "The commissioners of highways, where they undertake to drain a public highway, possess the same rights, and are governed by the same rules, as adjoining landowners who may undertake to drain their own lands, except where they may be proceeding under the eminent domain laws of the state." Young v. Highway Comrs. 134 Ill. 569, 25 N. E. 689. The common-law rules regulating the rights and duties of adjoining owners of lands relative to surface water obtain in this state. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Hammer, 22 Kan. 763, 31 Am. Rep. 216; Gibbs v. Williams, 25 Kan. 214, 37 Am. Rep. 241. Under those rules, it is well settled that the owner of the upper estate may not gather surface water falling or accumulating thereon, and by means of artificial channels divert it from its natural course, and discharge it upon the lower estate, to the damage of the owner thereof. This rule, however, goes hand in hand with the other equally well-settled doctrine that as to such waters either owner may stand upon the defensive. The owner of lands through which a natural water course flows may, however, accumulate and cast into such water course in a body the surface water falling upon lands adjacent thereto. Such streams are the drains provided by nature for the discharge of surface water gathered by natural forces and the general contour of the lands. The rule is thus stated by Farnham, Waters, § 186: "The force of gravity, which causes all waters flowing on the earth to seek the lowest level, creates natural drainage, and provides for the distribution of all water, whether surface water or otherwise. This natural drainage is necessary to render the land fit for the use of man. The streams are the great natural sewers through which the surface water escapes to the sea, and the depressions in the land are the drains leading to the streams. These natural drains are ordained by nature to be used, and, so long as they are used without exceeding their natural capacity, the owner of land through which they run cannot complain that the water is made to flow in them faster than it does in a state of nature. Among the steps which are taken for the improvement of property, one of the first is to remove the water from it as rapidly as possible. The right to drain upon and over lower lands without making compensation for such privilege is the same whether the higher land is the farm of an individual owner or is a public highway; and highway commissioners have the right to have the surface water falling or coming naturally upon the highway drain through the natural and usual channel upon and over lower lands, and have the right to construct ditches or drains for the purpose of conducting such surface water, even though it is accumulated in ponds, into such natural and usual channels, although the effect may be to increase the volume of water thus carried upon lower lands. In accordance with this principle, the flow of the water into the natural streams may be hastened so long as the water is not caused to overflow the banks of the stream to the injury of the land through which it flows." Gould, Waters [3d ed.] § 274, states the same rule as follows: "The owner of land has a right to discharge the natural drainage of his land, and the surface water accumulating thereon, into a water course, whereby it becomes a part thereof; and in so doing he may change or concentrate its flow in artificial channels, thus accelerating the flow and increasing the volume of water in the stream, provided its natural capacity is not exceeded, and those whose supply is rendered more variable cannot complain." In a note to the case of Mizell v. McGowan (N. C.) 85 Am. St. Rep. 733, it is said: "We have just noticed the difference between merely drainage onto another's land, and draining into a natural channel or water course which flows across such land. So far as streams or natural water courses are concerned, there can be no doubt that one may drain into them, and thereby increase their volume, without subjecting himself to liability for any damage suffered by a lower owner." In support of this proposition the following cases are cited: Miller v. Laubach, 47 Pa. 154, 86 Am. Dec. 521; Cairo & V. R. Co. v. Stevens, 73 Ind. 278, 38 Am. Rep. 139; Treat v. Bates, 27 Mich. 390; Jackman v. Arlington Mills, 137 Mass. 277; Waffle v. New York C. R. Co. 53 N. Y. 11, 13 Am. Rep. 467; McCormick v. Horan, 81 N. Y. 86, 37 Am. Rep. 479; Jenkins v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 110 N. C. 438, 15 S. E. 193; Peck v. Herrington, 109 Ill. 611, 50 Am. Rep. 627; Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Sanderson, 113 Pa. 126, 57 Am. Rep. 447, 6 Atl. 453; Rath v. Zembleman, 49 Neb. 351, 68 N. W. 488. From a careful study of these and other cases, we are not disposed to indorse the broad doctrine announced in the text of the note, or hold that in no case the lower riparian proprietor may not recover damages for injuries inflicted by diverting surface water into a natural water course by an upper riparian owner, but are disposed to hold that such owner may not gather and divert surface water from its natural course of flowage, and cast it into a natural water course, to the serious damage of the owner of the lower estate by overflow. In order that such damages may be recovered for, or their continuance enjoined, they must, however, be of a serious and sensible nature. It is quite obvious that the rule, as against the dominant proprietor, cannot be enforced in its minutest detail and for its minutest infraction. To say that no surface water may be diverted and cast into a natural stream is practically to prohibit the removal or shifting of any of the soil from its natural condition. Such a strict application would result in preventing the processes of agriculture and of other necessary improvement.

In speaking upon another phase of this question, but with equal applicability to this, this court, in Gibbs v. Williams, 25 Kan. 216, 37 Am. Rep. 241, says: "If the right to run in its natural channels was annexed to surface water as a legal incident, the difficulties would be infinite indeed. Unless the land should be left idle, it would be impossible to enforce the right in its rigor, for it is obvious every house that is built, and every furrow that is made in a field, is a disturbance of such right. If such a doctrine prevailed, every acclivity would be and remain a watershed, and most low ground become reservoirs. It is certain that any other doctrine but that which the law has adopted would be altogether impracticable." So, in actual practice, the law must and does recognize the right of the dominant owner to divert, at least incidentally, for a proper purpose, and in good faith, the flow of surface water from its natural course,—especially so, when it is cast into a natural water course, and where but little damage is occasioned. Were this not so, improvements of the land for the purposes of agriculture, roadmaking, and other betterments would be seriously hampered and impeded. Again, it clearly appears from the authorities that not all damages suffered by the owner of the lower estate may be recovered for, or the continuance of enjoined, but only such damages as result from the overflowing of the stream because its natural capacity has been exceeded. That the flow has been accelerated or deepened, that the banks of the stream have been washed away in places, and sand bars created at other points, are not within the purview of the law to be relieved from. Upon this point it is said in Farnham, Waters, § 488: "Drainage being necessary to fit the land for successful occupation, and the streams being the natural channels of drainage, the flow of the surface water may be hastened into the streams so far as it can be done without flooding lower property." See also cases cited above, and Drake v. Hamilton Woolen Co. 99 Mass. 574; Hayes v. Waldron, 44 N. H. 580, 84 Am. Dec. 105; Rutherford v. Holley, 105 N. Y. 632, 11 N. E. 818. "Merely increasing the flow of water in a natural water course does not, like increasing the flow of surface water, give a right of action. Riparian owners cannot complain when such increase is due to the building or change of grade of streets and the improvement of lots fairly within the territory drained by such water course, when its capacity is not exceeded." Kemper v. Widours' Home, 6 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 1049.

The plaintiffs have here argued this case as though the finding of the court was that the damage suffered by them was occasioned by the flooding of their lands, caused by the overflow of this natural water course. Such, however, is not the case. The court did not so find. While he found that the plaintiffs were damaged, he did not find that such damage was consequent upon the overflow of this natural water course; and, as he found that they were not entitled to recover, we must presume that the damage suffered was such, and only such, as, under the law, they could not recover for.

We conclude that, because it here affirmatively appears that the improvements which were made upon the highway were of a substantial character and made in good faith, and because it does not appear that the diversion of the surface water from the middle and east draws occasioned thereby was more than a mere incident to the making of such substantial improvement, and because it does not appear that the damages suffered by the plaintiffs were occasioned by the overflow of the natural water course into which such surface water was turned, or that such damages were other than what were occasioned by the hastening or increasing of the flow, that the same were damnum absque injuria, and hence not recoverable for.

The judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

Dana BLACKMAR, for Use of GEORGIA HOME INSURANCE COMPANY.

(.....Miss.....)

Papers pertaining to the business of an insurance agent and belonging to his employer are not baggage, and therefore, in case they are placed in a trunk which is checked as baggage, an action cannot be maintained for the benefit of the employer for loss caused by delay in their transportation.

(December 5, 1904.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Warren County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for delay in transporting baggage. Reversed.

Statement by Whitfield, Ch. J.:

Dana Blackmar was the agent of the Georgia Home Insurance Company, and on July 1, 1903, purchased a ticket over the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad from Natchez, Mississippi, to Baton Rouge, Louisiana, both points being on said railroad. He checked his trunk to Baton Rouge. The trunk contained his wearing apparel and all the papers pertaining to his business. Blackmar was the special agent and inspector for the Georgia Home Insurance Company. The trunk was not delivered at Baton Rouge promptly, and Blackmar left there with instructions to the agent there to send the trunk to New Orleans. The trunk was delayed, and was not delivered to him in New Orleans until July 11th. Blackmar claimed that the delay in the delivery of the trunk caused him to lose six days' time, and to pay a hotel bill for six days, and to pay $2 for telegrams in his effort to recover the trunk. The Georgia Home Insurance Company brought this suit in a justice of the peace court in the name of said Blackmar, for its use, to recover $10 per day for the six days lost by Blackmar, this being the amount paid him as salary, the sum of $36, hotel bill, and other expenses, $2, and recovered a judgment for Whitfield, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Perhaps the definition given by Chief Justice Cockburn in Maorow v. Great Western R. Co. L. R. 6 Q. B. 622, is as accurate a definition of "baggage" as can be found. That definition is this: "We hold the true rule to be that whatever the passenger takes with him for his personal use or convenience, according to the habits or wants of the particular class to which he belongs, either with reference to the immediate necessities or to the ultimate purpose of the journey, must be considered as personal luggage. This would include, not only all articles of apparel, whether for use or ornament, . . . but also the gun case or the fishing apparatus of the sportsman, the easel of the artist on a sketching tour, or the books of the student, and other articles of an analogous character, the use of which is personal to the traveler, and the taking of which has arisen from the fact of his journeying. On the other hand, the term 'ordinary luggage' being thus confined to that which is personal to the passenger, and carried for his use or convenience, it follows that what is carried for the purposes of business, such as merchandise or the like, or for larger or ulterior purposes, such as articles of furniture or household goods, would not come within the description of ordinary luggage, unless accepted as such by the carrier." The sheets of paper constituting the memoranda of the agent, Mr. Blackmar, are manifestly papers relating exclusively to the business of his company. We are unable to concur in the view that they can in any proper or legal sense fall within the legal definition of baggage. They are not such things as were for his personal use or his personal convenience. Their use was in no sense personal to the traveler. On the contrary, they were carried, distinctly and exclusively, "for the purposes of business," to quote the definition of Chief Justice Cockburn. They were not legally or properly put as baggage in his trunk, and, not being properly put there as baggage, no damages can be recovered for delay in their shipment in the trunk. It would therefore make no difference whether the suit was one brought for loss of these papers as constituting properly a part of the baggage of Mr. Blackmar, or was one "for damages sustained by appellee on a breach of contract, because of the loss of time enforced on appellee's agent by reason of the inexcusable delay of appellant in delivering his trunk." Counsel for appellee say that the suit is of the latter character, and that learned counsel for appellant misconceive it as a suit of the former kind. But whether one or the other, if the memoranda are not properly baggage, nothing can be recovered as constituting the value of the memoranda, nor can anything be recovered as damages for delay in shipping. It must be said that the record is very vague and indefinite in giving an exact description of these memoranda, but it seems clear that the papers were the papers of the master, the insurance company, and not of this agent, and that they were not designed for his personal use or convenience or comfort, but strictly and distinctly as business papers in the transaction of the business of his master. We think it is clear, on a careful reading of the authorities cited on both sides, that no papers of the latter kind are in any proper or just sense baggage. And we understand this to be the doctrine as declared in Mississippi C. R. Co. v. Kennedy, 41 Miss. 678. The railroad knew nothing about these memoranda being in the trunk, and it is not a case where the railroad company has consented to receive or accepted these memoranda as baggage knowingly, or in accordance with any usage or custom of the railroad. To hold these papers and documents—so important that their delay for a single day might involve a loss of from ten to fifty thousand dollars to the insurance company; papers and documents concededly the property of the company, and not of the agent; papers and documents which relate exclusively to the conduct of the business of the company, and which are in no way needed for the personal comfort, convenience, or use of the agent—constitute baggage, would be to expand the definition of baggage beyond anything warranted by any well-considered case. We have carefully considered the two strongest cases cited by learned counsel for appellee—Staub v. Kendrick, 121 Ind. 226, 6 L. R. A. 619, 23 N. E. 79, and Gleason v. Goodrich Transp. Co. 32 Wis. 85, 14 Am. Rep. 716—but we do not think either in point here. In the Gleason Case the book which contained the prices of all the component parts of Sheffield goods was the personal property of the agent; the suit there being for the value of the book specially as such. And so in the other case the suit, again, was for the value of an illustrated catalogue prepared by the agent himself, being his own personal property, estimated to be worth $50. These cases are much the strongest cited by learned counsel for appellee, but we think the decisive weight of authority, as well as these cases properly considered, would exclude memoranda, such as those involved in this suit, from the category of personal baggage. See Mauritz v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 23 Fed. 765, and, for a valuable discussion, Choctaw, O. & G. R. Co. v. Zwitz, 13 Okla. 411, 73 Pac. 941.

It follows that the judgment must be reversed and the case remanded for a new trial.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT.

Sophia B. MUELLER, Appt.,
v.
Mena BUENGER.

(.....Mo.....)

1. A will may pass title to after-acquired real estate under a statute providing that every person may by last will devise "all his estate, real, personal, and mixed."
2. The intention of the testator, as gathered from the four corners of the will, in the light of the circumstances under which it was written, will determine whether or not he has disposed of after-acquired real estate.
3. The one-half of a tract of land acquired by a testator after the execution of his will will pass under the residuary clause, and not under the clause disposing of the half which he owned at the time the will was made, where by the latter clause he gave to his niece "my interest" in the tract, and by the residuary clause gave to his wife "all the remainder of my property, both real and personal, I may possess at my death, . . . excepting that property which I have mentioned" in the former clause of the will.

97 L. R. A.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for St. Louis County in favor of defendant in a proceeding to establish title to certain real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. George W. Lubke, Jr., for appellant:

A will speaks, not from the time of its execution, but from the date of the testator's death. It therefore passes title to property acquired after its execution, unless from the terms of the will itself, by fair construction, it indicates otherwise.

Liggat v. Hart, 23 Mo. 127; Webb v. Archibald, 128 Mo. 299, 28 S. W. 80, 34 S. W. 54; Haley v. Gatewood, 74 Tex. 281, 12 S. W. 25; Strevens v. Bayley, 8 Ir. C. L. Rep. 410; Castle v. Fox, L. R. 11 Eq. 542; Russell v. Chell, L. R. 19 Ch. Div. 432; 2 Woerner, Am. Law of Administration, p. 889; Bigelow's Jarman, Wills, 6th Am. ed. pp. 317, 327.

Therefore, if, between the date of the execution of a will and the date of the testator's death, the conditions of the testator's estate have changed, it must be presumed that the testator had such changes in mind when he died, and, having made no changes in his will, its terms must be interpreted in the light of the conditions existing at the latter date.

Vitt v. Clark, 66 Mo. App. 214.

Mr. George W. Wolff for respondent.

Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action under § 650, Rev. Stat. 1899, to determine the interests of the parties, under the will of William Buenger, to 53 arpents of land in St. Louis county. The plaintiff claims title to the whole of the land, except an undivided one twenty-fourth thereof, which is vested in the heirs of Ann T. Hume; and the defendant claims that the plaintiff is only entitled to an undivided one-half of the land, and that she is entitled to a life estate in the other half thereof, with remainder to Annie Holtman, her child by her first marriage, and, in the event of her death without issue, then the remainder to go to certain persons named in the will. The plaintiff is a niece of the testator, and the defendant is his widow.

At the trial the plaintiff showed that at the date of the will William Buenger owned a certain farm in St. Louis county, containing 50 arpents, and known as the Franklin farm, and that at the date of the will he also owned an undivided one-half interest in the 53 arpents; the other half interest being at that time (less the one twenty-fourth of said other half, which was vested in the heirs of Ann T. Hume) vested in Joseph L. Hyatt. He also owned other real and personal property, which is not in controversy here. Being so possessed, said William Buenger made his will on January 29, 1889. That will was as follows:

"I, William Buenger, of the county of St. Louis, in the state of Missouri, do make and publish this my last will and testament. I am weak in body but sound in mind, and know what I am doing. After the payment of all my just debts, I give and devise unto my niece, Sophia Buenger, daughter of Henry Buenger, the farm known as the Franklin farm, situate lying and being in the county of St. Louis, and the state of Missouri, containing fifty (50) arpents, bounded as follows, to wit: East by lands owned by Gustavus Wittich, south by Aubuchon and Maher, west by my own, and north by the Missouri river. Also my interest in the tract of land owned by Joseph L. Hyatt and William Buenger, containing fifty (50) arpents, to have when she attains the age of twenty-one (21) years, to have and to hold the same forever. But if my widow should die or marry before Sophia attained the age of twenty-one (21) years, then she is to come into immediate possession of the above-described land.

"I give and bequeath unto my two brothers and two sisters, Henry Buenger, Casper H. Buenger, Riker Klostermeyer, and Louisa Branderler, or their heirs, two thousand dollars ($2,000), to be divided equally between them share and share alike, but my 67 L. R. A.

brother Henry is now dead, and I wish that the five hundred dollars that was for him to go to his three sons, William, Henry, and Harmon Buenger, share and share alike, to be paid within two years after this will is probated; I except Harmon Buenger's share; I wish his share of the five hundred dollars to remain in my estate until he is of age and to bear six per cent per annum until paid. Interest commencing two years after this will is probated.

"I also give and bequeath unto Charles Meyer, my nephew, the following parcels of land, now belonging to me in the Monroe tract: Nos. seven (7) and eight (8) containing fifty-five acres more or less, to have and to hold forever, provided, that he pays William Buenger and Conrad Buenger (sons of Casper H. Buenger) each one hundred ($100) dollars, and one hundred ($100) dollars to William Klostermeyer, also fifty ($50) dollars each to William and Henry Buenger, sons of Henry Buenger. This must be paid within two years after this will is probated.

"I give and devise unto my beloved wife, Mena Buenger, all of the remainder of my property, both real and personal, I may possess at my death during her natural life, excepting, however, that property which I have mentioned in the first part of this will; and if my wife should marry then I give and devise unto Annie Holtman, daughter of my wife by her first husband, the following parcels of land, Nos. twenty-three (23), twenty-four (24), and twenty-five (25), and if my wife die before Annie Holtman then Annie Holtman shall have the whole of this property, and if Annie Holtman should die without living children of her body, then this estate, except as already provided, shall be divided equally between the following named persons or their heirs (and Annie's husband if she has any): My brother Henry and Casper H. Buenger, Riker Klostermeyer, Louisa Branderler, Theodore Wolff, Annie Kamper (the wife of August Kamper) and the heirs of Fritz Wolff (the heirs shall inherit only the parents' part).

"I hereby appoint my wife, Mena Buenger (without being required to give security) my sole executrix of this, my last will and testament, hereby revoking all former wills by me made.

"In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand this twenty-ninth day of January, A. D. 1889. William Buenger."

The plaintiff also showed that, after the execution of his will, William Buenger, to wit, on April 25, 1895, acquired the other half of the 53 arpents (less the one twenty-fourth thereof aforesaid) that had been owned by Joseph L. Hyatt.

This was all the evidence offered by the plaintiff, and was all the evidence adduced in the case, for the court excluded the evidence offered to be introduced by the defendant "tending to prove the circumstances, surroundings, situation, and family relations of William Buenger, the objects of his bounty, and extent and value of his estate, and also the statements of the testator, made before and after the execution of the will, as to his intentions." The court then rendered judgment in favor of the defendant, and adjudged the plaintiff to be entitled to an undivided one-half interest in the 53 arpents, and the defendant entitled to a life estate in the other part acquired from Hyatt, and her daughter and the persons named in the residuum clause of the will entitled to the remainder in that part. From that judgment the plaintiff appealed.

The only question presented by this record is whether the plaintiff is entitled to the whole of the 53 arpents (less the one twenty-fourth aforesaid), or whether she is entitled to only an undivided one-half of the whole. The law upon this subject has been so thoroughly and ably discussed in the prior adjudications in this state that a review of these cases will easily solve the case at bar. One of the best-considered, learned, and satisfactory discussions of the subject is contained in the opinion of Leonard, J., in Liggat v. Hart, 23 Mo. 127; and, because of its force and clearness, the following extensive excerpt therefrom is both justified and appropriate. The learned judge said: "Mr. Butler, in a very able note to Coke's First Institutes (191a), after specifically pointing out the difference between the Roman and the feudal law upon the subject of succession to the estates of deceased persons, thus forcibly sums up the contrast: 'By the Roman law the heir was a person appointed indiscriminately by the law or the deceased to represent him, and, in consequence of that representation, was entitled to his property and bound by his obligations. In the feudal law the heir was a person of the blood of the ancestor, appointed by the original contract to the succession, and, in consequence of that succession, was supposed, more by the general notions of mankind than by the notions of the feudal polity, to represent the ancestor. By the Roman law the heir succeeded to the property of the ancestor in consequence of this civil representation of him, and supposed continuation of his personal estate. In the feudal law he acquired a national representation to the ancestor in consequence of the feudal succession. In the Roman law real and personal property was equally the subject of inheritance. In the feudal law inheritance was confined to real property. The Roman heir claims as such all from the person last possessed, and nothing from the original donor. The feudal heir claims as such all from the donor, and nothing from the person last possessed.' The power of an owner to appoint a successor to his property, both real and personal, after his death, which seems to be nothing more than one of the natural rights of property, prevailed to its full extent among the Saxons of England. When, however, upon the establishment of the Normans, the feudal system became part of the law of England, so that tenants in fee could not alien without the consent of the lord, the power of disposing by will, as well as every other mode of aliening the land, generally ceased. And, although the feudal restraint upon alienation could not but gradually yield, as an unnatural limitation upon property, and accordingly many of the restraints were removed before Granville wrote, yet the power of disposing by will was not allowed for a long time afterwards, partly from the fear lest persons should be imposed upon in their last extremity, and partly for the want of that notoriety which the common law required in all transfers of real property. During the suspension of the direct power which continued from Henry II. to the latter end of the reign of Henry VIII., it was indirectly but substantially acquired, and exercised by means of uses. This indirect practice, however, of devising lands, was at length checked by the statute of the 27th Henry VIII., which, transferring the legal estate to the use, extinguished for a time the separate equitable ownership, and with it the incidental power of devising. The consequence was that lands again became generally unalienable, except by a conveyance, to take effect in the lifetime of the proprietor; but the legislature found it necessary, within a few years afterwards, to allow of testamentary dispositions of land, and for that purpose the statute of wills was passed, in 31 Henry VIII. and amended in the 34th of the same King. 1 Powell, Devises, chap. 1; Cruise, Real Prop. title 38, chap. 1.

"While the power of disposing of lands by will was exercised by means of uses, the will being considered the mere appointment of a use, it was holden that it could only operate on lands of which the party was possessed at the time, and could not affect any lands subsequently acquired; and the courts accordingly adopted the same narrow principle when they came to put a construction on the statute of wills; and, therefore, although the idea of a real devise was, as Lord Mansfield remarked (Hogan v. Jackson) 1 Cowp. 303), derived from a Roman will, which was the appointment of an heir to succeed to the property and to discharge the obligations of the ancestor, including his testamentary donations, yet it was treated in the very English law not like an English will of personal property, when the executor corresponds with the instituted heir of the Roman law, but as the particular conveyance of the lands embraced in it, and was subjected, in the particular now under consideration, to the rules applicable to such conveyances, instead of being treated as a testamentary disposition to take effect after the death of the disposer. It accordingly became a settled rule in the construction of the English statute of wills that, if a testator devised all the real estate of which he should be seised at the time of his death, and after the making of the will he purchased lands in fee, such after-acquired property, whether it was conveyed to the testator or to a trustee for him, did not pass by the will, but descended, as to the legal inheritance in the former case, and as to the equitable in the latter, to the testator's heirs at law (1 Jarman, Wills, 85; Bunter v. Coke, 1 Salk. 237, 3 Bro. P. C. 19); and the reason of this was not on account of the intent on the part of the testator, but because he had no legal power to dispose by will of land which he did not own at the time; and the reason given for this construction was not merely that a limited testamentary power was conferred by the very words of the act, but because such was the legal consequence, in the absence of any express provision to the contrary, of considering a devise, not in the nature of a will, but of a particular conveyance. Under the old law, therefore, when a testator made a general gift of his real and personal estate, he was considered as meaning to dispose of these respective portions of property to the full extent of his testamentary power, and it accordingly took effect as a gift of such real estate as belonged to him at the time of the execution of the will, and, as to the personalty, as a disposition of whatever he should possess at the period of his decease; and this construction has prevailed in the United States, wherever the British statute of wills has been adopted, either by express enactment, or as a part of the general system of law.

"Lord Mansfield once remarked that common sense would never teach a man the difference between the testamentary gift of a horse and a house, and that originally the construction might as well have been otherwise, but that it was then too well settled to be disturbed. Indeed, experience has at length taught the British nation that it had better have been settled otherwise from the beginning, as the construction given has been found to defeat the real intention of testa-tors; and accordingly they have remedied the evil in 1 Vict. chap. 26, by providing that testators may dispose of all the real and personal estate to which they may be entitled at the time of their death, and that every will shall be construed, with reference to the real and personal estate comprised in it, to speak and take effect as if it had been executed immediately before the death of the testator, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will; and the result is that the distinction in an English will between real and personal property, that was not obvious to common sense in the days of Lord Mansfield, is now abolished, and an English devise of land operates now as a will of personal property did before the passage of the late act, and passes whatever real estate the testator may possess at the time of his death, unless a contrary intent appear. It is also to be remarked that the same experience that produced the British amendment act upon this subject has resulted substantially in the same enactments in the several states where the English rule of interpretation had been introduced and prevailed. Accordingly, in Massachusetts, at their revision in 1835 (Rev. Stat. [1836] p. 417, § 3), it was provided that after-acquired real property should pass by a will in like manner as if it were possessed at the time of the making of the will, if such appeared to be the intent of the testator; and similar enactments have been adopted in Maine, New Hampshire, New York, Pennsylvania, and other states. Winchester v. Forster, 3 Cush. 366.

"The Virginia statute of 1785 expressly extends the testamentary power to the real property which the testator may have at his death, and was followed in this particular in Kentucky and Illinois; and the result of the decisions in these states is that after-acquired lands pass, when such appears to be the intention of the testator, although in Virginia they retain the rule adopted in England, that the words of the testator in reference to his real property are to be understood as referring to the time of the making of the will, unless a different intent appear. Turpin v. Turpin, 1 Wash. (Va.) 75; Harrison v. Allen, 3 Call (Va.) 297; Warner v. Swearingen, 6 Dana, 200; Willis v. Watson, 5 Ill. 66. The legislation in our state has been somewhat peculiar. The first act upon the subject, passed in 1807, was copied from the Virginia statute of 1785, and confers, in one section, upon persons of full age testamentary power over all real estate then owned, or which the testator may have at his death, and in a subsequent section confers testamentary power over the personal estate, in general terms, upon persons who are over eighteen years of age.

The law so continued without any change until the revision of 1835 [Rev. Stat. 1835, p. 616], when, under the plan of revising then adopted, of dropping what were deemed superfluous words, the phraseology was changed to what it now is, and the testamentary power over both real and personal property was incorporated into one section, and conferred in the same general words; and the same phraseology was continued in the revision of 1845, and we presume, also, in the last revision. The language now used, however, is not the language of the old English statute,—“that any person having an estate may dispose of it at his pleasure,” etc., but that every person may, “by last will, devise all his estate, real, personal, and mixed,” etc.

“No doubt is entertained but that, under the act of 1807, after-acquired real property would pass by will, whenever such appeared to be the intention of the testator. The reason why it did not pass under the English statute was the want of testamentary power, and, that power being expressly given by our original act, the objection was out of the way; and such seems to have been the construction given to the statute in Virginia, Kentucky, and Illinois.

“But the question is as to the construction of the present law. Must we hold that the act now in force does not confer testamentary power over after-acquired land, and, on account of the change in the phraseology of the statute, which was made in 1835, go back to the construction put upon the original statute? We think not. The language now used does not require such a construction at our hands. It is different from the language of the English statute of wills. The testamentary power is given here in general language. It embraces both real and personal estate, and is a power to make a testamentary disposition of all the testator’s property, without any distinction between real and personal property, and not a mere power of particular disposition. It is more in the nature of a Roman will than an English devise of real property. But, however this may be, when we consider the plan of revising that was adopted,—the impolicy of creating changes in laws of daily practical importance; the little probability, when all around us were abandoning the old, narrow construction of the testamentary power, that our legislature should adopt it, for the first time, by an express provision for that purpose,—and when we consider, too, that neither the community nor the profession generally, as we believe, have been aware of the supposed change, and that men have generally acted as if the original act of 1807 were still in force, and that estates have been administered and distributed accordingly,—we do not think that we would be warranted in declaring that the legislature, by the change in the language, intended to effect the substantial change in the meaning of the law that is supposed; and we shall accordingly give to the act, as it now stands, as literal a construction in favor of the testamentary power as we should have felt constrained to have given to the original act.”

The learned judge then applied the principles of law so declared to the facts in judgment, and pointed out that, after a specific devise of a watch to one and a burial lot to another, the will in that case provided, “I hereby direct my executors to sell the whole of my real, personal, and mixed property,” and, after the payment of his debts and the sum of $100 to such of his nephews as should be named James, he directed the proceeds of such sale “to be sent to my executors in Ireland,” to be there invested for the use of his brothers and sisters. And it was held the will applied as well to property acquired after the will was made as to the property owned by the testator at the date of the will. And there can be no two minds as to the correctness of the conclusion there reached, for the devise was practically of the whole estate to the same beneficiaries. As applied to the case at bar, that opinion is not only valuable for its historical data, but also for the rules of law laid down. This is especially true as to the evolution of the statute of wills in this state from 1807 to 1856, when the opinion was written.

The statute of wills of 1845 (Rev. Stat. 1845, chap. 185, § 1) and of 1855 (Rev. Stat. 1855, chap. 167, § 1) provided: “Every person of twenty-one years of age, and upwards, of sound mind, may, by last will, devise all his estate, real, personal, and mixed, and all interest therein, saving to the widow her dower.” And § 2 of the revisions of 1845 and 1855, relating to wills, provided: “Every person over the age of eighteen years, of sound mind, may, by last will, dispose of his goods and chattels.” There is no substantial difference, so far as concerns this case, between that statute and the act of 1879, which was in force when this will was made, on January 29, 1889. The act of 1879 (Rev. Stat. 1879, chap. 71, § 1) provided: “Every male person, twenty-one years of age and upwards, of sound mind, may, by last will, devise all his estate, real, personal, and mixed, and all interest therein, saving the widow her dower. And every male person over the age of eighteen years, and of sound mind, may, by last will, bequeath all his personal estate, saving the widow her dower.” It is unnecessary here to refer to the power given to married women to make wills. There is therefore no material difference, so far as concerns this case, between the statutes that were in force when Liggat v. Hart, 23 Mo. 127, was decided, and the statutes as they are to-day. Liggat v. Hart, 23 Mo. 127, was cited and followed in Applegate v. Smith, 31 Mo. 166. In that case the testator lived in Kentucky, and made his will there. He devised to his wife "his whole estate, real, personal, and mixed, wherever situated." He afterwards purchased land in Missouri, and the only question was whether the after-acquired land passed to the devisee. In that case the devise was of the whole estate, and Scott, J., said: "The only material point in this case is whether the after-acquired lands passed by the devise to Martha Applegate. The will was made in Kentucky, and, by the law of that state, there must be something in the will itself which showed that after-acquired lands were intended to be passed by it, in order that it may have that effect. A general devise of all his property, or of all his estate, or a general disposition of his land, will not authorize such a deduction. But his intention to devise whatever interests he may own in land at his death must be disclosed by the language used, or by the actual import of the provisions contained in the will." It was pointed out, however, that, as the land lay in Missouri, the laws of this state would govern, and that, under the laws of this state, a nonresident owner of lands in this state was allowed to make a will of such land; and it was held that the law as to after-acquired land was correctly laid down in Liggat v. Hart, 23 Mo. 127. Here, again, it will be observed the devise of the whole estate was to the same beneficiary; and the only question, therefore, was whether the will covered the after-acquired property, or whether as to that the testator died intestate.

The question here involved next came before this court in Hale v. Audsley, 122 Mo. 316, 26 S. W. 963. That case turned upon the construction of the will of Charles Sterne. The second paragraph of that will gave his wife a life estate in his home place, with a remainder in fee to his granddaughter and her heirs. The third paragraph of that will gave his granddaughter and her heirs another tract, of about 700 acres, and added: "And I further will and devise to my said grandchild and the heirs of her body, any and all other real estate, I may now have or hereafter may acquire, wherever situated," etc. The fifth paragraph of that will also gave to his granddaughter "an undivided interest of one third of what is called the Latham farm, containing three hundred and twenty acres." The sixth paragraph of that will provided that, if his granddaughter died without issue or heirs of her body, the "real estate hereinbefore mentioned and described" should go to the testator's nephews and nieces in equal parts; but, if his said grandchild left heirs of her body surviving her, the land should go to them in fee. That case involved the right of said granddaughter to convey a one-sixth interest in the Latham farm. At the date of the will the testator and one Hale owned each an undivided half of the two-thirds interest in the farm, and one Branch owned the other one third. After the execution of the will the testator and Hale purchased Branch's one-third interest, and held it in undivided shares, of one sixth each, at the time of the testator's death. Black, J., speaking for this court, said: "The question is whether the one-sixth interest acquired by Sterne [the testator] after the date of the will passed to the plaintiff [the granddaughter] Lelia, and the heirs of her body, by force of the residuary clause in the third paragraph of the will, or to her absolutely, under the fifth paragraph. Real property acquired after the date of a will will pass to the devisee where it appears from the will that the testator intended to thereby dispose of such after-acquired property, and it will pass, according to the intention of the testator, the same as in case of property owned by the testator at the date of the will. Liggat v. Hart, 23 Mo. 127; Applegate v. Smith, 31 Mo. 166. This will appears to have been prepared with care, and it seems to us its meaning is clear and not open to two constructions, and that the undivided one-sixth passed to Lelia by virtue of the residuary clause in the third paragraph. The fact that this clause is found in the third paragraph, and not in the fifth, or some subsequent part of the will, is wholly immaterial. This residuary clause in the most express terms disposes of any after-acquired real estate, and it also disposes of all real estate owned by the testator at the date of the will, and not thereby specifically devised. The question, then, is whether the language of the fifth paragraph can be expanded so as to include this one-sixth. At the date of the will the testator owned a one-third interest in the Latham farm. It is this interest he is speaking of when he says he devises to Lelia 'an undivided interest of one third in what is commonly called the "Latham farm;" and in the same paragraph he again speaks of this interest as 'my said interest of one third in said Latham farm.' It is perfectly manifest that the testator, in making this devise, had in mind only the interest which he then owned, and it was this interest of one third, and this only, that he undertook to dispose of by this paragraph. To say the testator intended to give this after-acquired interest of one sixth to Lelia upon the terms named in the fifth paragraph is to make a codicil for him when he did not see fit to make one himself. This we cannot do. We have no power to deal with testaments in any such way. It is true, we must construe the will from a consideration of all its parts, and in the light of the surrounding circumstances under which it was written; but we cannot change the plain, clear, and emphatic language of the testator. The fifth paragraph disposes of a one-third interest, and no more. The trial court held that the after-acquired one-sixth passed by the fifth paragraph, and in this it erred. The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded, to be tried on the construction of the will here pointed out." The difference in that case was that, under the residuary clause contained in the third paragraph of the will, the devise was to the granddaughter and her heirs, whereas, under the fifth paragraph, the devise was to the granddaughter absolutely. The trial court held that the granddaughter took the after-acquired one-sixth interest in the Latham farm, under the fifth clause of the will; and this court held that to be error, and that the granddaughter took such after-acquired interest under the third clause of the will. The gravamen of that case is in the following words: "Real property acquired after the date of a will will pass to a devisee where it appears from the will that the testator intended to thereby dispose of such after-acquired property, and it will pass according to the intention of the testator at the date of the will. Liggat v. Hart, 23 Mo. 127; Applegate v. Smith, 31 Mo. 166." And in that case the intention of the testator as to the Latham farm was ascertained from the fifth paragraph of the will to be that he only intended to give her absolutely the undivided one-third interest therein that he owned at the date of the will, and therefore the after-acquired one-sixth interest in said farm passed to her and the heirs of her body under the residuary clause of the will. That decision, as applied to the facts in judgment here, would result in holding that the testator intended to devise to his niece, the plaintiff herein, by the first paragraph of the will, his undivided one-half of the 53 arpents that were owned by him at the date of the will, and that, as the other undivided one-half interest therein was then owned by Hyatt, the testator did not intend to devise that, but that, as the testator acquired Hyatt's undivided interest in said 53 arpents after the date of the execution of the will, he intended that it should pass under the residuary clause of the will to his wife for life, with remainder in fee to the persons named in the residuary clause.

The question was again before this court in Webb v. Archibald, 128 Mo. 299, 28 S. W. 80, 34 S. W. 54. That case turned upon a construction of the will of Mrs. Margaret Lindsay. By the first clause of her will the testatrix bequeathed to her daughter, the plaintiff, Kate Webb, $3,750, to be invested in land for her sole use. By the second clause of the will the testatrix bequeathed 420 acres of land, which was therein described to be "all of my real estate," to her three children, Thomas Archibald, William Archibald, and Margaret Winkler, and to her grandson, Harry Archibald, and their heirs and assigns, each to have one fourth of said real estate. By the third clause of her will the testatrix bequeathed to her son William Archibald $1,000, for the purpose of making him even with her other children. This will then concluded as follows: "Out of the balance of my property, I desire my debts to be paid, and should there be anything left I desire it to be equally divided between Thomas Archibald, William Archibald, and Margaret Winkler; above named are all of my children, as I have never had any children by my present beloved husband, Clark Lindsay." Between the date of her will and the date of her death the testatrix acquired another tract of land, of 120 acres, and also several thousand dollars worth of personal property. The plaintiff claimed one fourth of such after-acquired real and personal property by descent, upon the theory that as to such after-acquired property Mrs. Lindsay died intestate. The trial court took this view, and rendered judgment accordingly. This court reversed the judgment, and held that the after-acquired property passed, under the residuary clause of the will, to Thomas Archibald, William Archibald, and Mary Winkler, the other children of the testatrix, and that it was the intention of the testatrix that, as the plaintiff had been fully provided for by the first clause of the will, and as she was not named as one of the residuary legatees in the will, she was not entitled to any part of the after-acquired property. Brace, J., speaking for the court, solved the legal questions involved in such clear and convincing terms that they throw a flood of light upon the case at bar. He said: "In the leading case of Liggat v. Hart, 23 Mo. 127, Leonard, J., said: 'Men know that their wills are not to take effect until they die, and they make them for the purpose of fixing the distribution of their property from that moment.' Since that decision, construing the first section of our statute of wills, there never has been any question in this state but that the language of a will is to be construed as of the date of the decease of the testator, unless the contrary appears to have been his intention, and that the will operates upon all the estate of the testator, real and personal, at the time of his decease, so far as its terms are applicable, unless the intention of the testator appears to be otherwise. 1 Redf. Wills, 3d ed. chap. 9, § 1. The language of the will in question leaves no room for doubt that the testatrix, in the disposing clauses of her will, was fixing the distribution of her property 'from the moment of her death.' The first item of her will, containing the legacy to the plaintiff, discloses this as her thought, in the expression 'on my death,' which runs through the dispositions of the will. Nor does that language leave any room for doubt that the testatrix intended to dispose of all the property of which she was possessed at the moment of death, for, after making all the specific bequests she desired, she closed the third and last item with a residuary clause disposing of 'anything left' 'out of the balance of my property.' There is nothing in the language of the will, nor rules of law given for its interpretation, upon which the idea of an intestacy as to any of the testatrix's property can be predicated. There is no room in the case for the indulgence of any presumptions on account of a disherison. There is no disherison in the case. The testatrix carefully named all those who by nature had immediate claims on her bounty, and as carefully provided for them. That the provision made by her may have been unequal as between them can furnish no basis for a presumption that she intended an intestacy as to any of her property; yet, in order to sustain the trial court in its ruling, we should not only have to indulge in some such presumption, but permit it to override, not only the foregoing well-settled principles of law for the construction of the testatrix's will, but her unequivocally expressed intention as to the share the plaintiff should have in her estate; for nothing can be clearer than that it was the intention of the testatrix, not only that the plaintiff should have no interest in the testatrix's landed estate, but that her husband should have no interest in such estate, or in any lands that might come to her by means of the legacy left in the will. In both respects the intention of the testatrix would be defeated by the ruling of the trial court that she died intestate as to the 'Winfrey farm.' This brings us to the only remaining question,—To whom did that farm pass by the will? It passed either by the second item or the residuary clause of the third item of the will. Reading these items together, it is impossible to escape the conclusion that the intention of the testatrix was to make a difference between her three children and her grandchild named therein; that there was a part of her estate in which she wished that they should all share equally, and there was a part of her estate in which she wished that only her said three children should share equally, and in which her grandchild should have no share. The estate in which the four should share equally was devised by the second item. It was a landed estate. The disposing part of that item is 'all my real estate.' This expression, if there had been nothing more, would have been sufficient to pass all her real estate, including any that she might have acquired after the execution of the will. She did not stop there, however, but immediately, in the same item and connection, proceeded to define those terms by giving her meaning thereof to be the 'farm on which I now live,' and the timber land south of it. It is not material that she may not have given correctly the number of acres therein. There is no difficulty in identifying the land devised, and it was in these particular lands that the four were to share equally at her death. For purposes of description, she referred to an existing state of things; thus giving an illustration of the exception to the general rule, hereinbefore stated, that the language of the will is to be interpreted as having been used with reference to the time of the death of the testator; the exception being, in the language of Ellsworth, J., in Gold v. Judson, 21 Conn. 616, that, 'wherever a testator refers to an actually existing state of things, his language should be held as referring to the date of the will, and not to his death, as this is then a prospective event. Such, it is clear, is the construction of the word "now."' The estate in which her three children, Thomas Archibald, William Archibald, and Margaret Winkler, were to share equally, but in which the grandchild, Harry Archibald, was to have no part, was devised in the residuary clause of the third item of the will; and it was to be anything left of her property after her debts were paid, not included in the specific bequests,—anything left, whether of real or personal property."

The rules that result from these cases, therefore, may be briefly stated to be as follows: First, the intention of the testator is the controlling guide, and that intention must be gathered from the four corners of the will, in the light of the circumstances under which it was written; second, if the devise is of the whole estate of the testator to the same beneficiary, it will pass after-acquired property as well as all that he owned when the will was made; third, if the devise is of a particularly described interest in certain land to a particular devisee, and if there is a devise of the residuum of his estate to other particularly named devisees, or to his heirs generally, then any after-acquired interest in the property mentioned in the particular devise will pass under the residuary clause to the persons therein named, and will not go to the particular devisee named in the particular devise of the particular interest. It only remains to apply these rules to the case at bar. The testator first provided for the payment of his debts. Then he made provision for his niece, the plaintiff herein, by giving her the Franklin farm, of 50 arpents, and also gave her "my interest [which at that time was an undivided one-half] in the tract of land owned by Joseph L. Hyatt and William Buenger [the testator]," which contained 53 arpents. He then gave his two brothers and sisters, or their heirs, $2,000, in equal parts. He next gave his nephew 55 acres of land, on condition that he paid certain specified sums within a specified time to certain persons named. And having thus specifically provided for his other relatives and family, his mind turned to his wife and her daughter by her first marriage, and by the residuary clause of his will he devised "unto my beloved wife, Mena Buenger, all of the remainder of my property, both real and personal I may possess at my death during her natural life, excepting, however, that property which I have mentioned in the first part of this will." He then provided that, if his wife should marry, he devised certain of said residuum to his stepdaughter, and, if his wife died before his stepdaughter, the latter should have "the whole of this property," and, if his stepdaughter died without issue, "then this estate, except as already provided, shall be equally divided" among his brothers and sisters. Thus the intention of the testator clearly appears to be to give the plaintiff the whole of the Franklin farm and the half of the 53 arpents he then owned, and of which Hyatt owned the other half, and to give his wife "all the remainder of my property, both real and personal, I may possess at my death during her natural life, excepting . . . that property . . . mentioned in the first part of this will," and the remainder to go as above explained. This is the only provision he made in his will for his "beloved wife." Thus it appears that the devise to the plaintiff was of a particular interest in particular land, whereas the devise to his wife covered all his property, real and personal, except what he had particularly given to plaintiff, and the 55 acres particularly given to his nephew. Not only this, but the devise to the plaintiff was of the particular interest in the tract of land "owned by Joseph L. Hyatt and William Buenger," while the devise to his wife was of "all the remainder of my property, both real and personal, I may possess at my death." The devise to the plaintiff therefore related to and covered only a particular interest in a particular tract of land owned by him at the date of the will, whereas the devise to the wife covered, not only the residue of all real and personal property that he owned at the date of the will, but also the residue of all "I may possess at my death;" thereby intending to give to his wife any property he might acquire between the date of the execution of the will and the date of his death.

The Circuit Court therefore properly held that the after-acquired interest in this case passed under the residuary clause of the will to the persons therein named, and not to the plaintiff under the first clause of the will, and the judgment must be affirmed.

I. The elements of the problem.

The answer to the questions, What is necessary to make an effectual transfer of corporate stock? depends primarily upon a satisfactory solution of the further question, What is corporate stock, and by what is it represented? For the purposes of this note, however, which will attempt merely to gather the cases which have dealt with the first question. It will be necessary merely to indicate the views which have been held respecting the second one. Theoretically a share of stock in a corporation is merely a right to a share of its assets and profits: so that in one sense the corporation may be regarded merely as the debtor of the shareholder. In this view, the interest of the shareholder may be transferred in the manner necessary to assign a fund in the hands of a debtor or trustee. This question is fully treated in a note to Phillip's Estate, 66 L. R. A. 760, to which reference is made. The English rule, represented by Dearle v. Hall, 3 Russ. Ch. 1, to the effect that notice must be given to the debtor or trustee, has been applied by some cases.

Thus, it has been held that notice to the corporation is necessary to protect the rights of the assignee against those of subsequent attaching creditors. State Ins. Co. v. Sax, 2 Tenn. Ch. 509. This ruling is placed upon the analogy between certificates of stock and assignments of choses in action proper, or funds in the hands of trustees, which latter property, under the Tennessee rule, could not be assigned so as to give a title valid as against subsequent assignments without notice to the debtor or trustee. The court says the practical wisdom of the rule is obvious, because it affords a ready means of tracing the title to stocks, and gives purchasers a security which they otherwise would not have. That ruling is, however, 67 L. R. A.

County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to foreclose a pledge of stock. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Clark & Holden and E. E. Chalmers for appellants.

Messrs. H. K. Linger and F. S. Deitrich, for respondents:

The lien of a general creditor, arising from the attachment of stock belonging to the attachment debtor, is not superior to the lien of a prior pledgee in good faith and for value, having actual possession of the certificates of stock, which had theretofore been assigned to him by indorsement, the attaching creditor having actual notice thereof before execution sale.

Our statute was not intended to protect strangers, or to govern the relations between third parties and stockholders. It affects business transactions only with opposed to dicta in Cornick v. Richards, 3 Lea, 1.

But in an English case it was held that, in the absence of statute requiring notice of an assignment of shares, no notice need be given. Thus, where shares were in possession of an assignee as collateral security, and the interest of the assignor was subsequently assigned to another person as security without notice to the first assignee, it was held that such assignment was good as against an attachment of the property in the hands of the first assignee. Robinson v. Nesbitt, L. R. 3 C. P. 264.

And the view of the Tennessee court did not prevail generally in the business world. The certificate which was given by the corporation to the stockholder as the representative of the interest to which he was entitled had too many characteristics of tangible property, and could too conveniently be treated as the property itself, to escape such treatment; and therefore, for all purposes of buying, selling, pledging, and contracting generally between person and person in the open market, the business world has treated these paper certificates, for practical purposes, as actual property. As stated in Lipscomb v. Condon, the certificates of stock are not the stock itself, and some of the courts and legislatures have proceeded upon that theory, and have adopted rules which would hamper their treatment as such.

So in Agricultural Bank v. Burr, 24 Me. 256, there is a dictum to the effect that the title as it appears on the books of the corporation is the evidence of title upon which the shares may be attached by a writ, or seized and sold upon an execution. The sale by an officer would transfer the title without regard to any certificate which the owner might hold.

The theory that in some way the interest of the stockholder as it appeared on the corporate books was, as suggested in the case last cited, the tangible thing that was subject to transfer, has received considerable recognition, and many cases have been decided and many statutes based upon it, as will subsequently appear. But the convenience of buying and selling the shares by transferring the paper was so great that in most cases both courts and which the corporation is connected, or in which it has an interest.

The vendee of unregistered stock is, by the statute, simply prevented from asserting his claim as against those to whom the corporation records give notice, namely, the corporation and its creditors and stockholders.

legislatures have been forced to permit it to be done. So far as a subsequent purchaser is concerned, this course can work no ill result. If he wishes to purchase all he has to do for his protection is to demand a delivery of the certificates, which is all he could require in case of any other kind of personal property. If, as between stockholder and corporation, the stock can be transferred only by surrender of the certificate, it would seem that possession of the certificate was all the protection a purchaser required. In a New York case it was held that where stock can be transferred only on the books of the company a transferee without entry on the books gets the entire title, legal and equitable, as between himself and his assignor, with all the rights which the latter possesses. But, the stock not having passed by the delivery of the certificate and power of attorney, the legal title remains in the seller so far as affects the corporation and subsequent bona fide purchasers who take by transfer duly made upon the books. Hence, a buyer in good faith of the person in whose name the stock stands on the books, who takes a transfer in conformity to the charter and by-laws, becomes vested with a complete title to the stock, and cuts off all the rights and equities of the certificate holder to the stock itself. But the court says that, with regard to the corporation, notice that the certificate is outstanding is notice that it is owned by someone else, and equivalent to actual notice of all the rights which inquiry would develop. Therefore, if it permits a transfer without production of the certificate it may be liable to the holder, whose rights are thereby cut off. New York & N. H. R. Co. v. Schuyler, 34 N. Y. 80, Affirming 38 Barb. 534.

And that doctrine was recognized in McNell v. Tenth Nat. Bank, 46 N. Y. 325, 7 Am. Rep. 341.

In Bank of Commerce's Appeal, 73 Pa. 59, it is said, as between adverse claimants of the certificate the possession of it with the transfer upon it is often the test of title.

Even in case of attachment and execution creditors the hardship of a rule making possession of the certificate evidence of title is more apparent than real. Unless the statutes give the public access to the corporate books knowledge as to the ownership of stock must depend on reputation, whether the fact depends on book entries or on reputation, and the 67 L. R. A.

difficulty of obtaining manual possession of the shares would be as great in one case as in the other. Some cases have intimated that creditors must rely on their debtor's possession of the certificates, and that attachments must reach them to be valid.

In Colonial Bank v. Whitney, L. R. 11 App. Cas. 426, where the certificates provided that they must be surrendered before a transfer would be made on the books of the company, the owner of shares pledged them as collateral security, and then became bankrupt, and the question arose as to whether the pledgee or the assignee in bankruptcy had the better title. Lord Blackburn said: I think it is clear that anyone who is about to give credit to the bankrupts as being the owners of the interest represented by the shares ought to know that he had no legitimate ground for believing that they were the owners of the whole interest, unless the certificates were produced or accounted for. And, since inquiry as to what had become of the certificates would (unless the bankrupts were fraudulent liars, which we have no right to assume) have led to the disclosure of the fact that they were pledged. Therefore, the circumstances were such as to prove that the bankrupts were not the reputed owners of the interests in the shares, and the order upholding the title of the bankruptcy assignee (L. R. 30 Ch. Div. 261) was reversed. Lord Watson said that the provision that the certificate must be produced before a transfer could be made was an assurance by the corporation on which the lawful holders of the certificates were entitled to rely, to the effect that, according to their usual practice, the corporation would decline to register any transfer of shares until the relative certificates were produced, or, where nonproduced, satisfactorily accounted for.

The sheriff cannot validly seize and sell the stock while the certificate is outstanding so that he cannot obtain possession of it. All that he can seize and sell in such case is the right and interest of the person in whose name the stock stands without prejudice to the rights of the true owner. But where a judicial tribunal, after a fair test, in good faith by the corporation, orders the stock to be transferred to the purchaser under such seizure and sale, the corporation cannot be liable to the holder of the certificate, who takes no steps to protect

New York & N. H. R. Co. v. Schuyler, 34 N. Y. 30; Fraser v. Charleston, 11 S. C. 486.

Our statutes were taken from California. The doctrine has long been established by the California courts, that only transfers and purchases in good faith and without notice are protected as against an unregistered pledge, and not a mere attaching creditor, but at most a purchaser without notice at the execution sale, is protected.

People ex rel. Mead v. Elmore, 35 Cal. 653; Farmers' Nat. Gold Bank v. Wilson, 58 Cal. 600; Spreckels v. Nevada Bank, 113 Cal. 272, 33 L. R. A. 459, 54 Am. St. Rep. 348, 45 Pac. 329.

In adopting a statute, it is taken with the construction already put upon it by the himself. Friedlander v. Slaughter House Co. 31 La. Ann. 523.

In Supply Ditch Co. v. Elliott, 10 Colo. 327, 3 Am. St. Rep. 586, 15 Pac. 691, where the legal owner of stock, which stood in the name of another and had been sold under execution against the latter, attempted to assert his rights as a stockholder without producing the certificates or notifying the company that he was the legal owner, the court makes the possession of the certificates the evidence of title, and states that the company must act only on that evidence as recognizing the rights of rival claimants.

In McFall v. Buckeye Grangers' Warehouse Assn. 122 Cal. 468, 68 Am. St. Rep. 47, 55 Pac. 253, where the question was as to the validity of a levy on stock which had been pledged without transfer on the books of the corporation, and the certificates immediately returned to the pledgee, in whose possession they were when the attachment was levied, the court, without discussing the effect of the nontransfer on the stock books, but apparently assuming that a memorandum of the transfer which appeared in such books might be sufficient, held that the failure to preserve the transfer of possession defeated the pledge.

Where the stockholder has, under an agreement with other stockholders, deposited his certificate with a trustee, an attempt to pledge to a third person by delivering the trustee's receipt and a power of attorney to transfer the stock is not effective as against a subsequent execution creditor, who actually seizes the certificate in the hands of the trustee, where the statute provides that, to effect a pledge of stock, the certificates must be put into the possession of the pledgee. Bidstrup v. Thompson, 45 Fed. 452.

The fact that the statement of the corporate books is not the ultimate evidence of the property right, and cannot safely be made the basis of business transactions regarding the stock, is illustrated by the rulings in regard to stock affected with a trust.

In Mowry v. Hawkins, 57 Conn. 453, 18 Atl. 784, where the attempt was made to place stock belonging to a married woman in the name of her husband as trustee, but, by mistake, it was placed in his individual name, and was attached as his property, the attaching creditors contended that, standing in his name on the books, it was subject to attachment by his 67 L. R. A.

creditors; but the court says this position is too broad; that, in the absence of fraud, stock may stand in the name of one, which belongs to another, without being liable to attachment for the debts of the nominal owner. That must be so as to all creditors who have not been misled or deceived by it, and as to those who are advised as to the true state of the title.

And the same principle is recognized in Skiff v. Stoddard, 63 Conn. 198, 21 L. R. A. 102, 26 Atl. 874, 28 Atl. 104, where the pledgee of stocks which had been transferred into the name of the pledgee was permitted to redeem them as against persons subsequently dealing with the pledgee in such a manner as to enable them to claim an interest in the stock so pledged.

In Shropshire Union R. & Canal Co. v. Queen, L. R. 7 H. L. 496, Reversing L. R. 8 Q. B. 444, where stock belonging to a corporation stood in the name of one of its directors in trust for it, and he pledged the certificates as collateral for his own debt, it was held that the pledgee secured no title as against the rights of the corporation. The lord chancellor said that one dealing with a registered owner ought to have known that, although the shares stood in his name, and he had the certificates in his possession, yet the beneficial interest might be in some other person, and, if he did not secure the legal title, but only an equity, it would be subject to the equitable rights of a prior beneficiary. He says that the pre-existing equitable title may be defeated by a supervening legal title obtained by transfer. He further says that "it is said that there was some implied protection in the possession of the certificates; so that, if the holder passes them over to another person, that other person would think he obtained a good title because no transfer could be permitted without the production of the certificates." But he answered that whether or not a transfer should be permitted without a production of the certificates was entirely within the discretion of the corporation. And Lord Hatherley said that the only mode in which a transferee could make himself perfectly safe was to obtain at least a transfer of the shares, and perhaps to go farther, and obtain, also, a registry. The pledgee had not obtained the ownership because he had not obtained a transfer, and had acquired nothing that would pass to him in equitable right.

Sutherland, Stat. Constr. §§ 319, 333; 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 432; Redway v. Moore, 3 Idaho, 312, 29 Pac. 104.

Sullivan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to foreclose a pledge of 5 shares of the capital stock of the Farmers' State Bank, a corporation doing business at Idaho Falls, state of Idaho, which had been pledged by the defendant T. A. Harris to the Mapleton Bank, a banking partnership of Mapleton, in the state of Iowa, and the appeal is from the judgment on the judgment roll alone. The defendant T. A. Harris made no appearance, and the defendants the Farmers' State Bank and C. G. Peck, secretary thereof, filed disclaimers. The defendants who are appellants, William Lindsey and D. W. Standrod & Company, answered separately, and join in this appeal. The facts were stipulated, and the following is a sufficient statement of them for a decision of this appeal: On July 2, 1900, at Mapleton, state of Iowa, defendant T. A. Harris executed to the cashier of the said Mapleton Bank his promissory note for $1,500, due six months after date, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent per annum, attorneys' fees, etc., and at said time and place, as a part of said transaction, and as security for the payment of said promissory note, assigned and transferred to said bank two certificates of shares of the capital the name of the true owner, but remains in the name of his vendor, does not defeat the right of the true owner to pursue and recover the stock in case it is stolen from him without his fault and sold by the thief to another stranger without apparent authority, either from the owner or the one in whose name the stock stands registered, any further than the fact that the certificates were indorsed. Barstow v. Savage Min. Co. 64 Cal. 388, 49 Am. Rep. 705, 1 Pac. 349.

But in Winter v. Belmont Min. Co. 53 Cal. 429, where the registered owner indorsed and delivered the certificates to another person and then feloniously removed them from his possession and sold them, the purchaser was held to have acquired a good title free from the rights of the pledgee. The court, in discussing the earlier cases, states that their doctrine had not been entirely satisfactory, but that they had been followed on the principle of stare decisis, and that, "even though we entertained a grave doubt as to the soundness of the original decision, we think that it ought not now to be disturbed."

Under the Alabama statutes, the rights of one for whom stock was subscribed by another, in whose name the certificates were taken, is subordinate to those of an execution creditor of the latter, although he has paid several instalments on the stock. White v. Rankin, 90 Ala. 541, 8 So. 118.

But a statute permitting the charging for benefit of creditors of shares standing in the name of a debtor in his own right, does not authorize the charge of shares standing in his name in trust for others. Cooper v. Griffin [1802] 1 Q. B. 740, 66 L. T. N. S. 660; Howard v. Sadler [1893] 1 Q. B. 1.

II. Registry not necessary in absence of statute or by-law.

It thus appearing that the business interests and the expeditious transfer of the vast property represented by stock certificates demand that an indorsement and delivery of the certificates themselves, accompanied by a power of attorney to effect a transfer, shall be sufficient, the great majority of the courts have acceded to that demand unless overruled by the legislature, notwithstanding the certificate is theoretically not the property.

The New Jersey court has said that, by a 67 L. R. A.

commercial usage as universally acknowledged by the business community as the law of commercial paper, a certificate of stock, accompanied by an irrevocable power of attorney, is presumptive evidence of ownership in the holder. And, where he is a holder for value, his title cannot be impeached. Under this well-recognized principle, large amounts of property daily pass from hand to hand; are sold and resold, or hypothecated for loans, without an actual transfer on the books of the company. Prall v. Tilt, 28 N. J. Eq. 480.

A sale of stock in a corporation is valid as against a subsequent attaching creditor of the transferrer, although no transfer of the stock is made on the books of the company in the absence of any express provision of statute or of the charter of the corporation requiring such transfer to be made. Boston Music Hall Assn. v. Cory, 129 Mass. 435.

A pledge not transferred on the books of the corporation is valid as against a subsequent execution sale on a judgment against the pledgeor. McClintock v. Central Bank, 120 Mo. 127, 24 S. W. 1052.

A transfer of a certificate of stock in the absence of any legislative enactment passes title to the assignee, and is valid against creditors of the assignor without transfer on the books of the corporation. Cornick v. Richards, 3 Lea. 1. The court says the books of the corporation are not public records in any proper sense of our law. Why one private individual shall be required to effectuate the sale of the property of another in which he has no title or interest as property by entering the fact in his books it is not easy to see, not even if the fact be that the parties selling had originally purchased the property from him. The court further says: "In adopting a rule as to the transfer of this peculiar kind of property, we should look to the nature of the property, the uses to which it is put in the transaction of the business of the country, and at the same time not be unmindful of the established habits of dealings with the same among business men: this last should have an influence in this question of full weight, because we may be assured that what has been universally agreed on and established as the custom of such merchants is the result of a felt need that has been met by the keenest practical sagacity dealing with the question. . . . The universal practice is to transfer or assign the certificate of the stock of the said Farmers' State Bank; one of said certificates being for 5 shares and one for 10 shares, making a total of 15 shares. Said certificates were transferred by indorsement thereon in writing, and signed by the defendant T. A. Harris, and thereafter the plaintiff bank retained the possession of said stock certificates. Said promissory note was not paid when it became due, and this action was brought to foreclose the pledgee's lien upon said shares of stock on July 23, 1901. Said shares of stock have not been transferred on the books of the corporation, the Farmers' State Bank. On the 9th day of February, 1901, William Lindsey, as a general creditor of said T. A. Harris, brought suit against him in Bingham county, and by writ of attachment sought to attach said shares of stock, and defendants D. W. Standrod & Company, also being general creditors of said defendant Harris, brought suit against him in like manner, and sought to attach said 15 shares of stock. The said writs of attachment were levied as provided by subdiv. 4 of § 4307, Rev. Stat., and the secretary of said Farmers' State Bank made return to said writs to the effect that, according to the books of said bank, said Harris was the owner of 15 shares of the capital stock of said bank, which had not been transferred on the books of said bank corporation. The trial court entered judgment on the facts as stipulated in favor of the plaintiffs as prayed for in the complaint. The stipulated facts show that the respondents are stock with a power of attorney in blank to be filled up, authorizing a transfer by the corporation on its books to the purchaser, on the presentation of which power, properly authenticated, the corporation transfers the stock to the purchaser or holder, and, when the sale is absolute, it is usual to issue new certificates to the party, taking up the old. Such a practice facilitates the easy use of this property in commercial transactions. The requirement that the title could alone be transferred on the books of the corporation, or by notice to the corporation, would greatly tend to trammel this use; and, as far as we can see, notice to the corporation can serve no practical end, and has no appropriate place in the transaction, so far as passing the title from a holder to a purchaser, or the right of a creditor as to a purchaser, for he can, as he will always do, protect himself by requiring an assignment of the certificate, and then a transfer on the books of the corporation. The rule requiring transfer on the books of the corporation can only serve to give a creditor who has a judgment or attachment a legal advantage who has never given credit on the faith of the stocks, over the other who has advanced his money on them and taken the evidence of his security by a transfer of the certificate. In such a contest the equities are altogether in favor of the assignee, who has advanced his money on the faith of the collateral."

And that rule was recognized in Cherry v. Frost, 7 Lea, 1.

Pledges of stock are valid as against third persons by mere delivery of the certificates. Factors' & Traders' Ins. Co. v. Marine Dry Dock & Shipyard Co. 31 La. Ann. 149.

In Fraser v. Charleston, 11 S. C. 486, the court cites, with apparent approval, cases holding that the delivery of a certificate of stock to a purchaser, attended with a power of attorney to transfer, will confer a right that cannot be impeached or set aside by a subsequent execution or attachment against the vendor. The court says the case involves only the question as to the rights of the creditor of the assignor. The moment the equitable assignment has been ascertained their rights are concluded. The legal owner would have been estopped, and they have no rights which he had not.

A pledgee to whom shares of stock had been assigned and delivered as collateral security is secured against the creditors of the pledgeor 67 L. R. A.

without transfer on the books of the corporation. And it is immaterial that the stock is temporarily placed in possession of the pledgeor to effect a cancelation and reissuance of stock by the corporation; the court holding that the pledgeor could act as the agent of the pledgee in effecting such transfer. McClung v. Colwell, 107 Tenn. 302, 89 Am. St. Rep. 961, 64 S. W. 890.

Where the stock of a corporation is assigned to the corporation itself as security for a loan the title of the assignor to the stock is so far divested that it cannot be sold under an execution against him. Early's Appeal, 89 Pa. 411; Eby v. Guest, 94 Pa. 160; Evans v. Brownson, 8 Pa. Co. Ct. 456.

The delivery of the certificates properly indorsed transfers all the interest of the record owner, leaving no interest, either legal or equitable, in him which is subject to seizure under attachment. Dunn v. Star F. Ins. Co. 19 N. Y. Week. Dig. 531.

In Kern v. Day, 45 La. Ann. 71, 12 So. 6, the court held that giving a pledgee of stock, who had possession of the certificates, but had not transferred them on the books, priority over a subsequent attaching creditor of the record owner, does not violate any principle of estoppel which might be claimed against the pledgee; since the pledgeor could not sell or dispose of the stock without producing the certificate, and, so long as that was in possession of the pledgee, third persons would not be prejudiced.

In Ross v. Southwestern R. Co. 53 Ga. 314, and Southwestern R. Co. v. Thomason, 40 Ga. 408, there is general language to the effect that the sale and transfer of stock, with an order to transfer it on the books of the corporation, pass the title as against everyone but the corporation. The transfer on the books is only to protect the interests of the company. And the same general principle is recognized in Bates-Farley Sav. Bank v. Dismukes, 107 Ga. 212, 33 S. E. 175.

Where the charter and by-laws of the company do not require a transfer on the books to make an effectual transfer of stock, a pledge, accompanied by delivery of the stock certificates and notice to the president of the corporation, will prevail as against a subsequent attachment against the pledgeor. Allen v. Stewart, 7 Del. Ch. 287, 44 Atl. 786.

In a contest between attaching creditors, respectively, of one in whose name corporate the transferees, in good faith and for value, as a pledge, of the certificates of stock in question, by a written assignment and the delivery of the certificates of stock to respondents; that the appellants are general creditors of the defendant Harris, and are not purchasers of said shares of stock, either innocent or otherwise, and that all the lien that appellants have upon said stock was acquired by said attachment proceedings, which was subsequent to the written assignment and delivery of said stock certificates to respondents.

The question for determination, as presented by the record, is: Is the lien of a general creditor, arising from the attachment of stock belonging to the attachment debtor, superior to the lien of a prior pledge in good faith, and for value, having actual possession of the stock certificates, which had been assigned to him in writing, the attaching creditor having actual notice of such assignment before execution sale? Counsel for appellants, in their printed brief and oral arguments, present the general question whether, under the facts of this case, the attachment lien acquired by appellants or the pledge of said stock by Harris to the Mapleton Bank had preference, and contend that the attachment lien has the priority. In support of that contention is cited § 2611, Rev. Stat., which is as follows: "Whenever the capital stock of any corporation is divided into shares, and certificates therefor are issued, such shares of stock are personal property, and stock stood on the books of the corporation and another who was alleged to be the equitable owner, the court held that it was not the law of Connecticut that the true owner is precluded from asserting his rights as against an attaching creditor of the one in whose name the stock is permitted to stand, unless the latter has been misled thereby. New York Commercial Co. v. Francis, 28 C. C. A. 199, 51 U. S. App. 663, 83 Fed. 769.

The Connecticut rule depends upon the interpretation of statutes, and the cases will be found in the succeeding subdivision. The rule as thus adopted applies in favor of an attachment or execution, as well as of voluntary transfers.

In Memphis Appeal Pub. Co. v. Plke, 9 Helsk. 698, where there was a conflict between a right claimed under execution sale and a subsequent sale and transfer of the stock, the court said it was not necessary that a transfer of the stock should be made on the books of the corporation to perfect the title under the execution sale if the sale was valid the judgment debtor was divested of his title when the sale was completed.

And that rule was followed in Young v. South Tredegar Iron Co. 85 Tenn. 189, 2 S. W. 202.

An attachment of stock gives a lien superior to that of a subsequent bona fide transfer to one without notice of the attachment. Shenandoah Valley R. Co. v. Griffith, 76 Va. 913; Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Paine, 29 Gratt. 509.

An attachment of stock takes precedence of a subsequent sale. Kentucky Nat. Bank v. Avery, 12 Nat. Corp. Rep. 111.

There are cases which will be noticed later, which take an opposite view of this question, holding that a transfer on the books is necessary to protect the title against creditors of the vendor. These conflicting decisions are caused by the application to the solution of the problem of two principles of law which are well settled and perfectly equitable in and of themselves, and the only uncertainty is as to which one should control the answer to the question under consideration. The first rule is that a man cannot sell what he does not own, and that his creditors are not entitled to apply to the satisfaction of his debts the property of strangers. Under this rule, it is held that an attachment of stock pledged, but not transferred on the books of the company, 67 L. R. A. reaches only the interest which the debtor has remaining in the stock. Norton v. Norton, 43 Ohio St. 509, 3 N. E. 348.

Creditors can reach only rights of the debtor. Dissenting opinion of Erie, Ch. J., in Watts v. Porter, 3 El. & Bl. 743.

So an assignment of stock for the benefit of creditors, although not entered on the books of the company, has precedence over a subsequent attachment against the assignor, since the attachment can reach only the interest which the debtor has. Haldeman v. Hillsborough & C. R. Co. 2 Handy (Ohio) 101.

So in Dunster v. Glengall, 3 Ir. Ch. Rep. 47, it was held that the statute permitting the interest of a judgment debtor to be charged operated only upon the interest which he actually had at the time the order was passed; so that, in case he had made an assignment of shares of stock as collateral security, a charging order, even on a judgment previously entered, would not take precedence of the rights of the assignee.

And the same rule was followed in Scott v. Hastings, 4 Kay & J. 633.

A certificate of stock is not negotiable either in form or in character, and whoever takes it does so subject to its equities and burdens, and, though ignorant of such equities and burdens, his ignorance does not relieve him of the effect of the prior transfer, or enable him to hold discharged therefrom. George H. Hammond & Co. v. Hastings, 134 U. S. 401, 33 L. ed. 960, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 727.

The rights of a pledgee will, however, be protected only so as to give him full indemnity, and he will not be permitted to withhold the equity of the pledgee from the reach of creditors.

In Farmers' Nat. Gold Bank v. Wilson, 58 Cal. 600, an injunction was denied to the holder of an unregistered transfer of stock to enjoin the execution sale of the stock under a judgment recovered by a creditor of the transferrer. The court said that the stock was of greater value than the debt for which it was pledged, and it saw no reason why this interest might not be seized under execution; and that, under the rule in that state, an execution creditor was not within the protection of the statute requiring the registration of transfers, and that the transferee might protect his rights against purchasers at the sale by giving notice of the

may be transferred by indorsement by the signature of the proprietor, or his attorney, or legal representative, and delivery of the certificate; but such transfer is not valid except between the parties thereto, until the same is so entered upon the books of the corporation as to show the name of the parties by and to whom transferred, the number and designation of the shares, and the date of the entry. Corporations may, by by-laws, provide that no transfer of its stock shall be made upon its books until all indebtedness to the corporation of the person in whose name the stock stands, whether for assessments, calls, or otherwise, is paid." Under statutes of other states, like the section of our statute above quoted there is a conflict of decisions as to their proper interpretation, but upon a careful investigation of those decisions we find that the decided weight is in favor of sustaining the rule that a written transfer of stock, made in good faith and for value, although not entered on the books of the corporation, has preference over a subsequent attachment thereof in favor of a creditor of the assignor of the stock. Said § 2811 declares that, when certificates of shares of stock are issued, such shares are personal property, and may be transferred by indorsement by the signature of the owner or his attorney or legal representative and a delivery of the certificates; which was done in the case at bar. But the last clause of said section provides that such transfers are not valid, except between the parties there-transfer, so that there was no right to an injunction in the case.

In Second Nat. Bank v. First Nat. Bank, 8 N. D. 50, 76 N. W. 504, a pledgee of stock in a national bank brought an action for damages against the bank for refusal to transfer the stock on its books after it had purchased the stock on execution sale against the pledgee. The court, without discussing the validity of the pledge, held that the equity of redemption of the pledgee was subject to execution, and that the purchase under it without anything to show the amount of the pledgee's claim was sufficient to defeat the pledgee's right to have the stock transferred to it as owner.

In Kyle & Co. v. Montgomery, 73 Ga. 337, where pledged stock was not transferred upon the books as required by the by-law, and the stock was subject to a lien in favor of the company, and was attached by a creditor of the one in whose name it stood, after which the claim of the company was satisfied from a source that did not appear, and the pledgee appropriated the stock, which was greatly in excess of the amount of its claim, the court said: The circumstances give the transaction a very suspicious appearance, requiring explanation before the pledgee is entitled to the stock against the attaching creditors. The transaction on its very face affords evidence of unfairness, and, without satisfactory explanation, would subject the property, at least to the extent of any excess beyond the pledgee's demand, as it existed when the attachment was served.

The other rule is that one man will not be allowed to give another a fictitious credit by making him the ostensible owner of property belonging to the former, and, after credit has been accorded him on the faith of such property, withdraw it from the reach of the creditors by asserting his own claims.

In Pinkerton v. Manchester & L. R. Co. 42 N. H. 424, there was no statute or by-law regulating the mode of transferring the stock, but the court held that shares of stock were within the provisions of the statute of Elizabeth, and that, to make a valid transfer as against creditors, all the steps must be taken to effect a change of possession that the property admitted of, and that this included a transfer on the books of the corporation: so that, unless the transfer was so made within a reasonable time, it was of no avail against attachment creditors. The court says, in the case of stocks the natural and appropriate indication of ownership is the entry upon the stock record. This is indicated by the ordinary course of dealing in such property, and has been assumed in the legislation for many years. Until then the transfer is recorded, or is entered for record: "we think there has been no such change of possession as will prevail against an attaching creditor, unless in cases where due diligence has been used to make such record and the attachment has intervened."

Therefore a transfer not entered on the books of the company is invalid as against attaching creditors without notice. Buttrick v. Nashua & L. R. Co. 62 N. H. 413, 13 Am. St. Rep. 578.

So in State ex rel. Rankin v. Leete, 16 Nev. 242, 250, there is a dictum to the effect that as to everyone but the parties to the transaction the legal title to the stock does not pass until it has been entered on the books of the company.

And in Morehead v. Western North Carolina R. Co. 96 N. C. 362, 2 S. E. 247, the court, in discussing the rights secured by an attachment, says it seems to be supported by the authorities that a legal transfer of stock can only be effectuated by a transfer on the books of the company.

In Cady v. Potter, 55 Barb. 463, it is said that a bona fide assignee of stock, who first secures a transfer on the books of the company, will secure a better title than a prior assignee for value, who fails to secure a transfer on the books.

But the latter decision must be read in the light of New York & N. H. R. Co. v. Schuyler, 34 N. Y. 80, noticed in subd. I., supra, which intimated that the corporation might be liable to the true owner for permitting a transfer without production of the certificate. The result of that decision is that a second grantee would not be very likely to secure a transfer and so perfect his title.

There would seem to be less reason for the application of this latter rule to transfers of corporate stock than to transfers of other classes of personal property. So far as the title can be said to depend on the entries in the corporate books, it is almost entirely secret, and the mere fact that a person's name appears in such books as a stockholder has no tendency to give him a fictitious credit, except with persons who have a right of access to the books. Moreover, persons intending to purchase or ex-to, until the same are entered on the books of the corporation with the formalities therein prescribed. Construing that provision with other sections of our statutes in relation to corporations, it is clear that that provision was not intended to apply to strangers or personal creditors of stockholders, or to govern the relation between third parties and stockholders. That provision affects business transactions, only, with which the corporation is connected, or in which it has an interest. Section 2591, Rev. Stat., relates to corporations, and provides that a book of by-laws must be kept, which shall be open to the inspection of the public. Section 2639 provides that certain records must be kept of the business transactions of the corporation, and that all such records shall be open to the inspection of any director, member, stockholder, or creditor of the corporation. The records provided for by that section are not required to be open to the inspection of the public, but must be open to the inspection of any director, member, stockholder, or creditor of the corporation. Creditors of the corporation may inspect the records kept under the provisions of that section, but private creditors of a director, member, or stockholder are not, by its terms, given the right to inspect the same. Section 2640, Rev. Stat., provides that, in addition to the records required to be kept by § 2639, corporations for profit must keep a book, to be known as the "Stock and Transfer Book," in which must be kept, among other tend credit on the faith of stock usually require the production of the certificates; and do not institute a search through the offices of the numerous corporations of the country to ascertain the financial standing of the one with whom they are to deal. It is only when a creditor is searching for property on which to levy that he looks into the corporate books, and it is no fraud upon him, when he has found property apparently belonging to his debtor, to compel him to recognize the rights of persons who have advanced money on the property, and taken the shares into their possession.

III. Statutes requiring transfer on books.

It thus appearing that, in the absence of statute, the transfer of the certificate without registering it is sufficient to protect the transferee from the claims of the creditors of the transferor, the question arises as to the effect of statutory provisions that the transfer of corporate stock shall be made only on the books of the corporation. The answer to this question depends in part on the language of the statute and in part on the demands of the business world as recognized in the preceding subdivision of this note. The language of the statute may be such that there is no room for interpretation. It may, in terms, declare that a transfer on the books is necessary to defeat the claims of creditors. But, if the intent of the legislature is uncertain, the tendency of the courts is to hold that the provision relates to the internal management of the corporation, and does not affect the rights of persons dealing with the stock. The decisions are far from uniform, but part of the seeming conflict may be eliminated by observing the provisions of the statute before the court.

Provision that stock shall be transferred on books.

When the provision is that the stock shall be transferable on the books of the corporation it would seem that the rights of successive or conflicting claimants from the record owner were not intended to be affected by the statute; and such is the weight of authority.—at least when viewed in the light of cases dealing with stronger statutory provisions.

A charter provision that the shares shall be transferable on the books of the company does not prevent a transfer by assignment of the 67 L. R. A.

certificates properly indorsed as against a creditor of the pledgor without notice of the facts. Broadway Bank v. McElrath, 13 N. J. Eq. 24. The court says in manufacturing corporations, especially, the pledge of stocks affords the most ready and advantageous mode of effecting loans for the demands of business. "To require a transfer of the stock to the lender as security for the loan against the right of attaching or execution creditors will at once destroy the value of the security, or compel the borrower to devalue himself of his character as corporator to forfeit his control of the business of the corporation, of his right to dividends, and of all his other rights as a stockholder in the corporation. Why should the owner of stocks be deprived of the privilege of mortgaging or pledging his stock for the security of a loan, without stripping himself of all his rights of ownership, more than the owner of any other property?"

If the statute merely provides that the transfer shall be made on the books of the corporation, a transfer of the certificate properly indorsed will pass title as against creditors of the transferor, or subsequent purchasers from him. Strange v. Houston & T. C. R. Co. 53 Tex. 162. The court says such certificate and transfer are prima facie sufficient to authorize the holder to demand of the corporation the privileges and benefits to which the original holder would be entitled. This construction of the legal effect of the certificate of stock and its transfer is now required almost as a matter of necessity, both for the benefit of corporations, and of trade, since stocks in incorporated companies have become such an important basis for speculation and collateral security. To hold otherwise would virtually withdraw such stocks from all other than the home market.

In Mooar v. Walker, 46 Iowa, 164, where the question was as to the effectiveness of an attempted attachment of stock which was held to be informal, and therefore insufficient, the court stated that the section of the statute requiring a transfer of stock to be on the books of the company was intended as a protection to the company, and is designed to apply only where the sale or transfer of the stock in some way conflicted with the interests of the company.

Opposed to this rule are some early Massachusetts cases, which held that an attempted transfer was of no avail until it was registered.

things, transfers of stock, which book must be kept open to the inspection of any "stockholder, member, or creditor." That book is not required to be kept open to the inspection of private creditors of stockholders or the public, but to "any stockholder, member, or creditor." "Creditor," as used in that section, means a creditor of the corporation, not a private creditor of a stockholder. That being true, that part of § 2611 which provides that transfers of stock by written assignment and delivery are not valid, except as between the parties thereto, until the same are entered upon the books of the corporation, was not intended to protect the public, or a private creditor of a stockholder, but was intended for the protection of the corporation, its members and creditors. It was not intended to make invalid the transfer of stock by indorsement and delivery, and not entered on the books of the corporation for the benefit of creditors of stockholders. And in case of a pledge of shares simply by indorsement and delivery, as in the case at bar, an attachment by a creditor of the assignor would only be valid against the interest of the assignor after the debt had been paid for the payment of which the stock had been pledged. It would be remarkable if, in the enactment of said § 2611, it was intended to apply to the creditor of a stockholder, that such creditor was not permitted to examine the record, where all transfers of stock must be entered. Aulbach v. Dahler, 4 Idaho, 654, 43 Pac. 322, is cited as sustaining appel-

Thus, in Central Nat. Bank v. Williston, 138 Mass. 244, it was held that the policy of the legislature had been to make stock liable to attachment, and therefore that a statute providing that shares may be transferred by an instrument which shall be recorded by the clerk of the corporation should be construed so as to make an unrecorded transfer of no avail as against a subsequent attachment by one having no notice of the assignment.

The delivery of a certificate of stock in a corporation, indorsed with a printed transfer with intention of transferring the stock as security for a debt, is of no avail as against an attaching creditor. Boyd v. Rockport Steam Cotton Mills, 7 Gray, 408; Blanchard v. Dedham Gaslight Co. 12 Gray, 213.

But that rule was changed by the legislature. See Andrews v. Worcester, N. & R. R. Co. 159 Mass. 64, 33 N. E. 1109.

In Kellogg v. Stockwell, 75 Ill. 68, the court, in discussing the effect upon the rights of assignor and assignee of a statutory provision requiring transfers of stock to be made on the books of the company, stated that the provision will be regarded as designed for the protection of the company, and perhaps a purchaser without notice.

Shall be transferred only on books.

Stronger than the phrase considered above, but in the main receiving the same construction, is the provision that the stock shall be transferable only on the books of the corporation. Such phrase is generally held to be for the sole protection of the corporation, and not to operate in favor of subsequent purchasers or creditors.

The certificate accompanied by a power of attorney to transfer the shares on the books of the company invest a holder for value with title as against subsequent transferees from the original holder, notwithstanding a provision in the charter of the company that the stock is transferable only on its books, such provision being intended merely for the protection and benefit of the company. Mt. Holly, L. & M. Turnp. Co. v. Ferree, 17 N. J. Eq. 117.

A charter provision that stock shall be transferable only on the books of the corporation has no relation to purchasers and creditors; so that a bona fide assignment entitles the assignee to a transfer on the books of the corporation. L. R. A.

ration which is not affected by a subsequent attachment of the shares as the property of the transferrer. Clark v. German Security Bank, 61 Miss. 611.

In Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Richards, 6 Mo. App. 454, Affirmed in 74 Mo. 77, the court says it would seem to be settled that the purpose of requiring a transfer of stock upon the books of a corporation is that the company may know who are its shareholders, and also to protect bona fide purchasers and creditors, and persons dealing with the bank. The shares are not in possession of the assignor merely because they stand in his name on the books of the corporation; and a bona fide transfer of the certificates of stock cannot be said to imply a secret trust. If this is to be considered as a race between two creditors, the creditor who has obtained actual possession of the stock seems to be in better position.

Statutory provisions that the stock of a corporation shall be transferred only on its books are intended only for the protection and benefit of the company, and a pledge of the certificate is good as against a subsequent purchaser from the pledgor who did not require the certificates to be transferred to him. Baldwin v. Canfield, 26 Minn. 43, 1 N. W. 267.

Notwithstanding the statute provides that stock shall be transferred only on the books of the company, an unrecorded transfer is valid as against a subsequent attachment with notice. Nicollet Nat. Bank v. City Bank, 38 Minn. 85, 8 Am. St. Rep. 643, 35 N. W. 577.

So a transfer of stock not entered on the books of the company takes precedence over a subsequent attachment against the vendor. Lund v. Wheaton Roller Mill Co. 50 Minn. 36, 36 Am. St. Rep. 623, 52 N. W. 268.

In Culp v. Mulvane, 66 Kan. 143, 71 Pac. 273, it is said that, under the statutes of that state, a transfer on the books of the company is not essential to a valid transfer of the stock between the parties thereto, or those claiming under them. The statute in question provided that the stock should be transferable only on the books of the company in the manner prescribed by the by-laws. The court says, it has been held that such a provision must be limited in its application to the objects sought to be accomplished by the statute, which objects referred to matters growing out of the stockholder's relation to the company and its creditors, and does not make invalid an unregislants' contention. That was a case of a creditor bringing suit against the corporation bank to recover on certificates of deposit amounting to about $3,000, and the question involved there was whether a shareholder was liable for the unpaid balance on his stock, he claiming that he had sold the stock, but had failed to have the transfer entered on the books of the corporation. That action was brought to enforce a stockholder's liability by a creditor of the corporation, and is not in point. Kentucky has a statute almost, if not quite, identical with our § 2611, the construction of which was involved in the case of Thurber v. Crump, 86 Ky. 408, 6 S. W. 145. The court said: "But the section supra does not operate as a registration law in the interest of the creditors of the stockholder, for the reason that the books of the company are not required to be kept open for the inspection of the public. The books are required to be kept open to the stockholders only. Outsiders have no right to demand an inspection of the books. Therefore the section in question was not intended for the protection of creditors. [As to them, the stock of the stockholder is as unrecorded stock.] As to the creditor, the stock of the stockholder is as though the stockholder held it in his pocket on some private individual, in which [latter] case a bona fide transfer for value is good against the transferer's creditors. So, in the case at bar, the recording of the transfer of stock on the books of the company, not being required there transfer between vendor and vendee. The court further says, it is not to be denied that very respectable authorities hold the contrary view; but these are in the minority in number and hold the more unsatisfactory position. Continuing, the court says, it is a matter of common knowledge that the constant practice of the commercial world is to pass title to stock in corporations, or impose thereon the burden of collateral obligations by a simple passing from hand to hand of the indorsed paper certificates of stock. Vast volumes of business are transacted upon the faith that such transfer is perfectly good as between the parties thereto, who act in good faith, without a formal transfer upon the stock register. The transfer vests in the assignee as against the assignor, or in one claiming under him, the full beneficial use and right to the stock, whether it be called an equitable or legal right, or both.

Laws providing for the transfer of shares only on the books of the corporation are not intended for the benefit of creditors of individual shareholders. Continental Nat. Bank v. Elliot Nat. Bank, 7 Fed. 369.

Where the owner of certain stock of the United States, which was, under the statute, transferable only on the books of the government bank where it was registered, pledged it without making the transfer, and became indebted to the government, the court held that his administrator had a right to appropriate the proceeds of the stock to the satisfaction of the claim of the pledgee in preference to the claim of the government. United States v. Cutts, 1 Sumn. 133, Fed. Cas. No. 14,912. Mr. Justice Story says that the true interpretation of the statute is that, so far as the United States and the proprietors of the stock are concerned, no transfer is to be considered as complete and perfect, so as to pass the legal ownership of the stock and make the purchaser the legal owner, until the transfer has been entered upon the public books. No person can transfer the same as such owner, or entitle himself to receive the dividends, unless he stands as recorded proprietor on the books. I understand the statute to provide only for legal transfers, and to look to them and to them only; leaving the parties at liberty to create whatever equitable titles and liens they may choose, and to enforce them by the general remedies between them and their representatives which the jurisprudence of the country recognizes for that 67 L. R. A. purpose. And the judge, in referring to the Connecticut decisions, stated that, unless they were capable of explanation on local grounds, but turn upon more general principles, they do not appear to him founded on as solid grounds as those which maintain a different doctrine.

A statute providing that stock shall be transferable only on the books of the corporation is intended to prescribe a mode of transfer as between the corporation and a stockholder in all matters relating to the internal government and management of the corporation, rather than between the stockholder and a third person; and therefore a pledge of the stock is good as against an attaching creditor, although it is not recorded on the books, although it may not be good as against one purchasing at an execution sale for value and without notice. Masury v. Arkansas Nat. Bank, 35 C. C. A. 476, 93 Fed. 603. In that case the purchaser was given full notice of the pledge prior to the sale, and bought with full notice of the fact that the equitable title to the stock was then in the pledgee.

But a year later the question as to the effect of the statute upon an absolute transfer again arose before the circuit court of another district in the same state, and that court, after distinguishing the Masury Case on the ground that that involved merely a pledge, held that, under the statute, an absolute transfer, if not recorded, was void, even in favor of attaching creditors with notice, and who became purchasers at the sale by merely crediting the amount of their bid upon their claim. Fabrney v. Kelly, 102 Fed. 403. The court says as against the attaching creditor the purchaser of the stock acquires no title from the transferer. The latter held both the legal and the equitable title. And, even if the attaching creditor was not an innocent purchaser, the transferee of the stock had no standing to question his title.

The latter decision finds some precedent in decisions of the state courts.

In Trimble v. Vandegrift, 7 Houst. (Del.) 451, 32 Atl. 632, the court ordered the sale under execution of stock standing in the name of the judgment debtor, notwithstanding the corporation had been notified that it had been sold prior to the levy of the execution. The ground of the order is not given, but the judgment creditor insisted that he was entitled to the order upon the ground that he claimed the for the benefit of the stockholder's creditors, but for the benefit of the company and purchasers, the transfer of the stock without the transfer being entered upon the books of the company limited the passage of the legal title strictly to the vendor and vendee, as between the vendee and the company and a subsequent purchaser for value and without notice of the prior purchase at the time he had his transfer recorded on the books of the company; but, as between such purchaser and the creditors of the stockholder, the purchaser acquires a perfect legal title. Counsel evidently overlooked the fact that Weston v. Bear River & A. Water & Min. Co. 5 Cal.

sale to be void, and that this was the proper method of testing it, and that the sale had not been completed as against the execution because of failure to record the transfer on the books of the company.

In State ex rel. Koons v. First Nat. Bank, 89 Ind. 302, the court, in dealing with the right of a sheriff to transfer stock of a national bank upon its books, to one who had purchased at an execution sale, as against a claim of the bank that the stock had been pledged to a third person, said, if, as contended, the pledgee held the stock in pledge, he must have appeared upon the books of the bank as the owner of the stock. He could not have held it so in pledge unless it had been transferred to him on the books of the bank by the pledgeor before the levy and sale.

In Commercial Bank v. Kortright, 22 Wend. 348, 34 Am. Dec. 317, it is said that a general custom to make a transfer of stock by a blank indorsement a legal transfer cannot prevail as against a statute providing that the transfer can be made only on the books of the company; but it is also said that such a transfer will pass an equitable title which will give the assignee a preferable claim over any person who has not a prior equity, unless he has obtained a legal title to the stock by an actual assignment upon the books without notice of the equity.

It may be doubted, in view of Chemical Nat. Bank v. Colwell, 132 N. Y. 250, 30 N. E. 644, whether that represents the present rule in New York.

An early Massachusetts case held that, where the charter of the corporation provides that its shares shall be transferred only at the office of the corporation and on its books, an attempted transfer by assignment of the certificates, together with a power of attorney to effect the transfer, is ineffectual against a subsequent attachment by one having no notice of the attempted transfer, although notice has been given to the company. Fisher v. Essex Bank, 5 Gray, 373. The court says, it is important that the title be easily and certainly ascertained, that the mode of acquiring and aliening it be fixed and known, and that it may at any time be made available by a process of law for the debts of the owner. All these objects are most effectually accomplished by making the transfer at the office of the corporation the decisive act of passing the property, the legal, transferable, attachable interest. It 67 L. R. A.

is necessary to fix some act and some point of time at which the property changes and vests in the vendee, and it will tend to the security of all parties concerned to make that turning point consist of an act which, while it may be easily proved, does at the same time give notice to the transfer.

Not valid "except as between the parties," unless registered.

Even when the provision is that the transfer shall not be valid, "except as between the parties," unless entered on the books, the tendency of some courts is to hold that the word "parties" includes privies, and that, therefore, the transfer is valid as against attaching creditors and subsequent purchasers.

Under a statute providing that a transfer of stock shall not be valid, except as between the parties, until the same is recorded in the books of the corporation; and that the books shall be open for inspection of "stockholders or creditors of the corporation,"—an unregistered pledge is valid as against the right of a purchaser at a subsequent execution sale, against the one in whose name the title stands on the books. The court says, where all persons interested have not a right of access to the records of stock of the corporation, it has been almost universally held that an unrecorded transfer is good as against a purchaser at execution sale, against the owner of record, even although such purchaser has no notice whatever of such transfer. "The principle upon which a majority of the decisions seems to rest is that, by the express provisions of the statute, the transfer between the parties is good, and that, since the general rule in equity is that a purchaser at a judicial sale will take the real, instead of the apparent, interest of the judgment debtor, it follows that, by the application of such rule, the purchaser at a sale of such stock would, in equity, take only such interest therein as the judgment debtor had at the time the lien enforced by the execution sale attached." The creditors of the corporation being the only ones entitled to inspect the books, it must be assumed that the statute making an unregistered transfer invalid was for their benefit. Port Townsend Nat. Bank v. Port Townsend Gas & Fuel Co. 6 Wash. 597, 34 Pac. 155.

In Kentucky Nat. Bank v. Avery, 12 Nat. Corp. Rep. 111, it is said that, where the 186, 63 Am. Dec. 117, was again before the supreme court of California in 6 Cal. 425. In the latter case the court held that a party who purchases at sheriff's sale stock of an incorporation, knowing that the certificates of such stock have been previously hypothecated, is chargeable with notice of such fact, and takes subject to the claim of the pledgee, even where the transfer has not been made on the books of the corporation. In People ex rel. Mead v. Elmore, 35 Cal. 653, the court, after citing Weston v. Bear River & A. Water & Min. Co. 5 Cal. 186, 63 Am. Dec. 117, and 6 Cal. 425, and Naglee v. Pacific Wharf Co. 20 Cal. 529, says it was held in those cases "that transfers of stock which have not been entered on the books of the company, as provided in the statute, are nevertheless valid as against all the world, except subsequent purchasers in good faith without notice." The same doctrine is reaffirmed in Farmers' Nat. Gold Bank v. Wilson, 58 Cal. 600, and Speckels v. Nevada Bank, 113 Cal. 272, 33 L. R. A. 459, 54 Am. St. Rep. 348, 45 Pac. 329. The doctrine as laid down in Weston v. Bear River & A. Water & Min. Co. 5 Cal. 186, 63 Am. Dec. 117, has been greatly modified, if not overruled entirely, by later decisions. The above-cited cases from Wisconsin and Iowa cite the case of Weston v. Bear River & A. Water & Min. Co. as authority. Those courts evidently were not cited to the same case in 6 Cal. and later decisions of the California court limiting and distinguishing the first decision. The California supreme court is evidently inclined to take a view much more owner of stock sells and delivers it to a bona fide purchaser for value, he passes all that he has—a perfect title—to his purchaser, who eo instanti becomes the absolute owner of the legal and equitable title to the same. There is no title or interest, legal or equitable, to his stock remaining to be attached or levied on by the creditors of his vendor. The attaching creditor can acquire no higher or greater right to the stock than the defendant in the attachment owned at the time of the levy. And it is immaterial that the statute provides that transfers of stock shall not be valid, except as between the parties thereto, until they are regularly entered on the books of the company.

Under a statute providing that transfers of stock shall not be valid, except as between the parties thereto, until entered on the books of the corporation: but which makes the books subject only to the inspection of the stockholders,—a transfer without registration is good as against creditors of the former owner, but not as against subsequent purchasers without notice. Thurber v. Crump, 86 Ky. 408, 6 S. W. 145.

And in American Wire-Nail Co. v. Bayless, 91 Ky. 94, 15 S. W. 10, it is said that a transfer on the books of the corporation is merely to protect the company and others who might propose to purchase the stock.

So MAPLETON BANK v. STANBROD held that a statutory provision that a transfer of stock is not valid, except between the parties, until it is entered upon the books of the corporation, is not intended as a protection to creditors of the stockholder, but is intended to protect the company, its members, and creditors. Therefore, a transfer in pledge, without entry on the books, is good as against subsequent attaching creditors of the transferrer. The court held that creditors of shareholders had no right of access to the stock books, and the statute could not be presumed to have been enacted for their benefit.

With regard to the effect of this phrase, the opinions of the courts are more evenly divided, however, and there is a respectable amount of authority the other way.

The notice to the intending purchaser, and the ineffectual attempt to secure a transfer, have been in some cases held sufficient to carry 67 L. R. A.

the decision in favor of the pledgee, as will appear in subsequent subdivisions.

Under a statute providing that the transfer of shares is not valid, except as between the parties thereto, until it is regularly entered on the books of the corporation, a transfer is not valid as against subsequent attaching creditors of the assignor without notice until it has been so entered. But by that statute the books were made subject to inspection by any person desiring the same. Ft. Madison Lumber Co. v. Batavian Bank, 71 Iowa, 270, 60 Am. Rep. 789, 32 N. W. 336. The court said there is no question as to the preponderance of authority. It is clearly in favor of the attachment. But it continues: "We are not influenced more by this fact than what seems to be the plain language and intent of the statute, and the difficulty and uncertainty which would often attend securing debts by attachment of stock, if stock, as against attaching creditors, can be transferred by mere delivery of the certificates, and if the books provided expressly for inspection by such creditors, are to serve especially the purpose of a false scent."

And that case was followed in Ryan v. Campbell, 71 Iowa, 760, 32 N. W. 340, and Commercial Nat. Bank v. Farmers' & T. Nat. Bank, 82 Iowa, 192, 47 N. W. 1080.

And in Perkins v. Lyons, 111 Iowa, 192, 82 N. W. 486, the doctrine was carried to the extent of holding that an attempted transfer was not valid, even where the creditor had actual notice and the assignee requested the transfer officer to make the transfer, and he failed to do so. The court said that such a request did not exhaust all the reasonable means at the disposal of the assignee to effect the transfer: the fact being that at the time the request was made the stock book was within easy reach and there was nothing to prevent the transfer being made immediately; but that the assignee did not insist on that being done, but left it to the secretary to do, which the latter forgot.

The California statute of 1850 expressly provided that no transfer of stock should be valid, except as between the parties thereto, until the same had been entered on the books of the company. And under this statute it was held that the rights of the attaching creditor cannot be defeated by a prior unregistered transfer. Weston v. Bear River & A. Water & Min. Co. 5 Cal. 186, 63 Am. Dec. 117. The judge writing the liberal to the pledgee than that taken in the Weston Case, but refrains from doing so because of its regard for the principle of stare decisis. It is not necessary for us to extend this opinion, for from an examination of the authorities above cited the view we take of the question under consideration is fully sustained, and the reasons for that rule of construction are forcibly and succinctly set forth in the authorities above cited, and at § 490 of Cook on Corporations [5th ed.] the author closes his discussion of this question as follows: "It may be added, in regard to this whole subject, that the decisions and statutes of the various states show clearly that public policy and the legitimate demands of trade have gradually caused the courts and legislatures of the various states to establish the rule that a sale or pledge of certificates of stock has precedence over a subsequent attachment levied on that stock for the debt of the vendor or pledgeor, and that the failure of the pledgee or purchaser of the certificate to obtain a registry on the corporate books is not fatal to his interest in the stock. In the great commercial centers, where certificates of stock pass from hand to hand, and are pledged to banks and financial institutions daily to secure great sums of money, the necessity of such a rule is imperative."

The judgment must be sustained, and it is so ordered. Costs of this appeal are awarded to the respondents.

Quarles, Ch. J., and Stockslager, J. concur.

opinion said: I shall not dispute that, in the absence of legislation, the transfer of the stock would be valid; but I regard the statute as imperative in its prohibition. He continues: It cannot be fairly contended that this provision was designed as a protection to the company alone.

A subsequent hearing in that case introduced the question of the effect of notice, and changed the decision. 6 Cal. 425.

The earlier decision was followed in Naglee v. Pacific Wharf Co. 20 Cal. 530, where the court said, with respect to the two decisions in the Weston Case, that it might not be quite clear upon what principle the distinction between them rests. If by the operation of the statute the transfer was absolutely void against all persons except the parties, and for that reason was void against the rights of an attaching creditor, there seems to be some difficulty in saying that this right of the attaching creditor can be defeated by giving him notice after his lien has attached, or giving bidders at the sale notice of a prior transfer.

The intention of the legislature by the passage of the California statute was to prevent frauds on third persons, as well as to protect the company; and under it the books of the corporation are the only criterion to determine the question of ownership. Strout v. Natoma Water & Min. Co. 9 Cal. 78.

In West Coast Safety Faucet Co. v. Wulff. 133 Cal. 315, 85 Am. St. Rep. 171, 65 Pac. 622. It is stated that it is settled law in this state that one who purchases at execution sale shares of a corporation, standing on the books of the corporation in the name of the judgment debtor, is entitled to have the certificate of such shares reissued to him as such purchaser, if at the time of the purchase he acts in good faith, and without notice that the outstanding certificate has been assigned or pledged to some person other than the judgment debtor. In order that an assignee or pledgee of a certificate may protect his rights, as against a purchaser at execution sale, he must cause a reissue to him of a certificate, or he must serve notice on the corporation that he holds the certificate as such assignee or pledgee.

As between a general assignee for creditors and a subsequent attaching creditor of stock which had already been pledged for a loan, a statute providing that no transfer of stock shall be valid, except as between the parties, until the same shall be entered on the books of the company, will defeat the unrecorded title of the assignee. Lyndonville Nat. Bank v. Folsom, 7 N. M. 611, 38 Pac. 253.

Under a statute providing that no transfer shall be valid, except as between the parties thereto, until the same shall have been entered upon the books of the corporation, an unrecorded transfer is not valid as against a subsequent execution levied upon the stock as property of the registered owner. Re Murphy, 51 Wis. 519, 8 N. W. 419. The court says that, under the language of the statute, all transfers of shares not entered on the books are invalid as to attaching or execution creditors of the assignor, as well as to the company and subsequent purchasers in good faith. All transfers not so entered on the books are absolutely void because they are made void by the statute.

The Connecticut statutes provide that stock may be pledged by delivery and a power of attorney for their transfer, but that no such pledge without an actual transfer of the stock shall be valid against any person but the pledgeor and his personal representatives until a copy of the power shall have been filed with the treasurer or secretary of the corporation. First Nat. Bank v. Hartford Life & Annuity Ins. Co. 45 Conn. 22.

A transfer of stock not recorded on the books of the corporation is of no avail as against a subsequent assignment by the transferor for the benefit of creditors. Shipman v. Etina Ins. Co. 29 Conn. 245. But in that case the court says most striking and decisive badges of fraud attach to the transaction. The original owner held the apparent title on the books of the corporation, and dealt with the stock as his own, thus exhibiting to the world every inducium of ownership, and exercising the same control and dominion over the stock as before its assignment.

Where a married woman owning stock in a corporation attempted to pledge it for the debt of her husband by delivering the certificates and signing a written statement of the pledge, but without giving any power to transfer the stock on the books of the corporation, and subsequently sold the stock to the corporation, it was held that the pledgee had no claim against her estate on the ground that her sale was wrongful as to him, since no valid pledge had ever been effected. Platt v. Hawkins, 43 Conn. 139.

Forbidding transfer until subscription paid.

A statute providing that there shall be no transfer of shares until the subscriptions are all paid in does not prevent a transfer by assignment from giving a right which is superior to that of a subsequent attaching creditor of the original owner. Quiner v. Marblehead Social Ins. Co. 10 Mass. 476.

But in Coleman v. Spencer, 5 Blackf. 197, which was a contest between an assignee and execution creditor of a subscriber to stock in the state bank, the court held that property in the form of such stock was entirely the creature of the charter establishing the institution, and must be governed, as to the manner of acquiring, holding, and transferring it, by the provisions of that instrument. Therefore, it was held that, where the original subscriber defaulted in the payment of the first call, and assigned the stock to one who made the payment, but who did not transfer the stock on the books, the stock was subject to execution against the subscriber on the ground that, prior to the payment, there was nothing to assign, and after the payment the assignment could be made only on the books of the bank.

Attachment of a subscriber's interest in the stock of a corporation before issuance of the certificates prevails over a prior transfer of his interest therein made by registered mortgage, but without giving actual notice thereof to the corporation. Cates v. Baxter, 97 Tenn. 443, 37 S. W. 219. The court says the transfer was not completed before the shares were attached, and in such cases the shares are subject to attachment by the creditors of the subscriber.

Provision for notice.

Shares of stock are not credits within the meaning of a statute providing that a pledge of credits not negotiable shall not be complete until notice is given to the debtor. Plott v. Johnson, 33 La. Ann. 1286. The court says that, if the question was an open one, it should be disposed to hold that the stock was within the provision of the statute, but that the question was foreclosed by former decisions. Therefore, a pledge not transferred on the books of the company is good as against a subsequent execution.

2. Section 9 of chapter 106 of the Code of 1899, giving the plaintiff in an attachment proceeding a lien on the personal property of the debtor from the time of the levying of the attachment, or serving a copy thereof on the garnishee, on all the personal property, choses in action, and other securities of the defendant in the hands of the garnishee, and on any real estate of the debtor levied on by virtue thereof, from the selling out of the same, includes shares of corporation stock in the terms "personal property, choses in action, and other securities."

3. Such shares are personal estate, and a species of incorporeal property.

4. In a proceeding by the creditor of a

Subjecting to execution.

A statutory provision that shares of stock may be levied on does not apply to stock that has been pledged, and the certificates, properly indorsed, delivered to the pledgee, although no transfer has been made on the books of the corporation. Weller v. J. B. Pace Tobacco Co. 5 Ry. & Corp. L. J. 5, 2 N. Y. Supp. 292.

But it has been held that, under a statute making property subject to execution which remains in the order and disposition of the judgment debtor, stock standing in his name on the books of the corporation is so subject, although the certificates have actually been transferred to another. Brock v. Ruttan, 1 U. C. C. P. 218.

Transfer "to give share in enterprise."

A deposit as collateral security of shares in a corporation whose charter provides that the transfer shall be entered on the corporation's books, and that, until the transfer is made, the purchaser shall have no share in the undertaking of the corporation, will give the depositary a lien,—especially if notice of his rights is given to the corporation,—which will take precedence of the rights of a subsequent assignee in bankruptcy of the depositor. Ex parte Dobson, 2 Mont. D. & DeG. 685.

Stronger phrases.

The language of the statute may be such as to leave no doubt that the legislature meant to subject all stock not transferred on the books to the claims of creditors.

The Mississippi act of 1892 provides that the legal title to and beneficial interest in corporate stock shall remain in the person appearing on the books of the company, as to creditors, until after a bona fide transfer has been made on the books. Goyer Cold Storage Co. v. Wildberger, 71 Miss. 438, 15 So. 235.

A creditor who has levied an attachment on stock before receiving notice of its transfer is a bona fide creditor within the meaning of a statute which requires registration to perfect a title as against such creditors. Berney Nat. Bank v. Pinckard, 87 Ala. 577, 6 So. 364.

The Colorado statute provides that no transfer of stock shall be valid for any purpose whatever, except to render the person to whom the transfer is made liable for the debts of the shareholder to subject his shares to the payment of his debt, the corporation in which the shares are held should be made the garnishee.

5. A certificate of stock is not the stock itself, but is evidence of its existence and ownership.

6. Though, when issued, such certificate is a muniment of title, it is not essential to the existence of the property represented by it.

7. A certificate is not necessary to a sale of shares. The beneficial interest in them is assignable by parol, the ownership passing immediately on consummation of the sale, by force of the contract, as in the case of ordinary choses in action, and not by operation of law.

8. A sale of shares for which no certificate has been issued may be evidenced by an informal written instrument, executed and delivered by the transferor to the transferee, without a power of attorney entitling the latter to have the same transferred on the books of the company.

9. In this state a shareholder may, upon his demand, obtain a certificate of his shares, but, unless demanded by him, it need not be issued; and he may freely transfer the shares without it if they are fully paid up, or security for the balance due on them, satisfactory to the board of directors, be given.

10. Section 21 of chapter 53 of the Code of 1899, requiring corporations to keep transfer books and the shares to be assigned therein, is intended for the protection and convenience of the corporation and its shareholders.

11. The books and papers of a private company, unless it shall have been entered on the books of the company. The court says of this statute: It is a clear provision, taking from the owner of stock the right to transfer it in accordance with the known rules of the common law, and substituting therefor another and different mode. This change was doubtless made for the purpose of furnishing record evidence of the title, and, in view of the plain and explicit language employed, the statute cannot be disregarded. And the court held that, notwithstanding an unregistered transfer, the stock was still subject to attachment at the suit of the creditors of the original owner. The court says: We are aware that in some jurisdictions somewhat similar provisions have been held to relate solely to the government of the corporation in the transaction of its corporate business, to advise it of the names of those entitled to vote, receive dividends as stockholders, etc., and that creditors should not be allowed to take advantage of any failure to comply with such requirements. Such decisions have usually, however, been based upon statutes essentially dissimilar from those here under consideration, and frequently upon the construction to be given a by-law of the company, in the absence of express statutory restriction. But the decided weight of authority, as well as the better reason, we think, unite in support of the conclusion that when, as in this state, the statute of the state, as applicable to corporations, requires that shares shall be transferred in a particular mode, there must be at least a substantial compliance with the requirement in order to protect the property against future assignments or levies. But the Canadian court held that, under a statute providing that no transfer of stock shall be valid for any purpose whatever, save only as exhibiting the rights of the parties thereto towards each other, until entry thereof has been duly made in the books of the corporation, an unregistered transfer is valid as against a subsequent execution levy. Morton v. Cowan, 25 Ont. Rep. 529. The trial judge says the statute admits, recognizes, and declares that a transfer may be valid as exhibiting the rights of the parties thereto towards each other, and that concludes all that is to be ascertained in this case. The provision is not pointed at dealings between the holder and others, pending which an execution comes in. The sale, which is an act of the law, is not permitted to have a tortious effect so as to cut out the rights of the bona fide assignee or pledgee. And this decision was affirmed.

Where the statute provides that title to stock shall not pass from the proprietor until the transfer has been so far entered on the corporate records as to show the names of the parties thereto, an unrecorded transfer of which notice has been given to the corporation, but which has not been entered on the books, is invalid as against a subsequent attachment against the transferor. Fiske v. Carr, 20 Me. 301.

And that ruling was followed in Skowhegan Bank v. Cutler, 49 Me. 315, where, however, the question whether the statute was intended for the protection of the corporation or creditors and purchasers of the record owner is open to debate, the tendency of strong courts is to give it the former effect, and to leave the business world free to deal with the title on the basis of the possession of the certificates.

The attitude of the New York courts is well illustrated by the recent case of Chemical Nat. Bank v. Colwell, 132 N. Y. 250, 30 N. E. 644, where although the question did not arise between a transferee and persons claiming under a transferor, the court said that the provision of the statute that no transfer of stock "shall be valid for any purpose whatever," except to render the transferor liable for the debts of the company, until it shall have been entered on the transfer book, is only for the protection of the corporation, and does not operate to prevent the passing of the entire legal and equitable title in the shares as between the parties by delivery of the certificate properly indorsed.

And in Sabin v. Bank of Woodstock, 21 Vt. 353, where the question arose as to the rights between one in whose name the stock stood on the books of the corporation and the corporation which attached the stock as belonging to another, the court held that, since the one in whose name the stock stood was not a bona fide purchaser until after the equities of the corporation attached, the rights of the corporation should prevail; but the court says, we should not be inclined to question that a bona fide purchaser of shares of one in whose name the shares stood on the books of the corporation would acquire a good title to the stock as against the world. In that case the charter provided that no transfer should be valid until corporation under the laws of this state are not public, but private, records and documents.

12. An unregistered transfer of shares of corporation stock, for which no certificate has been issued, if made for a valuable consideration and without fraud, vests in the transferee a title to the shares superior to the claim of a subsequent attaching creditor of the transferor.
13. In the absence of fraud and statutory regulations, a creditor proceeding by execution or attachment only obtains such rights in the property seized as his debtor had at the time of the seizure.
14. The rights of a creditor respecting shares of corporation stock for which certificates have not been issued, alleged to be the property of his debtor, are the same as in the case of an ordinary chose in action.
15. When, under the provisions of § 23 of chapter 106 of the Code of 1899, a petition is filed in a suit in equity founded upon an attachment, setting up title by purchase, and the plaintiff in the cause relies upon fraud in the alleged purchase to defeat the claim of title so set up, the trial of the issue must be upon the petition without any other pleading, and by jury, unless trial by jury is waived.

16. In such case it is reversible error to hear and determine the issue upon the petition, and answer thereto, and depositions of witnesses, according to the rules and principles governing courts of equity.
17. Waiver of the right of trial by jury must be by consent entered of record. It cannot be merely inferred from the fact that the court tried the case without objection.

(December 6, 1904.)

It was recorded on the books of the corporation.

IV. By-law requiring transfer on books.

The almost overwhelming weight of authority is to the effect that a provision requiring transfer on the books of the corporation merely in its by-laws does not prevent a pledgee of the stock from acquiring a good title as against subsequent attaching creditors of the pledgeor. Seelgson v. Brown, 61 Tex. 114; Tombler v. Palestine Ice Co. 17 Tex. Civ. App. 596, 43 S. W. 896; South Texas Nat. Bank v. Texas & L. Lumber Co. 30 Tex. Civ. App. 412, 70 S. W. 768; Hamilton v. San Antonio Foundry Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 51 S. W. 1104.

Failure to record a transfer, although required by the by-laws of the corporation, does not subordinate the rights of the transferee to subsequent attachment, or execution against the transferor. Telford & F. Turnp. Co. v. Gerhab (Pa.) 13 Atl. 90.

A transfer by assignment of the certificates properly indorsed divests the title of the assignor, and leaves nothing in him which can be reached by subsequent attachment, although the stock remains in his name on the books of the company. And it is immaterial that the by-laws of the company require the transfer to be made on the books. Finney's Appeal, 59 Pa. 398.

Where the owner of stock had transferred it into the name of another, and then assigned the certificates to a third person as security for a loan, no rights to the stock could be secured by an attachment against the assignor, although a by-law of the corporation required the transfer to be made on the books; since he had neither the legal, nor the equitable, title. Beckwith v. Burroughs, 13 R. I. 294.

A transfer by assignment and delivery of the shares of stock, together with notice to the corporation, gives a right superior to a subsequent attachment, although a by-law requires transfers to be upon the books of the corporation. State Ins. Co. v. Gennett, 2 Tenn. Ch. 100.

Where stock was pledged as collateral security and subsequently claimed by assignees for the benefit of creditors of the pledgeor, the court says it is true the stock is transferable only on the books of the corporation; but this simply means that the corporation will not recognize anyone as the owner of stock who is not the transferee on its books of the person to whom the certificates were issued. But this has nothing to do with the rights which other persons may acquire as between themselves and the stockholder by the pledge and delivery of the certificates; and it was held that the pledge prevailed as against the claims of the assignees. Blouin v. Hart, 30 La. Ann. 714.

Although a by-law of the corporation provides that all transfers of stock shall be recorded on the stock books, a bona fide sale of the stock, together with a power of attorney to transfer it and a delivery of the certificates, is complete; and it is not necessary to make the transfer on the books to protect the stock against seizure by creditors of the transferor. Smith v. Crescent City L. S. L. & S. H. Co. 30 La. Ann. 1378. The court says the certificates of stock were the evidences of ownership, the title of the incorporeal rights represented by them, and these certificates were delivered to the purchaser. Having the certificates in their possession, the purchasers had a complete guaranty that the corporation would not transfer the stock to their prejudice, since the corporation had bound itself to hold these shares subject to transfer by surrender of the certificates. The thing sold, therefore, had passed beyond the control of the seller and into the power, possession, and control of the purchaser. The distinction is plain between requirements of the law in order that title and possession shall vest in the purchaser, and requirements of a by-law in order that the holder and owner of a title to shares shall receive from the corporation a certificate of ownership in his name, and be admitted to the rights and privileges of a corporation.

Stock in a corporation, if it actually belongs to another, cannot be sold under execution against the one in whose name it stands, although a by-law requires transfers to be made in the presence of one of the officers of the company. Oerther v. First Nat. Bank, 1 Legal Record Rep. 60 (Brightly's Dig.).

In Gilbert v. Manchester Iron Mfg. Co. 11 Wend. 628, where the court states that by-laws which prohibit a transfer, except on the books of the company, do not prevent the purchaser from acquiring all the title that the transferor had, although the transfer is not entered on the books, there is a dictum to the effect that, if

A PPEAL by intervener from a decree of the Circuit Court for Tucker County in favor of plaintiff in a proceeding brought to subject stock standing in the name of Levi Z. Condon upon the books of the corporation to the payment of Condon's debts. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. B. Maxwell, for appellant:

The statute expressly provides that the owner of stock in a corporation may, for a valuable consideration, sell the same and deliver to the purchaser the certificates of stock, etc., and thereupon the title of the former owner shall vest in the purchaser so far as may be necessary to effect the sale, not only as between the parties, but also as against creditors.

the stock is under encumbrance at the time of transfer, it remains so.

The sale under an attachment against the original owner after he has delivered the certificates properly indorsed as collateral security passes no title to the purchaser, notwithstanding the by-laws of the corporation provide that no transfer shall be valid unless made on the books of the corporation. Smith v. American Coal Co. 7 Lans. 317. The court said that the pledgee had parted with all his interest in the stock; he had no interest in it which could be the subject of attachment after he parted with it.

By-laws of a corporation requiring transfers of stock to be entered on its books are for the benefit of the company only. Under such a by-law, it is sufficient to defeat the rights of attaching creditors that the right of another has attached to the stock before the levy of the attachment. Goyer Cold Storage Co. v. Wildberger, 71 Miss. 438, 15 So. 235.

A by-law providing that all transfers of stock shall be in a book to be kept for the purpose is merely for the convenience of the company itself, and therefore a transfer is valid, although not entered in the books, as against a subsequent attaching creditor. Sargent v. Essex Marine R. Corp. 9 Pick. 202.

A provision of a by-law of the corporation that the stock shall be transferred only on the books of the corporation refers merely to sales, and not to pledges; and therefore a pledge is good without transfer on the books. Crescent City Seltz & Mineral Water Mfg. Co. v. Debleux, 40 La. Ann. 135, 3 So. 726.

A by-law of the corporation providing that the stock shall be transferred only on the books of the company is not intended for protection of the creditors of the stockholders; and therefore a transfer, although not made on the books of the company, is valid as against subsequent attachment. Bushnell v. Hall, 9 Ky. L. Rep. 684.

Stock which has been assigned is not subject to execution levy against the original owner, although the transfer has not been made upon the books of the corporation as required by its rules. Com. v. Watmough, 6 Whart. 117. The ruling in that case is placed upon the ground that, under the statute authorizing levy upon stock, it is made liable only to be taken for the debts of the true owner. The court says: That stock shall be liable for the payment of the Code, chap. 53, § 37; Donnelly v. Hearn-don, 41 W. Va. 519, 23 S. E. 646.

A bona fide purchaser of chattels, who gets possession thereof before a levy of an attachment thereon, gets good title to such chattels.

Poling v. Flanagan, 41 W. Va. 191, 23 S. E. 685.

The dominion of a man's property belongs to him, and not to his creditors. They can subject to their demands only the right which remains in him, and not that from which he has lawfully parted.

Davis v. Turner, 4 Gratt. 426; Drake. Attachm. §§ 223, 245.

If the transfer has been voluntary and without consideration, yet plaintiff cannot assail it unless he has clearly shown some debts of the true owner is perfectly just and equitable; but that it shall be liable, also, to the payment of the debts of the persons in whose name it stands would certainly be very unjust. The court, in response to the argument that the same rule should be applied as is applicable to actual transfer of possession of personal property, and that the only mode of effecting a notorious transfer is to effect it on the books of the corporation, says: Stock, "from its very nature, is incapable of such possession so as to make it known or notorious who has the use or benefit of it, and thus raise a general belief in regard to the ownership thereof; even its existence may be unknown, excepting comparatively to but few persons. The only evidence of it that can be safely trusted as to this is the books of the bank or the corporation; but they, being of a private nature, are not open to public inspection. Hence it is, that the ownership of such stock, though held by the owner in his own name on the books of the corporation, is not supposed to have given him a general credit with the world. And for the same reason, if held by another in trust for him, the trustee is never supposed, by reason of its standing in his name on the books of the corporation, to have obtained a general credit on account of it. It is not, therefore, to apprise the world and prevent it from giving a false credit to the apparent owner of stock that the transfer thereof is required to be made on the books of the bank in the presence of one of its officers."

Transfers of national-bank stock.

Within the rule that a by-law requiring transfers to be recorded on the books of the corporation does not affect the rights of transferrers as between themselves are the cases dealing with transfers of national-bank stock.

The question whether shares in a national bank can be attached after they have been assigned but the transfer not entered on the books of the corporation is governed, not by the law of the state where the bank is located, but by the law which created the bank. Continental Nat. Bank v. Elliot Nat. Bank, 7 Fed. 369.

Under the provisions of the United States banking law, which provides that shares shall be transferred on the books of the association in such manner as may have been prescribed by the by-laws of the association, and a by-law covinous device, or circumstance, indicating an actual fraudulent intent.

Greer v. O'Brien, 36 W. Va. 277, 15 S. E. 74; Arnold v. Slaughter, 36 W. Va. 589, 15 S. E. 250.

Unless the relationship of the parties is such as to dispense with the rule, or shift the burden of proof and place it upon the defendant; or unless the transaction is such as to be held to be fraudulent per se,—the plaintiff must prove fraud, and such fraud cannot be presumed.

Wood v. Harmison, 41 W. Va. 386, 23 S. E. 560; Oberlin College v. Blair, 45 W. Va. 812, 32 S. E. 203; First Nat. Bank v. Bowman, 36 W. Va. 649, 14 S. E. 989; Clay v. Deskins, 36 W. Va. 350, 15 S. E. 85; United States v. Hancock, 133 U. S. 193, 33 L. ed.

providing that the stock shall be transferable only on the books of the association, an unregistered transfer takes precedence over a subsequent attachment by a creditor without notice. Continental Nat. Bank v. Elliot Nat. Bank, 7 Fed. 369. This ruling is placed on the general ground that an attaching creditor must take his debtor's property subject to all equitable, as well as legal, charges, liens, or opposing titles, in the absence of any statute giving him a better right.

Stock of the bank of the United States is not subject to attachment against the one in whose name it stands on the books of the bank after he has transferred the certificates properly indorsed to another. United States v. Vaughan, 3 Binn. 394, 5 Am. Dec. 375.

A transfer of national-bank stock, good at common law, is good as against subsequent attaching creditors. Doty v. First Nat. Bank, 3 N. D. 9, 17 L. R. A. 259, 53 N. W. 77.

In the absence of any by-law of a national bank regulating the mode of transfer, preference will be given to an unrecorded transfer over subsequent attaching creditors of the original owner. Scott v. Pequonnock Nat. Bank, 21 Blatchf. 203, 15 Fed. 494.

A national bank may be held liable in damages for refusal to recognize the title of the transferee, whose transfer was not recorded as required by its by-laws, as against a title acquired under a subsequent attachment against the original owner. Hazard v. National Exch. Bank, 26 Fed. 94.

Opposing decisions.

The courts in a few states have taken the opposite view of this question.

In Northrop v. Curtis, 5 Conn. 246, where executions were levied on shares of stock at the time transfers were filed with the clerk, the principle contention was that no legal title rested in the judgment debtor because the by-laws of the company had not been complied with when he took his title. The court held that the title was properly in him subject to levy, and judgment was given by a divided court in favor of the execution creditor, without any extended discussion of the effect of the attempted retransfer before the levy of the execution; but the judge whose opinion is reported in the case says that the by-law declares "that no transfer or assignment shall be valid," un- 67 L. Messrs. Dalley & Bowers also for appellant, on rehearing.

Messrs. F. M. Reynolds and J. P. Scott for appellee.

Poffenbarger, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity against a nonresident defendant to subject to the payment of a debt, amounting to $5,000 and interest, by process of attachment and garnishment, cerless it is registered, thus suspending the validity of the act of transfer on the registration, thereby plainly intimating that, until the registration was effected, the stock must be regarded as that of the transferor. The judge says it was undoubtedly the legislative object to protect the community in their purchases of stock by rendering the books reasonable evidence of ownership; and, therefore, he held that the assignment need not be on the book itself, but that it is sufficient if a record of the assignment appear there.

As against attaching creditors of the transferor, a mere delivery of the certificate is not sufficient to transfer the title, but the rights of the transferee originate with the entry of the transfer on the books of the company, where the charter provides that the shares of the company shall be transferred only on the books of the company in the manner directed by the by-laws, and the by-laws provide that no assignment or transfer shall be valid, unless made in the form prescribed by the directors and registered by the clerk. Northrop v. Newton & B. Turnp. Co. 3 Conn. 544. The court held that the assignment of stock must be in the mode so declared, and that the method of conveying at common law was entirely suspended. Under the provisions of the statute and by-laws, the attempted assignment was of no avail until it was actually registered on the books of the company at full length.

Where, under authority of the legislature, the company enacts a by-law providing that no transfer of stock shall be good and valid until received for record by the clerk, who shall enter on the transfer the time he receives the same, which shall bear date accordingly, an attachment of the stock as the property of the one in whose name it appears on the books of the company will take precedence of a prior transfer which is not received for record until after the attachment. Oxford Turnp. Co. v. Bunnell, 6 Conn. 552.

A transfer of stock, not entered on the books of the corporation as required by its by-laws, is invalid as against an attaching creditor without notice; and it is immaterial that the transfer is part of an assignment for creditors which is recorded in the office of the clerk of court as required by statute, since the statutes governing such assignments do not supersede the necessity of the transfer on the books of the company. The court says an attaching creditor is tain shares of stock in a corporation, which, the bill alleges, are the property of the defendant. The case presents a number of questions which seem never to have been passed upon by this court.

In the absence of any statute upon the subject, shares of stock in a corporation are not subject to execution. Cook, Corp. § 480; Clark & M. Priv. Corp. § 377, p. 1147. By that law intangible property incapable of manual seizure and delivery cannot be taken on execution. Attachment, being a purely statutory remedy, reaches only such property as is made subject to it by the statute. Hence, if the statutes governing the remedy by attachment do not make shares liable under it, it is clear that they cannot be subjected to the payment of debts by such proceeding. Drake, Attachm. § 244; Haley v. Reid, 16 Ga. 437; Foster v. Potter, 37 Mo. 525; Howe v. Starkweather, 17 Mass. 240.

By § 20 of chapter 53 of the Code of 1899 it is declared that such shares shall be deemed personal estate. Section 9 of chapter 106 gives the plaintiff in an attachment proceeding a lien from the time of the levying of his attachment or serving a copy thereof, as provided in that chapter, "upon the personal property, choses in action, and other securities of the defendant against whom the claim is, in the hands of, or due from any such garnishee, on whom it is so served." By these provisions the legislature has expressly made choses in action liable to garnishment; and shares of corponot bound to look beyond the books of the company to ascertain whether his debtor has made an assignment of the stock standing in his name. Dutton v. Connecticut Bank, 13 Conn. 493.

If the by-law provides that transfers of stock shall be made only upon the books of the corporation, a transfer without entry on the books is not valid as against a subsequent execution levied upon the stock as the property of the original owner without notice of the transfer. People's Bank v. Gridley, 91 Ill. 457. The court states that the statute making shares of stock subject to levy, sale, and execution contemplates that, as against a judgment creditor, the title to the stock can pass only by transfer on the company's books. The court says the cases in New York and New Jersey recognizing a doctrine not in harmony with the rule announced do not commend themselves to its approval.

In Cheever v. Meyer, 52 Vt. 66, the court says, without a record on the books of the corporation the public, purchasers, and attaching creditors will be exposed to frequent and extensive frauds. The record kept by the company, so far as the company itself is concerned, and, we think, so far as concerns the public, purchasers, and attaching creditors, furnishes the best evidence of ownership of the stock at any specified time. As regards the corporation and those who have a right to look to its records for the owners of the stock, the transfer of the certificate leaves the transaction incomplete.

In Planters' & M. Mut. Ins. Co. v. Selma Sav. Bank, 63 Ala. 585, there is a dictum to the effect that a by-law requiring stock to be transferred on the books of the corporation was intended for the security of the corporation and of third persons, who in good faith, on a valuable consideration, may have in that mode acquired the stock without notice of prior equitable transfers, or of outstanding equities.

V. Provision of certificate requiring transfer on books.

The conflict which has been developed by the discussion thus far extends to the decisions giving effect to provisions in the certificate of ownership requiring transfers to be made on the books.

Thus, a transfer without registry is good as against a subsequent attachment, although the certificates state that the transfer must be made on the books of the company. De Comeau v. Guild Farm Oil Co. 3 Daly, 218.

But where the certificate stated that the stock was transferable only at the bank, a transfer without entry on the bank books was held by the Federal court not good against a title acquired by a purchaser at a subsequent sale under an attachment against the original owner, who obtained a transfer on the books. Williams v. Mechanics' Bank, 5 Blatchf. 59, Fed. Cas. No. 17,727.

VI. Requirement of record with county clerk.

Slightly outside of the main subject under discussion, but close enough to throw some light on it, are cases dealing with statutory provisions requiring transfers of stock to be registered with the county clerk.

Under a statute providing that no transfer of stock shall be valid against creditors of the transferor until recorded with the clerk of the county where the corporation has its office, a pledge, in another state, of stock in a local corporation, is not valid as against local attaching creditors until so recorded. And it is immaterial that such creditors have actual notice of the pledge. Masury v. Arkansas Nat. Bank, 87 Fed. 381.

But upon appeal the court held that that statute was not intended to apply to a mere pledge by indorsement and delivery of the stock certificate as collateral security, but must be confined to cases where the stockholder parts with his entire legal and equitable title by an absolute sale, the purpose of the statute being to afford a record for the benefit of the taxing authorities, or those interested in or dealing with the corporation, and who may be entitled to proceed against the corporation in case of insolvency, for which purpose a pledgee is not a stockholder. 35 C. C. A. 476, 93 Fed. 603.

And that case was followed in Batesville Teleph. Co. v. Myer-Schmidt Grocer Co. 68 Ark. 115, 56 S. W. 784.

And in Scott v. Hout (Ark.) 83 S. W. 1057, the court said that the act had objects and purposes beyond a registry act to prevent fraud by secret conveyance; and these objects are a part of the corporation system of the state. The dominant thought in the corporation system is publicity in all corporate affairs. As an integral and harmonious part of this system, all transfers of stock are to be certified, and the rate stock are almost universally held by the courts to be property of that nature. Thomp. Corp. §§ 1070, 2587, 4571; Cook, Corp. § 12; Clark & M. Priv. Corp. § 377, p. 1147. If there were no adjudications upon the subject, there would be no reason to hesitate in saying that shares of stock are subject to attachment under these statutes. Although this court has not construed them, similar statutes have been passed upon in many of the states. In Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Paine, 29 Gratt. 502, shares in a railroad company were held liable under a statute which made the attachment a lien upon all the "estate" of the debtor. In delivering the opinion of the court, Moncure, P., said such shares were plainly within the letter, as well as the spirit, of the law. In Union Nat. Bank v. Byram, 131 Ill. 92, 22 N. E. 842, it was held that the words "rights and effects" of the debtor in the general attachment law were broad enough to cover shares of stock. In Curtis v. Steever, 36 N. J. L. 304, the words "rights and credits" in the general attachment law were sufficient. It is now well settled by the authorities that, in the absence of any statutory provision to the contrary, shares of stock, although incorporeal in their nature, are personal property. Clark & M. Priv. Corp. § 376, pp. 1142, 1143. As our statute makes them personal property, and subjects apparently all forms of property to the process of attachment by giving a lien on the real estate, personal property, and choses in action and other securities of the certificate deposited with and recorded by the county clerk, and no transfer shall be valid against creditors of a stockholder until it is so deposited; and, therefore, the fact that the creditor has notice of the transfer will not prevent his securing a title superior to that of the transferee.

The recording of a mortgage of shares of stock is not sufficient to perfect the right of the mortgagee against a subsequent purchaser without actual notice from the mortgagor, where the certificates are left in the possession of the mortgagor, and no transfer is made on the books of the company. Spaulding v. Paine, 81 Ky. 416.

But a recorded mortgage gives a prior equity to one who takes a pledge of the stock to secure an existing debt. Schuster v. Jones, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 568, 58 S. W. 595.

VII. Effect of effort to secure transfer.

The rights of the assignee may be protected by equity against a subsequent attaching creditor where the failure to effect the transfer is not due to the fault of the transferee, but occurred notwithstanding his honest, but ineffectual, effort to comply with the requirements of the statute. Weber v. Bullock, 19 Colo. 214, 35 Pac. 183; Hastings v. First Nat. Bank, 4 Colo. App. 419, 36 Pac. 618.

If the corporation has unjustifiably refused to transfer the stock a delivery of the certificates, properly indorsed, is good against a creditor of the vendor who attaches the stock as his property without notice of the transfer. Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Richards, 74 Mo. 77.

A by-law which limits the transfer of stock to be made only at the office personally, or by attorney and with the assent of the president, would be in restraint of trade and contrary to the general law of the commonwealth, which permits the right to personal property to be transferred in various other ways. And, in case the company is given notice of the transfer, and refuses to make it upon the books, the transfer will take precedence over a subsequent attempt by the company to attach the stock for its own claim. Sargent v. Franklin Ins. Co. 8 Pick. 90, 19 Am. Dec. 306.

If the transferee has presented his transfer at the office of the company, and demanded a transfer, which has been refused because of an alleged lien in favor of the corporation, he acquires a good title as against a subsequent attachment creditor with notice. Plymouth Bank v. Bank of Norfolk, 10 Pick. 454.

In Colt v. Ives, 31 Conn. 25, 81 Am. Dec. 161, it was held that an assignment made in good faith and followed by a bona fide attempt to transfer the stock on the books, which failed through no fault of the assignee, was valid as against subsequent assignments; the court saying that the same circumstances would excuse failure to perfect the transfer as would excuse failure to take possession of chattels by a purchaser or assignee. The court says that the earlier cases in that state, being actions at law, conversant only with what at the time was considered the strict legal title to corporate stock, have necessarily no controlling force in a case depending upon equitable, instead of legal, principles.

The burden is upon the purchaser, who seeks to substantiate his claim against that of an attaching creditor, to show that he had done all in his power to comply with the statute, and this burden is not sustained by merely showing that he had requested a transfer of the stock to him without producing the certificates which at the time were in possession of a third person. Isbell v. Graybill (Colo. App.) 76 Pac. 550.

And in Perkins v. Lyons, 111 Iowa, 192, 82 N. W. 486, it was held that the fact that the stock book was within easy reach when the demand for transfer was made, and there was nothing to prevent an immediate transfer, it was not sufficient to leave the certificate with the clerk, who forgot to make the necessary entries.

Notice of the transfer to the custodian of the company's books is not sufficient to protect the stock against a subsequent attachment, if no demand for transfer is made. Abels v. Planters' & M. Ins. Co. 92 Ala. 382, 9 So. 423.

Under statutes providing that a transfer of stock without registration on the books of the corporation shall be void as to all bona fide creditors and subsequent purchasers without notice, if the only book kept by the corporation is its stock-certificate book with the stubs showing to whom the certificate was issued, it is sufficient to perfect the title of a pledgee against subsequent attaching creditors that the fact of the pledge is noted on the stub from which was detached the certificate issued to the pledgee, the attachment debtor. Fisher v. Jones, debtor, it would be very difficult to find a plausible technical ground upon which to except them, and utterly impossible to say, in view of the vast amount of money and property represented by corporation stock and the extent of its use for purposes of credit, that the legislature did not intend that it should be subject to the attachment laws.

Nor can there be any doubt that, in the matter of procedure, the corporation itself may be made the garnishee. Whatever interest the shareholder has is in the custody and control of the corporation. A share of the capital stock of a corporation is the interest or right which the owner has in the management of the corporation, in its surplus profits, and, upon dissolution, in all of its assets remaining after the payment of its debts. Clark & M. Priv. Corp. § 376, p. 1141. The certificate of stock representing the share of the owner may be in the hands of some person other than the debtor or the corporation, but the certificate is not the share itself. For most purposes it is not regarded as property, but only as evidence of the existence and ownership of the shares named and described in it. 10 Cyc. Law & Proc. 588. Where the proceeding to subject stock by attachment is under the general attachment laws, the corporation is made the garnishee. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Paine, 29 Gratt. 502. Special statutes usually make the corporation the garnishee. Drake, Attachm. § 259.

In this case the stock, against which the 82 Ala. 117, 3 So. 13. The court says the purpose of the statute is obviously to give notice of the title to creditors and purchasers, so as to prevent fraudulent transfers, and to protect the corporation itself in determining the question of membership and other incidents of ownership. The court continues: There may be verbal transfers of stock certificates accomplished by delivery and creating equitable liens intended only for brief collateral security, which will not be susceptible of being registered in the form of a record, and are not capable of being recorded in a formal sense. The statute does not declare that stock may be transferred only on the books of the corporation, but simply that it is so transferable.

A memorandum made with a pencil on the stub of the stock book is sufficient. Perkins v. Lyons, 111 Iowa, 192, 82 N. W. 486.

An entry by the secretary of the corporation on the stock book that the shares had been assigned as collateral security is sufficient to defeat a subsequent levy of an execution upon them by creditors of the assignor. Moore v. Marshalltown Opera-House Co. 81 Iowa, 45, 46 N. W. 750.

The rights of the pledgee may be protected by entering the names of the pledgor and pledgee, the number or designation of the shares, and the date of the transfer, without the surrender and cancelation of the old shares and the issue of new ones. Spreckels v. Nevada Bank, 113 Cal. 272, 33 L. R. A. 459, 54 Am. St. Rep. 348, 45 Pac. 329.

But under a statute providing that no transfer of stock shall affect the title or rights of any attaching creditor until it is recorded on the books of the corporation, it was held that a memorandum of the transfer, entered on the stub of the certificate book, and brought to the notice of the attaching creditor when the attachment is levied, is of no avail to prefer the transferee to the attaching creditor. Newell v. Williston, 138 Mass. 240. The court says, the statute says that knowledge that no transfer had been made, and that there was no assignment which could be recorded, and that the transferee had no right unless that of equitable assignee with power to make a legal assignment and transfer, should not affect the rights of the attaching creditor, and by plain intentment makes it immaterial whether the attaching creditor knows of them or not. It gives him the same right as to stock thus attached 67 L. R. A.

that it would give as to other kinds of personal property which had been sold by a contract good as between the parties, but without delivery.

Where the statute provided that transfers should be entered on the books of the corporation, and should be signed by the persons making and accepting them, a transfer is good, as against execution creditors of the transferer, when it has been entered on the books and signed by the transferer, but not accepted by the signature of the transferee. Woodruff v. Harris, 11 U. C. Q. B. 490.

Where the statute permits the charging of stock standing in the name of a debtor in his own right, no charging order can be made against stock which he has sold, but which has not yet been transferred on the books of the corporation because of informalities in the certificates, although notice of the transfer has been given to the company. Gill v. Continental Gas Co. L. R. 7 Exch. 332.

VIII. Effect of notice to purchaser or creditor.

If the purpose of the statute is to prevent a fraud on purchasers and creditors, it would seem that its object was sufficiently complied with if one who contemplated dealing with the record owner had actual notice of the facts. And so it has been held by some courts. But other courts have taken the position that notice was immaterial; that the statute said an unrecorded transfer should be void, and void it should be, although the result was to work a fraud on a bona fide purchaser and deprive him of his property in favor of one who acted with full knowledge of his rights.

Where a resident of South Carolina had pledged shares of stock in a Louisiana corporation to a bank as security for a loan, and then made a general assignment for benefit of creditors, after which Louisiana creditors with full notice of the prior assignment attached the stock, the court held that a prior assignment of an equitable interest in stock superseded the rights of attaching creditors with notice, although the title had not been perfected by a transfer on the books of the corporation, as required by the local law to perfect a legal title. The point of the decision seems to be in the statement by the court that the creditors could not make a valid attachment when, to their knowledge, the property no longer belonged to proceeding is, stands on the books of the company in the name of the debtor, but is claimed by a third party under an alleged purchase thereof from the debtor, made long before the order of attachment was served upon the company,—in fact, years before this suit was brought. Is the lien of the attachment superior to the title of the purchaser? The assignment of the shares was not made by delivery of share certificates, but by a mere written assignment of the shareholder to the purchaser, specifying the number of shares. It does not appear that any certificate had ever been issued, nor that any demand for the transfer of the stock from the seller to the buyer on the books of the company had ever been made. The circuit court found and held that for the purposes of this suit the stock was the property of the debtor, and decreed it to be sold; but whether it did so upon the ground that the sale was fraudulent, or that an unregistered transfer of the stock is not good as against an attaching creditor, does not appear.

"The decided weight of authority holds that he who purchases, for a valuable consideration, a certificate of stock, is protected in his ownership of the stock, and is not affected by a subsequent attachment or execution levied on such stock for the debts of the registered stockholder, even though such purchaser has neglected to have his transfer registered on the corporate books, thereby allowing his transferrer to appear to be the owner of the stock upon which the

their debtor. The court further says that the provision that no transfer of stock shall be valid until entered upon the books is designed for the security of the corporation itself, and of third persons taking transfers of the stock without notice of any prior equitable transfer. It relates to the transfer of the legal title, and not of any equitable interest in the stock subordinate to that title. As between the vendor and vendee, a transfer not in conformity to such provisions is good, and passes the equitable title, and divests the vendor of all interest in the stock. Black v. Zacharie, 3 How. 483, 11 L. ed. 690; Sibley v. Quinsigamond Nat. Bank, 133 Mass. 315.

An unrecorded transfer is good against a subsequent attaching creditor with notice. Bridge-water Iron Co. v. Lissberger, 116 U. S. 8, 29 L. ed. 557, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 241.

A statute providing that no pledge of stock shall be valid, except as against the pledgee and his personal representatives, unless it is consummated by actual transfer of the stock, is intended to protect persons dealing upon the faith of the apparent ownership of the stock in ignorance of the pledge, and is not available to one who has actual notice of the pledge at the time his rights accrue. Hotchkiss & U. Co. v. Union Nat. Bank, 15 C. C. A. 264, 37 U. S. App. 86, 68 Fed. 76. The court says it is a widely prevalent doctrine that, notwithstanding the generality of the language of statutes declaring that former liens and conveyances shall be void if not registered in conformity with the provisions of the statute as against subsequent purchasers, yet, seeing that the whole object of such provisions was to guard the subsequent purchaser against the transfers of which he had no notice, if the object of the statute had been subverted by actual knowledge of the fact, the prior transferee would be protected. And the court adds there is no reason why this should not be so. Such laws are not designed to accomplish so unjust a result as that a person having knowledge of a man's equities may defeat them by an act of his own taken with such knowledge.

A transfer without registration is invalid only as to parties mentioned in the statute. It is the protecting of bona fide creditors and of subsequent purchasers the statute contemplates, and the protection of those only in the event there is want of notice of a prior transfer or lien. Birmingham Trust & Sav. Co. v. Louisiana 67 L. R. A.

Nat. Bank, 99 Ala. 379, 20 L. R. A. 600, 13 So. 112.

The transfer will take precedence of the rights of an execution creditor, who, at the time of levying his execution, had notice of the transfer. Selma Bridge Co. v. Harris, 132 Ala. 179, 31 So. 508.

Under a statute providing that no transfer of stock shall be valid, except as between the parties thereto, until it is entered on the books of the corporation, a pledge not so entered is valid as against a subsequent attaching creditor of the pledgee with notice. Van Cise v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 4 Dak. 485, 33 N. W. 897. The court said this provision of the law contemplates a legal title and an equitable lien.

A transfer, although not on the books, is valid as against execution creditors with notice. Rogers v. New Jersey Ins. Co. 8 N. J. Eq. 167.

A provision in the by-laws that the stock shall be transferred only on the books of the corporation merely provides for notice to persons dealing with the stock; and, therefore, an attachment of the stock by one having notice that it had been pledged to another will give no rights as against him. Cheever v. Meyer, 52 Vt. 66.

Although to complete the transfer the statute requires its registry on the books of the company, an unregistered pledge is valid as against creditors with notice. White River Sav. Bank v. Capital Sav. Bank & T. Co. (Vt.) 59 Atl. 198.

Where the certificate provided that the shares were transferable only on the books of the corporation, and a transfer was made by the president of the corporation without any attempt to transfer the shares on the books, it was held that, since the evidence showed that the officers of the corporation had actual notice of the sale, the shares were not attachable by the corporation for the president's debt. Scripture v. Frankestown Soapstone Co. 50 N. H. 571. The court says that the ownership of the shares passes from the seller to the buyer by force of the contract of sale, and that the buyer's title, so far as the seller is concerned, attaches the moment this contract is fully consummated between them. The situation is similar to that of an unrecorded deed. It is difficult to suggest any reason for holding that actual notice of an unrecorded deed to a subsequent purchaser or attaching creditor shall be equivalent to a record, so far as the purchaser or creditor is concerned, which does not with equal force re-attachment or execution is levied." Cook, Corp. § 487. This author says it is so held in New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Delaware, Nebraska, Tennessee, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, Texas, and Washington, independently of any statute on the subject. In a large number of states the purchaser, in such case, is protected by statute. In still other states a purchaser does not acquire any right to the stock as against an attaching creditor of the debtor, unless it is transferred to him on the books of the company before levied upon. The difference in the decisions is attributable, for the most part, to the peculiar terms of the statutes of the several states bearing upon the question, and to differences in construction of like and similar statutes by the courts of different states. Where there is no statute expressly or impliedly forbidding a sale of stock without registration, it is generally, if not universally, held that the purchaser takes the legal title without a transfer of the stock on the books. Even in those jurisdictions in which the statute declares that the stock shall be transferable only on the books of the corporation, it is held that an unregistered transfer or assignment gives the purchaser a perfect equitable title as between him and the assignor, and any person claiming under the latter.

The reasoning of the court in Scripture v. Francestown Soapstone Co. 50 N. H. 571, on this subject seems to be in perfect consonance with the rules and principles upon quire a holding that actual notice to the attaching creditors of the shares of stock is equivalent, so far as his rights are concerned, to a transfer entered in due form on the books.

And that case was followed in Piper v. Hillard, 58 N. H. 198.

An attachment of stock not transferred on the books by one without notice, is good, but not if there was notice. Warren v. Brandon Mfg. Co. Cited in 52 Vt. 75.

In Campbell v. Woodstock Iron Co. 83 Ala. 351, 3 So. 369, the court, in considering the effect of a mortgage of stock without registering the transfer as between the parties, says that it may be void as against bona fide creditors or subsequent purchasers without notice.

To uphold the right of the transferee he must show that the attaching creditor actually had notice of the transfer. Ditney v. First Nat. Bank, 112 Ala. 391, 20 So. 476; Wetumpka Bridge Co. v. Kldd, 124 Ala. 242, 27 So. 431.

Statutory exception of person with notice.

The Alabama statute provides that when, by the charter or by-laws of a corporation, the transfer of stock is required to be made on the books of the corporation, no transfer of stock shall be valid as against bona fide creditors or purchasers without notice, except from the time such transfer shall be registered or made on the books of the corporation. Under that statute bona fide creditors are held to mean judgment creditors having a lien. So, when a sale is made under execution, the lien of which had attached before notice, actual or constructive, the purchaser, although having notice at the time of the purchase, will acquire a good title. Jones v. Latham, 70 Ala. 164.

Notice not effective.

In Ottumwa Screen Co. v. Stodghill, 103 Iowa, 437, 72 N. W. 669, where the certificates after transfer had been deposited with the bank, and the sheriff and attaching creditor had actual notice of the transfer when the attachment was levied, the court held that these matters were ineffectual to preserve the rights of the assignee. This ruling is placed upon the ground that the language of the statute is absolute, and that, no exception being made, the court can make none; and this ruling was followed in Hafr v. Burnell, 106 Fed. 280.

The Iowa court seems to have fallen into some inconsistency with itself in making that ruling, for, in Des Moines Loan & T. Co. v. Des 67 L. R. A.

Moines Nat. Bank, 97 Iowa, 668, 66 N. W. 914, it had held that a subsequent assignee with notice cannot take advantage of the fact that the former transfer was not regularly entered on the books of the company.

Where the object of a statute requiring transfers of corporate stock to be made with the county treasurer is to create publicity in corporate affairs, and to provide that no transfer shall be valid against creditors of a stockholder until it is so deposited, the fact that a creditor has notice of the transfer, which is not recorded, will not prevent his securing a title superior to that of the transferee. Scott v. Houpt (Ark.) 83 S. W. 1057. But it was held that such a statute was intended to deal with transfers, and not with pledges; and, therefore, that a creditor could secure no right as against the pledge. Masury v. Arkansas Nat. Bank, 35 C. C. A. 476, 93 Fed. 603, Reversing 87 Fed. 381, and Followed in Batesville Teleph. Co. v. Myer-Schmidt Grocer Co. 68 Ark. 115, 56 S. W. 784.

Notice to purchasers at sale.

The courts have, to some extent, failed to maintain the consistency of their theory in dealing with the effect of notice to purchasers at the execution sale. If the transfer without registry is void in favor of creditors without notice, it would seem that the moment when their rights attached was when their levy was made, and that notice after that time would be ineffectual as to their rights; and to preserve their rights, of course, anyone must be empowered to bid at the sale, whether he had notice or not. Yet some courts have held that notice to the attaching creditor, even after the levy, would prevent his proceeding with the sale.

In Colorado it was held that notice to an attaching creditor of an assignment and delivery of the certificates by the debtor to one who has neglected to procure a transfer on the books of the corporation, as required by statute, does not affect the rights secured by the attachment. First Nat. Bank v. Hastings, 7 Colo. App. 129, 42 Pac. 691.

That doctrine would seem to be consistent with the rule that an unrecorded transfer was void as against creditors without notice; but the majority of the courts have held the other way. From the inconsistency of such holdings it would seem that the courts must have felt which contracts and rights of property stand. The court said, in part: "It seems too clear for argument that the ownership of the shares passes from the seller to the buyer by force of the contract of sale, and not by operation of law; and, if that be so, the buyer's title, so far as the seller is concerned, attaches the moment this contract is fully consummated between them. This kind of property, being an intangible right, somewhat akin to the right to receive money due upon a bond or other chose in action, is incapable of actual manual delivery. All the seller can do, that corresponds at all to the delivery of personal chattels in other cases of sale, is to hand over to the buyer his certificate, with a sufficient assignment, by deed or otherwise, to entitle him to a transfer of the shares on the books of the company. When the seller has done this, his power and duty in the matter are ended, and it is at the option of the purchaser whether the transfer shall be recorded or not. If the purchaser omits to have the record made, he can claim no rights as a member of the corporation; and he also incurs the further risk of having his title defeated by a subsequent attachment or sale to a bona fide purchaser. It is difficult to see any substantial difference between the position of this plaintiff after the sale and assignment of the shares to him by . . . [the owner], and before a transfer was made on the books, and that of the grantee in a deed of land before his deed is recorded. In both cases the seller has parted with his the injustice of the rule making the title depend on the record, and attempted to avoid it by giving effect to notice received after the creditors' rights, if there could be any, had attached.

A by-law requiring transfers of stock to be upon the books of the corporation does not prevent a transfer of stock without registration on the books from being good as against an attachment creditor who receives notice of the transfer before the judicial sale, although he had no such notice at the time the execution was levied. Willson v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 108 Mo. 588, 32 Am. St. Rep. 624, 18 S. W. 286. The court says that the custom of the commercial world, which permits the transfer of title by mere indorsement and delivery of the certificates, should not be lightly disturbed by the courts.

An unrecorded transfer of stock conveys the interest of the holder, and is valid except as against persons having equities, and may be upheld as against a judgment creditor buying at an execution sale with notice of the transfer. Newberry v. Detroit & L. S. Iron Mfg. Co. 17 Mich. 141. Judge Cooley says the clause in the statute providing that transfers of stock shall not be valid, except as between the parties thereto, until duly entered upon the books of the corporation, is for the protection of parties having equities, and that it is very clear that a judgment creditor who buys with full knowledge can get by his levy and purchase nothing that the debtor himself could not claim.

And the correctness of that decision was recognized in Van Norman v. Circuit Judge, 45 Mich. 204, 7 N. W. 796.

One who purchases at an execution sale of stock with knowledge that it is pledged to a third person takes subject to the claims of the pledgee. Weston v. Bear River & A. Water & Min. Co. 6 Cal. 425.

One who purchases at execution sale with notice of a prior pledge of the stock acquires no title as against the rights of the pledgee. People ex rel. Mead v. Elmore, 35 Cal. 653.

A purchaser at execution sale with full notice of the defect in the title of the judgment debtor acquires no better title than his debtor had, and cannot compel a transfer of the stock against the protest of the true owner. Blakeman v. Puget Sound Iron Co. 72 Cal. 321, 13 Pac. 872.

A purchaser at execution sale of stock with notice that it has been pledged to a third person takes subject to the rights of the pledgee, although the pledge has not been entered on the books of the company. May v. Cleland, 117 Mich. 45, 44 L. R. A. 163, 75 N. W. 129. The court says an execution creditor has no prior equities; nor are we able to see that he has any existing equities in consequence of his levy. He has parted with no interest or right, and is in no worse condition by the failure of the levy than he was before. If his debtor has no title he can acquire none by the levy and sale of land the title to which upon the record stood in the debtor, but with which he had parted, or by a levy and sale of personal property in his possession, but to which he had no title.

A pledgee's rights are superior to those of a subsequent purchaser at execution sale with notice. George R. Barse Live Stock Co. v. Range Valley Cattle Co. 16 Utah, 59, 50 Pac. 630.

Where a transferee presented his certificates with a request to transfer them on the stock books, and the company refused to make the transfer, but had the stock attached for a debt of the original owner, the question arose as to the rights of the transferee against the company; but in the course of the opinion the court says it is not easy to see how the purchaser at the attachment sale can be made a bona fide purchaser, or can have acquired any right in the property of the transferee by an attachment against the transferor. Robinson v. National Bank, 95 N. Y. 637.

In Seligman v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 22 Fed. 30, the court, in overruling a demurrer to a bill which sought to protect from a transfer to purchasers at an execution sale stock in a corporation which was alleged to have been sold to a third person, said that, since it appeared that the judgment on which the execution had been issued had been improperly obtained, the bill sets out an equity which entitled complainants to be heard; but it further stated that it had not been inclined to pass upon the further question as to the rights of the execution purchaser, who purchased with knowledge that the stock had been transferred by the execution debtor.

IX. Persons not entitled to benefit of statutes.

The statutes requiring transfers of stock to be made on the books of the corporation are for the protection of bona fide purchasers and creditors, if of anyone besides the corporation it-title, and, as to him, the buyer has acquired it. It is only third persons in either case whose rights or interests are affected by the omission. In the case of an unrecorded deed the grantor continues to be clothed with evidence of ownership after the conveyance, very similar to that which remains with the seller of shares before the transfer has been entered on the books. The record shows that he is still the owner of the land, when in fact he is not; and, so far as any interest a creditor can have in the matter is concerned, the same is precisely true in the case of shares in a corporation, sold, but not transferred on the books. The statutes which we hold require the transfer of shares to be entered on the books of the corporation kept for that purpose are certainly no more explicit and absolute than that which requires the recording of deeds. The object of the law, so far as creditors are concerned, is the same in both cases. As between the parties the title passes by contract, and not by the record in both cases alike."

It is to be observed that the New Hampshire court holds that the statute making the stock transferable only on the books of the company is in the nature of a registration law for the benefit of purchasers and creditors, in consequence of which an unregistered purchase is not good against a subsequent attachment; but it does hold that, as between the parties, the equitable title passes, notwithstanding the statute. Many of the courts hold that under such a statute the legal title passes as between the par-self. Therefore there are persons who cannot take advantage of a failure to record.

Heirs and representatives of the pledgeor.

A transfer by delivery of the stock certificates without registry on the books of the corporation is sufficient to vest title in the transferee as against the personal representatives of the transferor. Reed v. Copeland, 50 Conn. 472, 47 Am. Rep. 663; Meredit Village Sav. Bank v. Marshall, 68 N. H. 417, 44 Atl. 526.

So a transfer on the books of the corporation is not necessary to perfect a gift of stock as against the claim of the heirs of the donor. Leyson v. Davis, 17 Mont. 220, 31 L. R. A. 429, 42 Pac. 775.

And a writ of error to review that case was dismissed in 170 U. S. 36, 42 L. ed. 939, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 500.

But where a bankruptcy assignee, to whom the right to shares of the bankrupt passes, neglects to secure a transfer, and subsequently the executrix of the bankrupt secures a transfer to herself upon declaration of loss of the shares, and sells them to a bona fide purchaser, the bankruptcy assignee is held to have lost his right. Re London & P. Teleg. Co. 39 L. J. Ch. N. S. 419, L. R. 9 Eq. 653, 23 L. T. N. S. 237, 18 Week. Rep. 597.

Rights as between unrecorded titles.

To defeat an outstanding equitable title the legal title of a subsequent transferee must be perfected. Roots v. Williamson, L. R. 38 Ch. Div. 485; Moore v. North Western Bank [1891] 2 Ch. 599.

If the title can be transferred only on the books of the company one who takes title without such transfer holds subject to all equities of prior transferees who have not recorded their transfers. Stebbins v. Phoenix F. Ins. Co. 3 Paige, 350.

Where the statute provided that shares should be transferable only by deed duly entered on the registry of transfers, and a transfer as collateral security was made, after which the original owner executed a blank transfer of the stock without producing the certificates to another person, and the question arose as to the better right, it was held that, since the second transferee did not acquire a legal title because his transfer was not by deed, or registered, his equity was inferior to the prior transfer, and must, therefore, give way to it. The later transfer having made the prior application for a transfer on the registry, the Earl of Selborne said the transfer was not accompanied by the certificates which, in corporations of this kind, are the proper (and, indeed, the only) documentary evidence of title in the possession of the shareholder, and which, according to the usual course of dealing with such shares, ought to come into the hands of the bona fide transferee for value. "The respondents, when they took their prior security, did obtain possession of those certificates; and on the face of each such certificate there was an engagement under the company's common seal that no transfer of any portion of the shares thereby represented should be registered without delivery of the certificate at the company's office." The later transferees knew they did not have the certificates, and that the corporation was entitled to insist on the production of them if they saw fit. They knew that their transfer was "of no value" for want of these certificates. Speaking of the equitable title, the Earl says the prior transferees "have the better equity, not on the ground of time alone, but on the merits of the case. They not only had the certificates, but they had the company's undertaking under seal that there should be no change of the registered title, unless those certificates were produced. What more could be necessary, on any reasonable or intelligible principle, to 'perfect' their equitable title, which they were under no obligation to convert into a legal title by registration?" Société Générale De Paris v. Walker, L. R. 11 App. Cas. 20.

And that case was followed in Ireland v. Hart [1902] 1 Ch. 522.

Rights of receivers and assignees for creditors.

Persons in whose hands the assets of a record owner are placed for benefit of his creditors are so closely limited to his actual property rights that the reason for the rule for making unregistered transfers void in favor of subsequent transferees has less application to their cases.

It has been held that, if the transfer is not entered on the books of the corporation as required by statute, the shares remain in the order and disposition of the pledgeor within the meaning of a statute making property in such condition pass to the assignee in bankruptcy. Ex parte Lancaster Canal Nav. Co. 1 Deacon & C. 411.

So in Ex parte Boulton, 1 DeG. & J. 163, ties, while only an equitable title passes as against the corporation and bona fide purchasers. Clark & M. Priv. Corp. § 586, p. 1785. "In states in which an unregistered transfer conveys the legal title to the shares, and not merely an equitable title, an unregistered transfer will necessarily convey a good title as against subsequent attaching or execution creditor of the transferor, whether the latter has notice of the transfer before his levy or not, unless the circumstances are such as to estop the transferee to set up his title, or the transfer is fraudulent as against the creditors of the transferor. In those jurisdictions in which it is held . . . that the legal title remains in the transferor, the courts have not agreed as to the effect of an unregistered transfer as against an attaching or execution creditor of the transferor." Clark & M. Priv. Corp. § 590, p. 1794. "If a transfer on the books of the corporation is not required by the charter or by-laws, nor by any general law, it is not necessary to give a transferee a perfect title. In such a case a transfer by delivery of the certificate of stock duly assigned, although not registered on the books of the corporation, will prevail in all jurisdictions over a subsequent attachment by a creditor of the transferor, whether he had notice of the transfer or not. And the same is true where registration of transfers is required by statute, not for all purposes, nor for the protection of creditors, but merely for the protection of the corporation and its credit-where the shares of stock had been deposited with a creditor as collateral security, but no notice given to the corporation, it was held that the pledge was invalid as against a subsequent bankruptcy assignee. The statute provided for the transfer of the stock on the books of the corporation, but, except as to the rights of the corporation itself, did not make such transfer essential; but Lord Justice Turner said that in his opinion all the requisites which are essential to mortgages of other choses in action must be observed, and that notice to the corporation was therefore necessary.

So in Nelson v. London Assur. Co. 2 Sim. & Stu. 292, where the shares had been assigned to the corporation to secure a debt, but no steps had been taken to deprive the owner of his title or interfere with his dividends, it was held that the shares were within his order and disposition within the provision of the bankruptcy law subjecting to the dominion of the bankruptcy assignee property of third persons which was within the order and disposition of the bankrupt.

But in Es parte Littledale, 6 De G. M. & G. 727, notice of the transfer of shares in pledge was given to the corporation, but the statute required the transfer to be made in a particular manner, which was not done. The transfer was upheld as against the bankruptcy assignee of the transferor. The lord chancellor says that he cannot yield to the argument that the statute says that the transfer shall be made in a particular manner only, and therefore that an assignment in any other way gives no right at all. He compares the statute to the requirement that transfer of real estate shall be made only in a particular manner, but with regard to which an equitable transfer may be made good as against subsequent creditors. Lord Justice Turner says that, under the statute, in order to entitle the bankruptcy assignee to the property, it must have been in the order and disposition of the bankrupt; and he states that it does not seem to him that it can be said that a man is in the possession of property with the consent of the true owner when the true owner has taken every step which it is within his power to take for the purpose of divesting the property from the person who becomes bankrupt. The effect of the notice given to the corporation was to take away from them the capacity of dealing with these shares.

books of the corporation as required by its by-laws, has a title superior to a subsequent assignee in bankruptcy of the transferor. The assignee under the bankrupt act, except as to property conveyed for the purpose of defrauding creditors and in violation of the provisions of the act, takes no greater right in the property than the bankrupt had at the time of filing his petition. Dickinson v. Central Nat. Bank, 129 Mass. 279, 37 Am. Rep. 351.

In Dudley v. Gould, 6 Hun. 97, a purchaser under a pledge was protected as against the claim of a receiver of the pledgee.

In Walker v. Detroit Transit R. Co. 47 Mich. 388, 11 N. W. 187, the court, without discussing the effect of failure to transfer the stock on the corporate books, gave effect to a title acquired under a blank assignment as against one subsequently acquired by a sale under a general assignment for creditors by the one in whose name the stock stood on the books of the corporation.

Where stock stood in the name of a trustee, who had assigned it to the cestui que trust, and who became bankrupt, his assignee claimed the stock, but the court held that, as the statute vested in the assignee all the property of the debtor which he could have lawfully sold, assigned, or conveyed, or which could have been taken on execution upon a judgment against him, the statute did not apply to property held in trust by him. Sibley v. Quinsigamond Nat. Bank, 133 Mass. 515.

To perfect the rights of the assignee for creditors all steps required by law must be taken.

Thus, in Richmondville Mfg. Co. v. Prall, 9 Conn. 492, it appeared that, although a by-law had been adopted prescribing the method of transferring the stock, it had never been acted upon in practice, and the contention was that, therefore, a good title had been acquired by a customary transfer as against an execution creditor of the transferor. The court said that a good title had been acquired as against the company, but that it was not necessary to determine the validity of the transfer against execution creditors, since the transfer was part of an assignment for creditors which had never been recorded as required by the statutes, and was therefore invalid as against attaching creditors.

X. Estoppel of pledgee.

The pledgee may, although he has secured a ors. 'It requires a clear provision of the charter itself, or of some statute,' said the Massachusetts court, 'to take from the owner of such property the right to transfer it in accordance with known rules of the common law. And by those rules the delivering of a stock certificate, with a written transfer of the same, to a bona fide purchaser, is a sufficient delivery to transfer the title as against a subsequent attaching creditor.'" Clark & M. Priv. Corp. § 590, p. 1798, Citing Boston Music Hall Asso. v. Cory, 129 Mass. 435. In the earlier Massachusetts cases, the contrary of this doctrine had been held, and, since the decision of the case just referred to, the legislature of that state has passed a statute conforming to the principles announced therein.

good title, estop himself by his conduct from asserting it against claims which subsequently accrue.

If the assignee permits an actual transfer on the books of the corporation under a title secured by execution sale against the assignor, he cannot recover damages against the corporation for failure to recognize his title. Littell v. Scrantom Gas & Water Co. 2 Luzerne Legal Obs. 82.

In Cumming v. Prescott, 2 Younge & C. Exch. 488, where shares were deposited as collateral security together with an order to transfer them to the name of the transferee, which was not used until after the death of the transferor, it was held that the claim was subordinate to that of creditors of the estate, on the ground that the circumstances were not sufficient to show an intention to create a lien on the shares. The court says, from the evidence it would be more consistent with the honor of the parties to conjecture that the pledgee was to hold the shares until something was to take place to give the pledgee a right to them. That no court of equity will, in the absence of all presumption consistent with a contract, interfere to conjecture a contract to be of such a nature that the parties intended that one of them should retain the possession and apparent ownership of property, and, when he becomes insolvent, the other should come forward to the prejudice of creditors and claim a specific security on the property by way of equitable mortgage.

In Noble v. Turner, 69 Md. 519, 16 Atl. 124, it is said that, as against third persons, an assignment of stock in pledge must be transferred on the books of the company. The transaction which became the basis of that controversy arose prior to the passage of the act of 1886. But the rights of the corporation were also involved in that case, since the shares had been transferred by the sheriff under an attachment levy, and the pledgee had permitted the transferee to act as stockholder for seven years without giving notice of his right. The court says, by reason of the laches of the pledgee, the corporation had been compelled to recognize the rights of the execution purchaser. As against the company the pledgee is clearly and conclusively estopped from asserting his claim. In equity a presumption exists against every stale claim. In this case there are no circumstances excusing or explaining the delay in asserting the pledgee's rights. There has been such delay

In Continental Nat. Bank v. Eliot Nat. Bank, 7 Fed. 369, holding that an unrecorded transfer of national bank stock will take precedence of a subsequent attachment in behalf of a creditor without notice, Lowell, J., delivering the opinion, discusses the question most lucidly and exhaustively, reviewing many of the authorities, both American and English. In speaking of the statutes concerning transfers of the shares upon the books of the company, he says: "No doubt it is sometimes intended as a record of persons liable for the debts of the company, and is so in the case of national banks; but the great weight of authority is that it is not intended for the benefit of creditors of the individual shareholders. Some of the courts hold that the unrecorded that at law an action of replevin, trover, or assumpsit would be barred by limitation, and, in the absence of any explanation, the pledgee is not entitled to relief in equity.

XI. Statutory recognition of transfers of certificates.

The custom of dealing with stocks by transferring the certificates is so general, and the inconvenience of requiring each transfer to be recorded is so great, that the legislatures have in some instances, even where the courts have held registry to be necessary, interposed to afford relief.

By the Wisconsin act of 1891 a delivery of stock with a written transfer of the same is sufficient to transfer the title as against all parties. H. W. Wright Lumber Co. v. Hixon, 105 Wis. 153, 80 N. W. 1110, 1135.

The Virginia statute (Code 1887, § 1133) provides that a delivery of the certificate properly indorsed shall vest title in the pledgee so far as may be necessary to effect the purpose of the pledge as between the parties and against creditors and subsequent purchasers of the pledgee. Downing v. Thompson (Va.) 48 S. E. 506.

And the same statute is in force in West Virginia. Donally v. Hearndon, 41 W. Va. 519, 23 S. E. 646.

In 1884 (act 1884, chap. 229) the Massachusetts legislature provided that the delivery of a stock certificate to a bona fide purchaser or pledgee for value received, together with a written transfer of the same, or a power of attorney to transfer, should be a sufficient delivery to transfer the title as against all parties. The court says this enactment was a new departure, and a change of policy in the legislature of this commonwealth. Prior to that statute no purchaser of stock could be sure that his title was good against possible attachments without an examination of the books of the corporation; nor could he be protected against attachments that might be made subsequently, unless he recorded his transfer immediately. By the statute of 1884 the certificate is treated as evidence of title. The assignment is to be made by the owner of the certificate, and the transfer of the certificate transfers the title. The transfer of the certificate transfers the title as against all persons, including attaching creditors. Clews v. Friedman, 182 Mass. 555, 66 N. E. 201.

transfer passes only an equitable title; others, that it gives a legal title. I assume that by the decisions in the courts of the United States only an equitable title is acquired. That point is unimportant." Again, he says, at page 371: "It is a general rule that creditors, whether they proceed by an attachment on mesne process, seizure on execution, creditor's bill, or through an assignee in bankruptcy, must take their debtor's property subject to all equitable as well as legal charges, liens, or opposing titles. Willes, J. in giving judgment in the Queen's bench in 1868, in a case quite analogous to this, against the right of seizing shares of the apparent owner, said that it was a rule applied by that court more than a hundred years before, in the analogous case of the statutory execution under the bankrupt law, that the creditors can have no more than a debtor was entitled to in equity or at law. Pickering v. Ilfracombe R. Co. L. R., 3 C. P. 235, 231. It has been the law of the lord mayor's court in London, from the time of Richard I. that an equitable assignment of a chose in action should prevail against an attachment. Westoby v. Day, 2 El. & Bl. 605. This application of the rule obtains in Massachusetts, and in the United States generally, though a few courts hold otherwise." It is proper to say here that it is the rule in this state. Neill v. Rogers Bros. Produce Co. 41 W. Va. 37, 58, 23 S. E. 702; Wall v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 52 W. Va. 485, 492, 64 L. R. A. 501, 94 Am. St. Rep. 948, 44 S. E. 294; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. McCullough, 12 Gratt. 595.

Except in those cases in which a statute is held to have inhibited any transfer except on the books of the company, the delivery of the certificate with an assignment to the transferee passes either a legal or an equitable title to the shares; but, in this case no certificates appear to have been issued, and there was no delivery of any certificate between the parties. The only evidence of the assignment is a written instrument not under seal, purporting to make over, transfer, and assign, for a valuable consideration, the shares therein described. Is this sufficient to pass any title? The shares exist independently of any certificate. They are a species of incorporeal property. "A share certificate is merely the paper representative of an incorporeal right, and stands on a footing similar to that of other muniments of title. It is not in itself property, but is merely the symbol or paper evidence of property; hence the proprietary right may exist without a certificate." 10 Cyc. Law & Proc. 588. "This legal relation, and proprietary interest on which it is based, are quite independent of the certificate of ownership, which is mere evidence of title. The complete fact of title may very well exist without it." Mr. Justice Matthews, in Cecil Nat. Bank v. Watsontown Bank, 105 U. S. 217, 222, 26 L. ed. 1039, 1042. "Millions of dollars of capital stock are held without any certificate, or, if certificates are made out, without their ever being delivered. A certificate is authentic evidence of title to stock; but it is not the stock itself, nor is it necessary to the existence of the stock. [Crumlish v. Shenandoah Valley R. Co. 40 W. Va. 627, 22 S. E. 90.] It certifies to a fact which exists independently of itself. And an actual subscription is not necessary. There may be a virtual subscription, deducible from the acts and conduct of the party." Mr. Justice Bradley, in Pacific Nat. Bank v. Eaton, 141 U. S. 227, 234, 35 L. ed. 702, 704, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 984. Other cases to the same effect are First Nat. Bank v. Gifford, 47 Iowa, 575; Brigham v.

Under the Massachusetts act of 1884 a transfer of certificates with a written assignment thereon to the true owner, by one who had obtained the stock for a special purpose, is good as against a subsequent attaching creditor of the latter, in whose name the stock stands on the books of the company. Andrews v. Worcester. N. & R. R. Co. 159 Mass. 64, 33 N. E. 1109.

The Maryland statute of 1886, chap. 287, provides that all executions or attachments levied on the stock standing in the name of the debtor shall only affect the interest which defendant had in the stock at the time of levying the writ, and shall not affect the right or interest of any bona fide purchaser or pledgee for value who has received a delivery of the certificate representing the stock with a power of attorney to transfer the same. Morton v. Grafflin, 68 Md. 545, 13 Atl. 341, 15 Atl. 208.

After the amendment of the Illinois statute governing executions so as to provide that shares of stock should not be taken on execution when sold or pledged for a valuable consideration, the delivery of stock as collateral security for a loan is good as against third persons having actual or constructive notice of the transfer, although the transfer is not entered on the books of the company. Rice v. Gilbert, 173 Ill. 348, 50 N. E. 1087. The court says the current of decisions in the commercial states is to make shares of stock as nearly negotiable as possible, and such was the intention of the legislature in changing the statute.

The court affirmed Rice v. Gilbert, 72 Ill. App. 649, where it had been said that a delivery of the certificates of stock in good faith to one who advances money on the security thereof is sufficient to protect the holder as against executions or attachments against the pledgee to the extent of the debt such stock is given to secure, even though there is no transfer on the books of the company.

A pledge of stock by delivery with notice to the company passes the title as against a subsequent execution levied upon it as the property of the pledgee. Alderton v. Conger, 78 Ill. App. 333.

Mead, 10 Allen, 245; Curtis v. Crossley, 59 N. J. Eq. 358, 361, 45 Atl. 905; Agricultural Bank v. Burr, 24 Me. 256; Rio Grande Cattle Co. v. Burns, 82 Tex. 50, 56, 17 S. W. 1043.

A share of stock being an incorporeal right, incapable of manual delivery, and the certificate being nothing more than evidence of its existence and of title to the share in the holder, it is obvious it may be assigned without a certificate, and in the mode adopted by the defendant here and his transferee; but for this there is authority. "Subscription rights in a proposed corporation need not be evidenced by written instrument in any particular form, but may be established by parol. . . . A subscription right in a proposed corporation is assignable by parol, and ownership passes immediately on consummation of the sale, and by force thereof, and not by operation of law." Manchester Street R. Co. v. Williams, 71 N. H. 312, 52 Atl. 461. A certificate of stock is important for many purposes, but not for the purpose of a transfer as between parties. Id. 71 N. H. 315, 52 Atl. 464; Brigham v. Mead, 10 Allen, 245; Field v. Pierce, 102 Mass. 253, 261; Rio Grande Cattle Co. v. Burns, 82 Tex. 56, 17 S. W. 1043; Baker v. Wasson, 53 Tex. 150; Agricultural Bank v. Burr, 24 Me. 256, 267; Curtis v. Crossley, 59 N. J. Eq. 358, 361, 45 Atl. 905.

As, by the assignment or transfer from the debtor to his transferee, evidenced by the informal written instrument executed and delivered by the former to the latter, title to the stock, legal or equitable, passed, what is the status of that title as against the attaching creditor, assuming that it is only the equitable title? In addition to the authorities already noted as maintaining its superiority to the attachment lien, the following is quoted from that latest and invaluable work, Cyclopedia of Law and Procedure, vol. 4, p. 632: "The rights of a creditor to property attached must be determined by the state of the title at the time the attachment was made, and, in the absence of fraud and statutory regulations, he only obtains the rights which the debtor had in the property at that time, for the creditor is not in the position of a bona fide purchaser." The rule applies where the debtor holds title to property subject to a valid outstanding charge or lien, whether the lien arises by agreement of parties, by operation of law, or a prior garnishment. Id. 633. The only exception to the rule, independent of statute, is that of the participation of the adverse claimant in the fraudulent purpose of the debtor, in which connection it is to be noted that, in the case of a sale of personal property, retention of possession by the seller is strong evidence of fraud, when the sale obstructs the rights of a creditor. Id. 635. It makes the sale prima facie fraudulent. Davis v. Turner, 4 Gratt. 422; Forkner v. Stuart, 6 Gratt. 198; Danco v. Seaman, 11 Gratt. 778; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Glenn, 28 Md. 287, 324, 92 Am. Dec. 688. What effect this rule of evidence is to have is an inquiry which more properly arises on the question of the validity of the sale, to be disposed of in a subsequent portion of this opinion.

As a rule, those courts which hold an unregistered transfer not good, as against the creditors of the transferor, do not put it upon the ground that the presence of the shares on the books of the corporation in the name of the transferor, after the sale, is tantamount to the retention of the possession of tangible personal property after sale, and is therefore evidence of fraud. The supreme court of New Hampshire, in Pinkerton v. Manchester & L. R. Co. 42 N. H. 424, and in Scripture v. Francess town Soapstone Co. 50 N. H. 571, puts it partially upon that ground. In the former case the court said that the legislature had made plain its intention that the entry upon the stock record should be the appropriate indication of ownership, as it had made provision in regard to returns of stock by the clerks or treasurers for the purposes of taxation, private liability, and attachment, and, in the case of manufacturing corporations, had ordained by express provision that a transfer of stock should avail nothing against an attachment until entered upon the corporation records. Whether, in the absence of such statute, the court would have arrived at the same conclusion, nobody can tell, but there is no reason to assume that it would. In 1887 the legislature of that state made an unregistered transfer good against an attachment. Laws 1887, chap. 16, p. 417. In Connecticut the original idea was that no title, either legal or equitable, could pass by a transfer unless recorded on the books of the corporation. Marlborough Mfg. Co. v. Smith, 2 Conn. 579; Northrop v. Newton & B. Turnp. Co. 3 Conn. 544; Northrop v. Curtis, 5 Conn. 246; Oxford Turnp. Co. v. Bunnell, 6 Conn. 552. This position, however, was abandoned in Colt v. Ives, 31 Conn. 25, 81 Am. Dec. 161, propounding the quære whether, by an unregistered transfer, an equitable title passed, and holding that, if so, it was not good against an attaching creditor unless the transferee did all he could to have the transfer made before the attachment was levied. The statutes of Connecticut seem not to have been so rigid in their requirements in respect to the registration of stock as those of New Hampshire. The court, in the case last cited, after referring to the rule that possession of tangible property is an indication of ownership, says: "So, in respect to the assignment of ordinary choses in action, there must be notice of the assignment to the debtor,—the assignment conveying but an equitable interest in the thing, and notice to a trustee being in equity the ordinary and only practicable mode in which an assignee can protect his interest. And in the case of the purchase of stock in a corporation there must be such a transfer of it as the legislature in the charter or by statute prescribes; and notice of the assignment of choses in action, and the transfer required by statute of corporate stock, stand in lieu of the taking and retaining of the possession of personal chattels sold, being the only possession the nature of the property admits of." As to choses in action, this is good law when applied to the case of a subsequent purchaser for value and without notice. But is it good law as to a creditor whose rights rise no higher than those of his debtor? That it is not considered sound, even in Connecticut, is evidenced by later decisions of that court. In Mowry v. Hawkins, 57 Conn. 453, 18 Atl. 784, the court said: "In the absence of fraud, stock may stand in the name of one which belongs to another, without being liable to attachment for the debts of the nominal owner. This must be so as to all creditors who have not been misled or deceived by it, and as to those who are advised as to the true state of the title." This proposition was referred to in Skiff v. Stoddard, 63 Conn. 198, 21 L. R. A. 102, 26 Atl. 874, 28 Atl. 104, as established Connecticut law. In New York Commercial Co. v. Francis, 28 C. C. A. 199, 51 U. S. App. 663, 83 Fed. 769, the proposition is applied as sound Connecticut law; the court saying in its opinion: "It is one which we are satisfied is in accordance with the general rule and with the principles of justice, unless the equitable owner is prevented by an estoppel from showing the truth, or there has been some illegality or violation of a statutory requirement." In Alabama an unregistered transfer is not good against an attachment, because the statute expressly declares that the holder of stocks in corporations must have the same transferred on the books of the company within fifteen days, else the same shall be void as to bona fide creditors and subsequent purchasers without notice. In Arkansas the statute gives precedence to the attachment unless a certificate of transfer is filed with the county clerk. In California, Colorado, and New Mexico the statute declares that no transfer of stock shall be valid for any purpose whatever until entered on the corporate books. 67 L. R. A.

In Indiana the attachment prevails because the statute declares that stock shall be transferable on the corporate books, and not otherwise. In Iowa the statute says transfers shall not be valid, except as between the parties, until a registry is had on the corporate books. See Cook, Corp. § 49, note 5. In Vermont the statutes were much like those of New Hampshire when Cheever v. Meyer, 52 Vt. 66, was decided, and the decision was rested wholly upon statutory grounds, treating the statutes as registration laws for the protection of creditors and subsequent purchasers without notice. The early cases in Massachusetts, giving precedence to the attachment, rested upon the same ground. In Fisher v. Essex Bank, 5 Gray, 373, holding that shares in a bank whose charter provides that they shall "be transferable only at the banking house and on its books" cannot be transferred in any other way, so as to give the transferee a good title against a creditor of the vendor who attaches them without notice of the transfer, the decision was based wholly upon the statute. As before stated, this rule has been overturned in that state by a statute. Before the passage of the statute, the court, in Dickinson v. Central Nat. Bank, 129 Mass. 279, 37 Am. Rep. 351, in construing the United States statute concerning national banks, which did not say the stock was transferable only on the books of the bank, although the by-laws of the corporation did say so, held that an unregistered transfer must prevail over an attachment in favor of a creditor of the transferor.

The proposition asserted in Colt v. Ives, 31 Conn. 35, 81 Am. Dec. 161, the soundness of which has been hereinbefore questioned, is the doctrine asserted in Dearle v. Hall, 3 Russ. Ch. 1, and confirmed in Foster v. Cockerell, 3 Clark & F. 466, to the effect that, of two innocent purchasers of a merely equitable interest, he shall be preferred who first gives notice to the trustee or holder of the legal title. The Connecticut court seems to have treated a creditor as standing on the same footing as a purchaser for value without notice. The fallacy and unsoundness of it is clearly shown in the opinion in Continental Nat. Bank v. Eliot Nat. Bank, 7 Fed. 369, 375. Lowell, J., said: "(1) Though the corporation is for some purposes a trustee for the shareholders, the latter have an independent legal property in their shares which they can convey, and whether their actual conveyance is legal or equitable is of no consequence. (2) The doctrine applies in England only to purchasers, and not to creditors seizing or attaching, even though a statute gives a right to seize all shares standing in the debtor's name in his own right. This statute was once held by the Queen's bench to mean that the creditor might seize what the register showed to be apparently the property of the debtor (Watts v. Porter, 3 El. & Bl. 743); but this has been overruled on the ground that the legislature cannot be supposed to have intended to take one man's property for another man's debt, without the most explicit statement of such a purpose; and therefore the 'right' refers to the equitable as well as legal right. Dunster v. Glengall, 3 Ir. Ch. Rep. 47; Scott v. Hastings, 4 Kay & J. 633; Beaven v. Oxford, 6 De G. M. & G. 524; Eyre v. McDowell, 9 H. L. Cas. 619; Robinson v. Nesbitt, L. R. 3 C. P. 264; Pickering v. Ilfracombe R. Co. L. R. 3 C. P. 235; Gill v. Continental Union Gas Co. L. R. 7 Exch. 332. A few courts in this country have carried the doctrine of Dearle v. Hall so far as to uphold the garnishment of a non-negotiable debt which had been equitably assigned without notice. We have already seen that this is not the law in England nor in Massachusetts. Neither is it the law of the United States generally. Drake, Attachm. chap. 24; Cornick v. Rickards, 3 Lea, 1. The supreme court of Tennessee in that case refused to extend the rule to shares of stock, though it applies in that state to choses in action. As shares are not choses in action, and as attaching creditors are not purchasers, Dearle v. Hall is not in point."

We have a statute on this subject, and it does not extend the principle so as to protect creditors. Assignees of choses in action are required to allow all just discounts, not only against themselves, but against the assignor, before the defendant had notice of the assignment. Code 1899, chap. 99, § 14. Discounts are not the debts of the assignor or assignee.

Another statute gives the right to any person to set up against an attachment any interest in, or lien upon, the property attached which he may have, without regard to notice. Code 1899, chap. 106, § 23; First Nat. Bank v. Harkness, 42 W. Va. 156, 32 L. R. A. 408, 24 S. E. 548; Crim v. Harmon, 38 W. Va. 596, 18 S. E. 753.

This inquiry as to the grounds upon which some of the courts give precedence to an attachment over an unregistered transfer results in the conclusion that they put it upon the statutes either authorizing or requiring transfer to be made on the books of the corporation, some of them adopting the view that, as there can be no visible change of the possession of a share, the legislature intended the record to take the place of visible possession, by way of analogy to the common-law rule relating to tangible property, and others adopting the view that the statutory provision is in the nature of a registration law for the protection of the public. It has been shown that, where the former theory was adopted, it has either been abandoned or displaced by statutes. Moreover, there never was any basis for the assumption of legislative intent to require recorded evidence of ownership of shares, when the statute did not make the record a public one. It might as well be assumed that some record ought to show who owns other choses in action, evidenced by notes, bonds, and other obligations. The latter has been almost universally condemned as imputing to the legislature an intent not warranted by the language of the statute or the nature of its subject-matter. Of it, Thomp. Corp. § 2411, says: "But this view, which makes the stock and transfer books public records, open to the inspection of the public, is plainly untenable unless the statute law (as it does in some states) obliges the corporation to expose such records to the inspection of the public. Otherwise, they are strictly private records, sustaining no analogy to the records of transfers of title required to be made and kept in public recording offices; and even these last records import no notice except in those cases where the statute law expressly so provides."

Our statute, viewed in the light of the foregoing authorities and principles, affords no ground for a conclusion that an attachment in favor of a creditor of a transferrer will prevail over the title, be it legal or equitable, of a transferee, when the transfer is not entered upon the transfer book of the corporation. It does not say the stock shall be transferable only on the books of the corporation. It is silent as to what shall constitute a transfer. The provisions relating to transfer are found in §§ 21, 22, and 35-38, of chapter 53, of the Code of 1899. The last-mentioned section has no important bearing upon this question, and the others read as follows:

"21. A transfer book shall be kept by the corporation in which the shares shall be assigned under such regulations, if there be any, as may have been prescribed by the by-laws.

"22. No share shall be transferred without the consent of the board of directors, until the same is fully paid up, or security given to the satisfaction of the board for the residue remaining unpaid. And where bond and security have been given to the corporation for any sum remaining unpaid upon stock, no transfer shall affect the validity of such bond and security."

"35. The board of directors may cause to be issued, if demanded, to any person appearing on the books of the corporation to be the owner of any shares of its stock, a certificate therefor, under the corporate seal to be signed by the president and such other officer, if any, as the board may direct; which certificate shall show the amount paid on each share.

"36. A stockholder to whom such certificate has been issued shall not be allowed to transfer the shares therein mentioned, or any part thereof, without delivering up the said certificate to the corporation to be canceled, unless the same be lost or destroyed, or sufficient cause be shown to the satisfaction of the board of directors why it cannot be produced.

"37. If any person, for valuable consideration, sell, pledge, or otherwise dispose of any shares belonging to him to another, and deliver to him the certificate for such shares, with a power of attorney authorizing the transfer of the same on the books of the corporation, the title of the former shall vest in the latter so far as may be necessary to effect the sale, pledge, or other disposal of the said shares, not only as . . . against the creditors of, and subsequent purchaser from, the former, but subject, nevertheless, to the provisions contained in the 19th section of this chapter."

It is to be observed that no certificates of stock are required to be issued unless demanded by some person appearing on the books of the corporation to be the owner of the shares. While a certificate, when issued, is generally deemed by the courts to be a muniment of title, our legislature, not deeming it essential to the existence of the shares, nor expedient on the ground of public policy, has failed to require corporations to issue them, unless demanded. The demand may be made by any person appearing on the books of the corporation to be the owner of the shares. He is an owner before he acquires a certificate. The certificate is clearly only evidence of title, which exists without it and independently of it. He may exercise his own pleasure about taking a certificate. If he does accept one, however, then he is placed under restrictions as to the mode of transfer, imposed by § 36, and his transferee is given special protection by § 37. These two sections will be further discussed later on. They clearly do not inhibit a transfer without a certificate, for they only relate to stockholders who have taken certificates, and a stockholder is not bound to take a certificate in order to complete his title. They clearly do not cover the whole subject of transfer. Section 22 imposes no conditions upon the exercise of the right to transfer, except that, if a share is not fully paid up, no transfer of it shall be made without the consent of the board of directors, unless security for the residue remaining unpaid, 67 L. R. A. satisfactory to the board, be given. If the board of directors consent, it may be transferred, although not paid up nor any security given. If it is paid up, consent of the board of directors is not necessary, and the owner of it may sell it at his pleasure.

Section 21 requires the corporation to keep a transfer book "in which the shares shall be assigned under such regulations, if there be any, as may have been prescribed by the by-laws." This, no doubt, means that the names of the shareholders, together with the number of shares owned by them, respectively, shall be recorded in the book kept for that purpose, but it does not mean that the entry in that book shall be necessary to pass the title. It does not say so, and nothing but a strained construction of it could make it mean that. Nowhere in our corporation laws does it appear that any of the records required to be kept are in any sense public records. Section 43 of chapter 53 requires a list of the stockholders, showing the number of shares and votes to which each is entitled, to be hung up in the most public room at the principal office or place of business of the corporation, for one month before every annual meeting of the stockholders. Section 47 of the same chapter declares that the funds, books, correspondence, and papers of the corporation shall be at all times subject to the inspection of the board of directors or committee thereof, appointed for the purpose, or of any committee appointed for the purpose by a general meeting of the stockholders. No provision appears to give to the individual stockholder, much less a creditor of his, a creditor of the corporation, or a wholly disinterested person, the right of inspection at all times or at any time. The board of directors is required by § 46 of chapter 53 to make a report to the stockholders at the annual meeting, showing the condition of the corporation, and then declares that "the board shall furnish to each stockholder requiring it, a true copy of such report, together with a list of the stockholders and their places of residence." By § 47 of chapter 53, every stockholder has a limited right of inspection. It is only for thirty days before the annual meeting of stockholders, and extends, not to the "property and funds, books, correspondence, and papers of the corporation," but only to "the minutes of the resolutions and proceedings" of the board of directors.

Not a word appears in any of the provisions just discussed from which it can reasonably be inferred that they were intended by the legislature to vest in the general public, as creditors or otherwise, any rights by which the transfer of shares is in any way impeded or restricted. But when §§

35, 36, and 37 of chapter 53 apply, it may be different. Whether Condon ever took any certificates for the shares in question does not appear. As he could hold the shares and transfer them without certificates, the court cannot assume that he held them otherwise. However, as the construction of these sections may be deemed to have some bearing upon the question now under consideration, certain purposes which they seem to have been intended to serve will be mentioned. Judge Holt, speaking for this court in Donnelly v. Hearndon, 41 W. Va. 519, 23 S. E. 646, after quoting §§ 19 and 37 of chapter 53, said: "The manifest purpose of the statute is to permit the corporation to go by its books in ascertaining who is the owner of stock, and not require it to go out on the street and hunt them up.

. . . Evidently, one of the objects of our statute cited above was to free banks and other corporations from the danger of such loose and unreliable evidence of notice of ownership of stock, by authorizing them, in their multitudinous details of affairs, to go by their books in determining the ownership of stock, in paying dividends, so long as they are acting in good faith and with reasonable care."

Sections 36 and 37 do not apply unless a certificate has been issued. That certificate is evidence against the corporation of the existence of the share and its ownership. As long as it is out of the possession of the corporation, it is a continuing affirmation by the corporation of the title and interest of the person to whom it was issued. 10 Cyc. Law & Proc. 590. A transfer made on the books of the corporation of the shares represented by the outstanding certificate might operate as a fraud upon the rights of an innocent purchaser of the stock. They are assignable, and are sometimes said to be quasi negotiable instruments, though they are not really negotiable in the true sense of the term. 10 Cyc. Law & Proc. 590. Nor are they generally held to be securities in the legal sense of the term (10 Cyc. Law & Proc. 590); but they are largely so used, and our statute (§ 37) makes them evidence of complete title as between the parties to the sale and of a valid pledge when they are so used. To allow a transfer on the books of the company, inconsistent with the rights evidenced by the outstanding certificate, would produce confusion and open the door to fraud. To this extent the legislature may have intended to protect the public against fraudulent transfers on the books when certificates are outstanding; but the corporation and all its stockholders, whether holding certificates for their shares or not, have a deep interest in the subject. "The corporation has a dangerous duty to perform when stock has been attached or sold under levy of execution, and a registry is requested by the purchaser at such sale or by a purchaser of the outstanding certificate of stock. Cook, Corp. § 489.

Whether intended for the protection of the public as well as the corporation, or not, it seems clear that § 36 inhibits only a transfer upon the books of the corporation without a surrender of the certificate, and does not further restrict the power of the owner of the shares over them. It compels the officers to keep the record of shares consistent with the outstanding certificates of shares, so that neither the corporation, holders of stock, nor purchasers of shares can be prejudiced or endangered by any evidence of title made by the corporation itself.

The holder of a certificate being thus protected from any injurious action at the office of the company, his transferee of that certificate, whether purchaser or pledgee, is also protected both from the acts of the corporation by said § 36, and also from the acts of the transferor and all persons claiming under him, whether as purchasers or creditors, by the provisions of § 37, declaring that, if any person sell, pledge, or otherwise dispose of, any shares belonging to him to another, and deliver to him the certificate for such shares, with a power of attorney authorizing the transfer of the same on the books of the corporation, the title of the former shall vest in the latter so far as may be necessary to effect the sale, pledge, or other disposal of said shares, not only as between the parties themselves, but also as against the creditors of, and subsequent purchasers from, the former. Is there a word in the three sections by which any intent to confer any new rights upon the creditor of a stockholder is manifested? Because § 37 says the delivery of the certificate, together with a power of attorney, shall effect a complete sale or pledge as between the parties, and as to subsequent purchasers from, and creditors of, the transferor, does it follow that, without such delivery, the transferee, under a purchase for value and without fraud, would not have a title superior to the claim of a creditor of the transferor under a subsequent attachment or execution, or of a subsequent purchaser who has not himself acquired the certificate? Suppose the certificate is lost or destroyed, or not within reach when the owner of the shares represented by it wishes to pledge or sell them, and the purchaser or pledgee is willing to part with his money on the faith of a simple instrument of writing, purporting to assign the shares; can this not be done, subject to the rights of any third party who may obtain the certificate? Not a word in the statute asserts the contrary. Is it to be implied? Restrictions upon the right to make contracts are not, often so established. The statute only declares what shall be the effect of making a transfer in a particular manner, leaving the parties to be governed by the general principles of law and equity, if they make it in any other way. If the transfer be made in the manner indicated, the transferee need show nothing but the certificate and power of attorney to establish a perfect title as against everybody, but the corporation. Without the certificate and power of attorney he would be required to show when, under what circumstances, and for what sum of money or other valuable consideration, he became the owner. It is obvious that, unless § 36, or some other provision of the statute, is to be regarded as a registration law for the protection of the public, who have no access to the books of the company, these sections are intended only to protect the corporation and those who claim under the certificates of stock. That neither § 36 nor any other section of chapter 53 is a public registration statute is made plain by what has been said in former parts of this opinion. That being true, the mode of sale mentioned in § 37 relates only to the matter of registering the transfer on the books of the corporation, for its protection and that of holders of the certificate. These observations on §§ 35, 36, and 37 of chapter 53 are only made for the purpose of showing that nothing in them conflicts with the conclusion reached respecting the status of an unregistered transfer, under our statutes, when no certificate is involved, and are not to be taken as constituting a binding judicial construction of the provisions of said sections. Shares of corporation stock can only exist by virtue of a statute. Our statute, as shown, makes them property, and vests the subscribers with title before any certificate is issued, and does not require one to be issued. Owning the share without a certificate, he may sell it without one, or with one, at his election. The sale in this case was of stock for which no certificate had been issued. The jus disponendi is an incident of ownership. 10 Cyc. Law & Proc. 577. And it may be exercised in any way not prohibited by the law. As our statute does not prescribe any mode of sale when no certificate has been issued, the owner may dispose of his share in such manner as would suffice to pass his title to any other chose in action or intangible property. The delivery of a written instrument assigning the property is clearly a symbolic delivery, if any delivery is necessary in such case.

for materials, for rent, or for any other chose in action, not evidenced by writing or acknowledgment of the debtor, may be assigned by a writing such as was signed and delivered in this case, purporting to assign the shares in question. Why is it not sufficient in this case? There can be no substantial, nor even a plausible, technical reason, as has been shown by authorities as well as by the provisions of the statute, making possible the existence of this kind of property.

In Fisher v. Essex Bank, 5 Gray, 373, holding that the statutory mode of transfer was exclusive, the statute having said shares were transferable only on the books of the bank and at the banking house, the court said: "Before any method was established by positive law, how, by what mode, or by what precise and definite act, such property should be considered as ceasing to be the property of the seller and becoming the property of the purchaser, courts of justice might well resort to the common-law modes of transferring similar incorporeal interests, and hold that a delivery of the only muniment of title held by the owner, with the execution and delivery of an assignment of his interest, by indorsement on the certificate or otherwise, should by analogy be held to be a valid transfer, and, when notified to the bank, should be considered as having taken effect at the date of such delivery."

As before demonstrated, the notice is only required as against subsequent purchasers.

Having no doubt about the sufficiency of the transfer to vest title in the transferee, nor as to the superiority of that title, equitable though it may be, over the attachment lien, if acquired for value and without fraud, nothing remains to be determined but the question whether the purchase was for value and in good faith.

At a sale under a decree made by the circuit court of the United States for the district of West Virginia, in May, 1890, Levi Z. Condon became the purchaser of 66,000 acres, or more, of wild lands, situated in Randolph and other counties, which sale was confirmed July 1, 1890. On the 20th day of December, 1894, it appearing to the court that Condon had theretofore paid into the registry of the court the balance of purchase money, and had by deeds dated March 25, 1892, and April 1, 1892, conveyed to the Condon Lane Boom & Lumber Company, a corporation, the said lands, it was ordered that the same be conveyed to said company, and it was accordingly done. At about the time of Condon's conveyance to the Condon Lane Boom & Lumber Company, or shortly before that time, he owned a mill on Dry Fork river, at Bretz, some miles below the timber lands and was trying to devise some way of getting the timber down to that point, and desired to sell the hemlock bark on the lands, and with the proceeds construct, or aid in constructing, a railroad up said river to these lands. H. Stowell says Condon employed him in June, 1902, to find a purchaser for the bark, agreeing to pay him $5,000 for his services upon the consummation of the sale, and that afterwards, in February, 1894, a sale of the bark to the United States Leather Company, at the price of $65,000, was effected as a result of his services in exploring the land, estimating the value of the bark, and furnishing information to the purchaser. The sale was made in February, 1894, and Stowell assigned his claim for the $5,000 to P. Lipscomb, who in December, 1898, proceeded against Condon in equity as a nonresident, serving the order of attachment on the Condon Lane Boom & Lumber Company, as garnishee, and that company answered, admitting that according to its books Condon was the apparent owner of 1,300 shares of common stock and 1,250 shares of its preferred stock. Later, Albert N. Horner filed his petition, claiming to have purchased and paid for all of said stock long before the service of the order of attachment, and to have owned it at the time of said service, and still to be the owner of it. Jeff Lipscomb, administrator of P. Lipscomb, in whose name the suit was revived, said P. Lipscomb having died after instituting the suit, filed an answer denying that there had been any valid purchase of the stock by Horner, and charging that no valuable consideration passed from him for the stock; that the same was placed in the hands of Horner by Condon "for the sole and express purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding the said plaintiff" out of the collection of said debt, as well as other creditors. He was informed and believed that no assignment or transfer of the stock had been made until after the sending out of the attachment, and that then Condon and Horner conceived and executed a plan to defeat the collection of the debt, by transferring the stock after the service of the writ, and dating the transfer back, "in order to give the said pretended transfer a semblance of having been done for a valuable consideration," all of which said transaction was intended to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of the said Condon, and especially "this plaintiff."

As no replication to this answer was filed, and no depositions were taken on the subject-matter thereof after it was filed, it is insisted, upon the authority of Snyder v. Martin, 17 W. Va. 276, 41 Am. Rep. 670; 67 L. R. A.

Bierne v. Ray, 37 W. Va. 571, 16 S. E. 804; and Findlay v. Smith, 6 Munf. 142, 8 Am. Dec. 733,—that the allegations of fraud on the part of Horner, contained in the answer to his petition, must be taken as true. Counsel for appellant, Horner, deny the correctness of this position, saying that no answer was required. For this they rely upon the language of § 23 of chapter 106 of the Code, under which the petition is filed. This section, after authorizing the filing of the petition, says: "The court, without any other pleading, shall impanel a jury to inquire into such claim."

Though originally there might have been difference of opinion as to the application of this statute to suits in equity with attachment, the question seems to have been settled in favor of it. In Chapman v. Pittsburg & S. R. Co. 26 W. Va. 324, the court seems to have approved the ruling in Anderson v. Johnson, 32 Gratt. 558. That was a suit in equity founded upon an attachment, and the court held as follows: "Where persons claiming the property attached, or some interest in it, are admitted as parties in the cause, their claim is to be tried by a jury impaneled for the purpose, as provided by the statute, Code of 1873, chap. 148, § 25; and it is error for the court to pass upon the claim without the intervention of a jury." Chapman v. Pittsburg & S. R. Co. was also a suit in equity with an attachment, and Judge Johnson, in discussing it in view of said section of the statute, said: "If the petition shows a prima facie right in the petitioner to the property in the petition, a title better than that of the defendant, then the court should impanel a jury to inquire into the claim."

Although the inquiry now is not as to the right to a trial by jury, but as to what pleadings are necessary in a case of this kind, the two decisions just referred to and others apply the statute in question to all attachment suits, whether in equity or at law. There can be no doubt of its applicability in actions at law, and these cases foreclose any question as to the intent of the legislature to apply it to suits in equity.

That it is competent for the legislature to require jury trials in equity proceedings cannot be doubted. In many instances it has authorized and required courts of equity to direct issues out of chancery to the law side of the court for the determination of questions of fact proper for ascertainment by a jury. The statute governing attachment proceedings requires a trial by jury of the issue made on a plea in abatement, denying the existence of the ground upon which the attachment is sued out. Whether the proceedings are entered in the chancery order book or the law order book of the same court is more a matter of form than substance, though it is sometimes error not to enter it in the latter. State ex rel. Pelton v. Irwin, 30 W. Va. 404, 4 S. E. 413. In § 23, providing for intervention by third parties, the legislature may have intended a direction of an issue and trial by jury in all cases, whether the title set up was legal or equitable in its nature. But if it were an open question it might well be doubted whether the legislature did so intend, and whether it was intended, when the proceeding is in equity, to alter the rules of pleading, and limit the pleadings to the petition alone.

The statutory provision in question appears for the first time in the Code of 1849. The object of the amendment is stated by the revisers in their report (p. 761) as follows: "This section, as altered from the present law, will close the question whether a suit in equity is not necessary when a party claims under a subsequent attachment." Up to that time the statute had made no provision for any third party who desired to dispute the validity of the plaintiff's attachment, or who desired to assert a lien on the attached property under any other attachment or otherwise. The provision was as follows: "Whenever the goods and chattels, taken by virtue of any attachment, shall be claimed by any person, other than such debtor, the court shall immediately (unless good cause be shown by either party for a continuance) direct a jury to be impaneled to inquire into the right of property." Code 1819, chap. 123, § 16. That chapter relates to both foreign attachments in equity and attachments at law; but the distinction between the two kinds of proceedings seems to be very clearly marked, and said § 16 seems to be applicable to the latter only.

The doubt and uncertainty alluded to by the revisers is exemplified in Erekin v. Staley, 12 Leigh, 406, and Moore v. Holt, 10 Gratt. 284. Both of these cases arose before the amendment of the attachment statute adverted to, and their nature is indicated by point 1 of the syllabus in Moore v. Holt, which reads as follows: "Process in a foreign attachment is served upon a garnishee having property of the absent debtor in his hands, and afterwards other creditors sue out attachments at law against the same party as an absconding debtor, which are served upon the same garnishee, and, before the foreign attachment is ready for a hearing, they obtain judgments and an order for the sale of the property in the hands of the garnishee. The plaintiff in the foreign attachment may amend his bill and enjoin the sale." In that case the court very clearly points out the difference between foreign attachment in equity as it existed in Virginia at that time, and the statutory attachment in equity and at law which now obtains in Virginia and this state. In foreign attachment, the process, with an indorsement on it in the nature of an attachment, created a lien, although no affidavit at all had been filed; but to authorize the officer to take the effects out of the hands of the garnishee, or require him to give security to have the same forthcoming, an affidavit was necessary. For the amount and nature of the claim, reference was had to the bill. The bill and process with the indorsement give a lien. Hence the title was drawn into the main suit. The bill asked for subjection of the property to satisfaction of the debt, and brought it within the jurisdiction of the court. In an action at law the property came into the case by reason of the levy of the attachment only. All this suggests the quære whether the legislative object was not merely to enable a lien-holder, by execution or otherwise, and the person claiming an equitable title to the attached property in a proceeding at law, to assert his claim in a court of law,—a thing which he could not do, or to do which his right before the amendment was doubtful,—and not to work any change whatever in the rules governing the pleadings, when the suit in which the attachment is sued out is in equity. It is to be observed that Judge Moncure's discussion of the subject in Anderson v. Johnson is limited to a single paragraph of about a half dozen lines, and makes no reference whatever to the history of the subject or reason of the amendment. Nor does Judge Johnson enter upon any examination of it. Moreover, I see no good reason why it may not here be held that the parties, by going into equity, have waived the right to a trial at law, since fraud, the real core of the controversy, is always a matter of equity cognizance. Though not free from doubt as to the proper construction of the section, I yield to the views of the other members of the court, who are satisfied with the interpretation which the Virginia court has given the statute, and which this court has approved, as already stated.

Under a misapprehension of the law, superinduced by the action of the parties, the court treated the petition of Horner as a cross bill, and heard the matters in difference between him and the attaching creditor upon it and the answer thereto, and upon the depositions taken and filed by the parties. In bringing the case on to be heard, the decree contains the usual recitals, except that it refers to the agreement between the parties, upon which, also, it was heard. This is an agreement entered into between Horner and the plaintiff, authorizing the filing of Horner's petition with the clerk of the court in vacation, and the answer of the plaintiff to the petition within forty days from the date of the agreement, and providing that thereafter the parties might go on "and take their proof upon said petition just as if the same had been filed in court, and mature the same for hearing; but either party shall have a right to object to any pleading or proof just as if the same were filed in court." In an effort to be more explicit the parties repeated the agreement in the following terms: "All legal objections which either party may have to any pleading or evidence are reserved for the consideration of the court, and the hearing of said petition shall be had just as though the same and the bond of the plaintiff and the answer of the plaintiff had been tendered in open court for the action of the court; and it is further agreed that the parties may take such legal and proper proof upon legal notice as they have a right to take."

Assuming either that the statute did not contemplate a trial at law of the matters in difference between the petitioner and the plaintiff, or that, if it did, they might elect to try according to the rules of equity procedure, depositions were taken and filed, and the court disposed of the case as one in equity. Considered as a trial at law by the court in lieu of a jury, how does the case stand? No witnesses were produced and examined to prove the contention of either party. No ground is shown for the use of depositions instead of oral testimony of witnesses. Had objection been made, the depositions could not properly have been used, and there was no evidence before the court. However, counsel for appellant now insists that the action of the court shall be treated as a trial at law, and the depositions to prove his petition as having been properly admitted. The court, erroneously treating the proceeding as governed by the rules of equity practice, regarded the allegations of fraud in the answer as true, and entered a decree for the plaintiff. This operated a complete surprise upon the petitioner. To permit him now to turn the proceeding into one at law, and give him the benefit of his depositions, would work an equally great surprise upon the plaintiff. Hence it is plain that, under a misconception of the nature of the proceeding, there has been a mistrial, operating injustice to both parties. The plaintiff has had no opportunity to interpose objections to the introduction of petitioner's evidence irregularly taken and introduced. The petitioner has been unwittingly drawn into a trap which denies him the benefit of his evidence on merely technical grounds. The principle announced in Echols v. Tracewell, 52 W. Va. 614, 44 S. E. 164, and in Armstrong v. Grafton, 23 W. Va. 50, is well adapted to situations of this kind, and its application will enable the parties to have a fair trial under proper rulings by the court. On the theory of a misconception of the case by both counsel and the court, in consequence of which there had been no fair trial, the appellate court reversed the decrees in those two cases, and remanded them. Viewed from this point of observation, the vice of the proceeding is the adoption of a wrong mode of trial, and the application to the trial of improper rules of procedure.

That the case was heard on the agreement does not relieve from the effect of this irregularity. The parties reserved the right to make all proper objections to the pleadings and evidence, and, under the rules governing the mode of trial adopted, no objections would have been entertained. Hence it was useless to make any. We cannot assume that the appellee would have relied upon the want of a replication, or failed to object to the introduction of depositions, without grounds therefor having been shown, had he been informed that the trial was at law instead of in equity. He agreed that proof might be taken under the apprehension that the proceeding was governed by the rules of equity pleading and practice. This is manifest from the terms of the agreement. Therefore he cannot be said to have consented to the use of the depositions on a trial at law, and in fact, as well as in law, the record shows there never was any such trial.

The position of counsel for appellant is open to another serious objection. The record does not show any express waiver of a jury by the appellee. The decision is in his favor. Appellant would reverse the decree, and then have the court render, against the appellee, a new decree, such as, in the opinion of counsel for appellant, the court below should have entered. While an adjudication in favor of the appellee, without the waiver of a jury, might stand, because he cannot be prejudiced thereby, one against him might be fatally erroneous for want of such waiver. In decreeing against him this court is bound to notice and protect his rights. That a jury may be waived is beyond doubt, but the legislature has seen fit to prescribe the manner in which such waiver shall be shown, namely, by consent of the parties or their counsel entered of record.

Section 29 of chapter 116 of the Code of 1890. This statute was put in the Code of 1849 upon the recommendation of the revisers, at a time when the constitutional guaranty of jury trial was in a form different from that in which it now appears; but the alteration in its language makes it no less sacred, and our lawmakers have not exercised their discretion to dispense with the statutory requirement as to the manner in which such waiver shall be evidenced. Through all the mutations of our organic and other laws, they have suffered the statute to remain wholly unaltered, and its provisions have been uniformly observed down to the present time, so far as the reported decisions of this court disclose. For more than half a century the statute has stood, working no inconvenience, and yet effectually guarding this most important and sacred right of the citizen against inadvertent and inconsiderate waiver. In view of all this, it would be clearly contrary to legislative intent, and a violent innovation upon our settled practice, to permit any form of waiver different from that prescribed by the statute. None of our decisions seem to countenance any authority in the court to try civil and misdemeanor cases except when the record shows a waiver by consent. King v. Burdett, 12 W. Va. 688; Ramsburg v. Erb, 16 W. Va. 777; Bank of Ravenswood v. Hamilton, 43 W. Va. 75, 27 S. E. 296. In some jurisdictions there is a presumption of waiver when the record is silent on the subject (17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 1103, 1109); but, where the mode of waiver is prescribed by statute, that mode is generally held to be exclusive. 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1099.

In a trial upon the petition it will be competent for a jury, or the court trying in lieu of a jury, to inquire into the bona fides of Horner's purchase. Fraud, if proved, will vitiate the sale, and it is within the legislative power to dispense with a plea or other specification setting it up by way of defense on the question of title. "It is as competent for a jury to investigate fraud as a chancellor. The evidence to sustain actual fraud must be the same, in substance and effect, in one form that it is in the other." Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Lafferty, 2 W. Va. 104; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Lafferty, 14 Gratt. 478; Jones v. Wood, 16 Pa. 25; Wilson v. York & M. R. Co. 11 Gill & J. 58.

For the reasons aforesaid, the decree must be reversed and the cause remanded for trial upon the petition of the appellant, Horner, in accordance with the principles herein stated, and, further, according to the rules and principles of equity.

Willie HICKMAN, Plff. in Err.

(.....W. Va.....)

- *1. The owner of land executes a lease thereon for oil and gas purposes, by which it is agreed that the lessees shall have the privilege at any time to remove therefrom all machinery and fixtures placed on said premises. Under this lease, the lessees and their assignees, for the purpose of exploring for oil and gas, placed on the land an engine, wooden oil-well rig, wooden oil tanks, casing, pipes, rubber belt, and other appliances of like character, necessary for the prosecution of that work. Afterwards the lease was forfeited and terminated for the nonpayment of rental. Held, that said machinery and fixtures did not become parts of the freehold, and that said lessees, or the owners of the machinery and fixtures, had a reasonable time after the termination of said lease in which to remove said property from the land.
2. What is a reasonable time for the removal is to be determined from all the facts and circumstances of the case.

(October 25, 1904.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Harrison County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover the value of certain chattels which had been placed upon defendant's property while plaintiffs were in possession of it under a lease, and to which defendant had asserted title. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Edward Grandison Smith, for plaintiff in error:

A lessee's property in fixtures, remaining on the leased premises, terminates with the lease.

Childs v. Hurd, 32 W. Va. 66, 9 S. E. 362; Jones v. Shufflin, 45 W. Va. 729, 72 Am. St. Rep. 848, 31 S. E. 975; Graves, Real Prop. chap. 2, p. 15.

By the common law, a leasehold interest in land is personal property. Trade fixtures put up by the lessee, although real estate as between lessor and himself, while annexed to the land, yet may, during the term of the lease, be severed by the lessee, or by one deriving title from him, and thus reconverted to their original condition as chattels.

Freeman v. Dawson, 110 U. S. 264, 28 L. ed. 141, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 94; United States v. Stowell, 133 U. S. 1, 33 L. ed. 555, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 244; Sampson v. Camperdown Cotton Mills, 64 Fed. 939; Morey v. Hoyt, 62 Conn. 542, 19 L. R. A. 611, 26 Atl. 127.

When Gartlan voluntarily declined to pay the November rental, leaving these fixtures on the leased premises, he must be held to have knowingly and deliberately abandoned his property in the lease and in the fixtures at the same time.

There is one line of decisions holding that fixtures may not be removed after the termination of the lease and possession thereunder, whether it is terminated suddenly by forfeiture, by death, or the happening of some other uncertain event or not, and whether the control of such event is within or outside the power of the lessee.

Childs v. Hurd, 32 W. Va. 66, 9 S. E. 362; Jones v. Shufflin, 45 W. Va. 729, 72 Am. St. Rep. 848, 31 S. E. 975; Graves, Real Prop. chap. 2, p. 9; Taylor, Land. & T. § 551; Morey v. Hoyt, 62 Conn. 542, 19 L. R. A. 611, 26 Atl. 127; Kutter v. Smith, 2 Wall. 491, 17 L. ed. 830; Friedlander v. Hewitt (Friedlander v. Ryder) 9 L. R. A. 700, and note, 30 Neb. 785, 47 N. W. 83.

There is another line of decisions which announces the contrary doctrine, as obiter dictum in oil cases, that in a certain excepted class of cases the tenant may remove fixtures after the termination of the lease, within a reasonable time.

Cassell v. Crothers, 193 Pa. 359, 44 Atl. 446; Shellar v. Shivers, 171 Pa. 569, 33 Atl. 95.

The contingency which terminated the lease in the two Pennsylvania cases was beyond the power of the lessees to control. At bar the lease was not so terminated and the lessees never had an estate either by sufferance or at will, and therefore the incidents of such estates never attached.

The contract does not extend the time of removal of fixtures beyond the life of the lease.

Shellar v. Shivers, 171 Pa. 569, 33 Atl. 95.

If a doubt arises on the lease, that doubt must be resolved in favor of Hickman.

Thornton, Oil & Gas, § 219, p. 249.

The "reasonable time" dictum of Shellar v. Shivers cannot cover any time of idle waiting, much less two hundred and forty-six days of absolute idleness before beginning to remove fixtures.

Burk v. Hollis, 98 Mass. 55.

Messrs. Jackson & Patton and John Bassel for defendants in error.

Miller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Miranda A. Hickman and Willie Hickman, her husband, executed to John F. Phillips and J. Perry Thompson a lease bearing date on the 29th day of May, 1900, on a tract of 112½ acres of land in Harrison county, for oil and gas purposes. By successive assignments of the lease, W. S. Morris, Thomas Gartlan, and the Southern Oil Company acquired an interest therein. The lease stipulates, among other things, that the parties of the first part "do grant, demise, lease, and let unto the parties of the second part, their heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, for the sole and only purpose of mining and operating for oil and gas, and of laying pipe lines, and of building tanks, stations, and structures thereon to take care of said products, all that certain tract of land," etc. (describing it). In another clause thereof "it is agreed that this lease shall remain in force for the term of five years from this date [the date of the lease], and as long thereafter as oil or gas, or either of them, is produced therefrom by the said parties of the second part, their successors and assigns. . . . Provided, however, that this lease shall become null and void, and all rights herein shall cease and determine unless a well shall be completed on the said premises within ninety days from the date hereof, or unless the lessees pay at the rate of $125.00 quarterly in advance for each additional three months such completion is delayed from the time above mentioned for the completion of such well until a well is completed; and it is agreed that the completion of such well shall be and operate as a full liquidation of all rentals under this provision during the remainder of the term of this lease. . . . It is agreed that the second parties shall have the privilege . . . at any time to remove all machinery and fixtures placed on the premises."

It is admitted by the parties to this action that Mowris, Gartlan, and said oil company went upon the land under the lease and drilled one well for oil and gas, which was completed about the middle of January, 1901, and shot by them on the 13th day of February of the same year; that the parties last mentioned paid the rental under the lease on the 29th day of August, 1901, for the quarter ending on the 29th day of November, 1901, which rental was accepted by Hickman and Mrs. Hickman, the then owners of the land, but no other rental provided for in the lease appears to have ever been paid.

On the 31st day of December, 1901, said Willie Hickman commenced his suit in chancery in the circuit court of Harrison county against Mowris, Gartlan, the Southern Oil Company, Phillips, and Thompson, and on the 7th day of January, 1902, presented his bill to the judge of said court, in which he sets up said lease and the several assignments thereof, and filed therewith copies of the same, and, in substance, alleges therein that Mowris and the oil company, claiming to be equal owners of the lease, had drilled one well on said land, marked on the plat filed as "No. 1," which was completed by them about the middle of January, 1901; that it was afterwards shot, and declared by them to be a dry hole, and not worth cleaning out; that said lease had been abandoned by the said defendants, and active operations thereon for oil and gas continuously discontinued ever since the middle of January, 1901, until the 31st day of December, 1901; that the defendants have paid no rental on said land since the 29th day of August, 1901; that on the 31st day of December last aforesaid, they again entered upon said land with screw, circle, water barrels, bailer, stern, and cable, hauled the same to the well, and proceeded to lay pipe for the purpose of furnishing fuel to said well from another well on a neighboring farm. The bill then charges that the said lease and assignments thereof are null and void, and constitute and are a cloud upon plaintiff's title to said land, and prays that said lease, and the several assignments thereof, be declared forfeited and canceled as such cloud, and that defendants, and each of them, be restrained and enjoined from entering upon said land, and from doing any and all things under said lease, or any of the assignments thereof.

The injunction was granted as prayed for. The bill was filed at rules, and the cause regularly matured for hearing, and on the 22d day of May, 1902, the court made and 67 L. R. A.

entered its decree therein in the words and figures following, to wit: "This cause came on this day to be heard upon the plaintiff's bill and exhibits therewith filed, and was argued by counsel. Whereupon it appears to the court that this cause was regularly matured at rules, and the summons duly served on all the defendants, and the plaintiff's bill taken for confessed, and cause set for hearing at March rules, 1902; and it further appears to the court that the plaintiff is entitled to the relief prayed for in his bill. It is adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the lease therein described as the Phillips and Thompson lease, bearing date on the 29th day of May, 1902, and all assignments thereof, and contracts thereunder, and a subsequent lease of the 3 acres around the buildings in said Phillips and Thompson lease reserved, are forfeited and constitute a cloud upon the plaintiff's title to the land therein described, and are hereby canceled, and the said defendants are ordered to surrender to the plaintiff the said lease and all assignments thereof."

Hickman on the 14th day of July, 1902, sent by registered mail to the several persons to whom it is addressed, copies of the following notice: "To Thomas Gartlan, The Southern Oil Company, a corporation, J. Perry Thompson, John F. Phillips, and W. S. Mowris: You are hereby notified that the oil-well rig, at well No. 1, casing and all fixtures and machinery of every kind or character, and all property now on my farm on Indian Run, in Harrison county, West Virginia, belong to me and are my property; and you are further notified not to remove the same or any part thereof; and you are still further notified not to trespass upon my said farm or any part thereof for any purpose whatever,"—which copies appear to have been received by them, respectively, from the 14th to the 28th days of July, 1902. It is also proved that this notice was the first claim of ownership that Hickman had made to the property in controversy, and was the first knowledge that the defendants, or any of them, had of the determination of the said chancery cause or of such claim.

On the 1st day of August, 1902, an action in detinue was commenced in the circuit court of Harrison county by said Gartlan, Mowris, the Southern Oil Company, Phillips, and Thompson against Hickman for the recovery of sundry goods and chattels, to wit: 2,777 feet of 6½-inch casing (National Tubeworks manufacture), value, $1,041.73; 200 feet 10-inch casing (National Tubeworks manufacture), of the value of $192; 1 12x12 Eureka Engine (Boiler Works of Oil City manufacture), of the value of $232.50; 1 wooden oil-well rig, value $200; 1 250-barrel wooden oil tank, of the value of $30; 1 rubber belt, 6x12, 95 feet long, of the value of $50; 1 6½-inch T, cast iron, of the value of $3.32; 3 6½-inch L's, cast iron, of the value of $6.98; all of said property being of the value of $1,846.53; said property being in the possession of the said Willie Hickman,—and $1,000 damages for the detention of the same, and being the machinery and fixtures placed by them on the leased premises. Whereupon, the affidavit and bond as required by law having been filed by the plaintiffs in the case at the commencement of the action, the sheriff was directed to seize and take into his possession the property mentioned, which he did, and delivered the same to plaintiffs. A declaration having been filed, there was a trial of the action to a jury, a verdict in favor of plaintiffs for the property sued for, a motion by defendant to have said verdict set aside, which was by the court overruled, and a judgment that the plaintiffs should retain possession of the said property mentioned and described in the verdict of the jury, and that the plaintiffs should also recover their costs expended. Upon petition of Hickman, a writ of error to said judgment was allowed by a judge of this court. He complains that the court refused to set aside the verdict of the jury and grant to him a new trial of the action, that a certain instruction was given to the jury on motion of plaintiffs, and that certain other instructions were refused, all of which rulings of the court, he asserts, were and are erroneous and prejudicial to him.

In addition to the facts hereinbefore stated, the following agreed statement was read to the jury as evidence on the trial of said action: "It is admitted by the parties: That the plaintiffs placed the property in controversy upon the land of the defendant embraced in the lease of May 29, 1900, for the purpose of drilling and operating for oil and gas under the lease. That one well was drilled in by the plaintiffs and completed about the middle of January, and shot by the plaintiffs on the 13th of February, 1901. The plaintiffs paid the rental under the lease on the 29th day of August, 1901, for the quarter ending November 28, 1901, which rental was accepted by the then owners of the property, the defendant and his wife, Mrs. Miranda Hickman. The well in question was drilled to a depth of 3,208 feet, and the casing inserted to the proper depth, to wit, about 2,100 or 2,200 feet. That a derrick was built over the well for the purpose of drilling, or running the drilling tools in the usual way, and constructed in the usual manner, to the usual height,—about 82 feet,—and that iron tubing or casing was inserted in the well, which is described in the declaration. That the engine sued for was set or placed in an engine house, and connected with the derrick with drilling tools in the usual way, and the tanks described in the declaration were set or placed about 75 feet from the derrick, or south of the well, for the purpose of receiving the oil. That the derrick is described in the declaration as one wooden oil-well rig. The T's and L's were used for the purpose of connecting the well with the tank,—in other words, the piping leading from the tank to the well. That all the property sued for in the declaration was connected in the usual way and manner of connecting said property for the drilling and operating of the well, and was necessary for that purpose, and used for that purpose. That shortly after the 28th day of November, 1901, the defendant posted notices in writing upon all the outer gates of the land embraced in the lease, notifying the plaintiffs, or anyone acting under them, to keep off the property, and that the defendant claimed that the lease had been forfeited for the failure to pay rent; neither the plaintiffs nor any of their agents at that time being on the property. That the same notice and claim were given verbally by the defendant to Clint Cothrop and other of the agents of the plaintiffs at the same time. That no rental was paid after the 28th of August, 1901, as before stated. That on the 31st day of December, 1901, the employees of the plaintiffs, and by authority of the plaintiffs, after the notice aforesaid had been given, went upon said property, and by warrant sued out on the 1st day of January, 1902, were arrested as trespassers, taken before a justice of the peace, and the cause continued at the instance of the defendants in the warrant, and before trial an injunction was granted in the chancery suit of Willie Hickman against Thomas Gartlan and others, then pending in the circuit court of Harrison county. Thomas Gartlan and others were then not prosecuted further under said warrants, but the same were dismissed. That on the 13th day of February, 1901, the employees of the plaintiffs, by authority of the plaintiffs, went upon the land and shot the well, and on the 15th of January, 1902, by authority of the plaintiffs, again went upon the property and shot the well a second time. It is admitted that the property in question is of the value made in the declaration, that the property in controversy was taken by the plaintiffs at the time of the institution of this suit by giving bond, and that the same was not replevied by the defendant. It is admitted that a demand was made upon the defendant for the property in controversy shortly before the institution of this action, he exact date being July 26, 1902, which demand in writing is filed as a part of this statement, marked 'Demand.' That the lease under which the plaintiffs entered and placed the property upon the land of the defendant was in the following words and figures: . . . That all the property in controversy remained in place as it was at the time said well was drilled and operated until delivered to plaintiff by the sheriff in this suit. The record of the chancery cause of Willie Hickman against Thomas Gartlan, the Southern Oil Company, J. Perry Thompson, John F. Phillips, and W. S. Mowris, instituted in the circuit court of Harrison county on the 31st day of December, 1901, is filed as a part of this statement, marked 'Exhibit Record.' The amount of the defendant's damages in the event the verdict and judgment shall be for the defendant shall be $100. It is further agreed that, of the 2,200 feet of casing in the well originally, possession of only 950 feet was taken by the sheriff and delivered to the plaintiffs. Four hundred and twenty-five dollars being the value of that casing at the same rate averred here and agreed upon, the same is not involved in this suit."

The instruction given on motion of the plaintiffs is in the words and figures following: "The jury is instructed that the plaintiffs were not deprived of the right to remove the property demanded in the declaration, under the evidence offered to the jury, if, from such evidence, the jury shall believe said property was placed upon the leased premises for the purposes of drilling or operating for oil and gas, by reason of the fact that a decree was entered by the circuit court of Harrison county on or about the 27th day of May, 1902, in an equity suit brought by the defendant against the plaintiffs for such purpose, and that the plaintiffs would be entitled to a reasonable time after the termination of the suit in equity to remove said property from the leased premises."

The instructions asked for by the defendant and refused by the court are in the following words and figures: "(1) The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the property sued for by the plaintiffs was placed by the plaintiffs on the property of the defendant during the existence of an oil or gas lease, giving the plaintiffs the right to explore thereunder for oil and gas; and if the jury further believe that said property, or any part of it, was so placed upon the said Hickman's land as to give it the character of fixtures, or trade fixtures; and if the jury further believe from the evidence that the said oil and gas lease expired, or became forfeited, or was in any wise terminated, and the possession of said plaintiffs under said lease was lost, before said fixtures were removed from said land,—then the jury should find for the defendant. (2) The court instructs the jury that, after the expiration of an oil or gas lease by forfeiture or otherwise, the lessee cannot remove fixtures attached to the realty during the continuance of said lease. Such fixtures become a part of the realty, and go to the person entitled thereto after the expiration of the lease. (3) The court instructs the jury that, as between lessor and lessee, fixtures erected by the latter, and which he is entitled to remove, must be removed during the term of the lease. After the expiration of the term of the lease, and the loss of possession thereunder, the tenant can neither remove said fixtures nor recover their value from the lessor. (4) The court instructs the jury that a lessee may remove fixtures which he has put on the leased premises at any time during the lease, or while he continues tenant, but after the expiration of the lease, and the surrender of the premises to the lessor, he cannot enter on the premises and remove any fixtures, for, when he quits the premises, leaving his fixtures behind him, it will be presumed he intended to abandon them. (5) The court instructs the jury that, if they believe from the evidence that said Phillips and Thompson lease was on the 28th day of November, 1901, for the nonpayment of rent, or for any other reason, forfeited; and if the jury further believe from the evidence that the plaintiffs, Thomas Gartlan, and others, were then, or at any subsequent time in the month of December, prior to the 31st day of December, 1901, out of possession of the premises described in said lease for oil and gas purposes, and that the plaintiff, Willie Hickman, was then in possession thereof; and if the jury further believe from the evidence that the property here sued for was at the time of the forfeiture of said lease not severed and removed therefrom for more than six months thereafter—then the jury should find for the defendant, Willie Hickman. (6) The court instructs the jury that, if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiffs, Thomas Gartlan and others, after the completion of said well No. 1, paid on February 12, 1901, $125, on May 28, 1901, $125, on August 28, 1901, $125, as rental, and that on the 28th day of November, 1901, annual rental fell due and was not paid; and if the jury further believe from the evidence that, for nonpayment of rental or any other reason, said Phillips and Thompson lease has been judicially ascertained to be, and decreed to be, forfeited and canceled; and if the jury further believe that at the time of such forfeiture and cancelation, and thereafter, the plaintiffs, Thomas Gartlan and others, were out of possession of the premises described in said lease, and that the said defendant, Willie Hickman, was in possession thereof; and if the jury further believe from the evidence that at the time of such ascertainment judicially of such forfeiture, and at the time of said cancelation, the property here sued for was attached to the real estate described in said lease, and was not severed therefrom until after the institution of this suit, by virtue of an order made in this suit, and without the consent of the said Hickman, and against his protest,—the jury should find for the defendant, Willie Hickman. (7) The court instructs the jury that, if they believe from the evidence that the property sued for was at the time of the institution of this suit so attached to the realty of Willie Hickman as to be trade fixtures, and if the jury further believe from the evidence that at the time of the institution of this suit the Phillips and Thompson lease had been canceled, then the jury should find for the defendant, Willie Hickman.”

Hickman contends, first, that the things sued for were and are fixtures; second, that they remained attached to the realty after the termination of the lease; third, that, these fixtures being so attached at the time and after the lessee lost title to the lease, they cannot be removed from the land; and, fourth, that the lease ended on November 29, 1901, by forfeiture for the nonpayment of rental by the lessees, and did not terminate by reason of the decree of the court on the 22d day of May, 1902.

For the defendants in error it is urged, first, that the things sued for were and are chattels; second, that they retain their character as personalty, and are not fixtures; third, that they may be removed by the lessees within a reasonable time after the expiration of the lease; fourth, that the lessees are not precluded from the exercise of that right by the trial of the question of the forfeiture of the lease. By the express terms of the lease the second parties have the right to remove all machinery and fixtures placed on the premises in the prosecution of their exploration and search for oil and gas. There can be no question as to what property may be removed, unless the right of removal has been lost to the lessees or their assigns. The lease says that the second parties shall have the privilege of removal at any time.

The parties have agreed that the lease shall become null and void if the rental be not paid as stipulated. The authorities cited in the case of Guffy v. Hukill, 34 W. 67 L. R. A.

Va. 49, 8 L. R. A. 759, 26 Am. St. Rep. 901, 11 S. E. 754, seem to be full and clear that default in the performance of the condition of the lease by the lessee ipso facto terminates and forfeits the lease, and all of his rights thereunder. In the chancery suit it was adjudicated that the causes of forfeiture existed as alleged, and therefore, the lease was canceled. The said forfeiture, however, by the terms of the lease and the decree of the court, extends no further than to the lease, which “vested no present title in the lessees, except the mere right of exploration for oil and gas.” Steelsmith v. Gartlan, 45 W. Va. 27, 44 L. R. A. 107, 29 S. E. 978; Urpman v. Lowther Oil Co. 53 W. Va. 501, 505, 97 Am. St. Rep. 1027, 44 S. E. 433. The completion of a nonproductive well vested no title in the lessee. Ibid. Therefore the defendants in error forfeited only the right to further search for oil and gas on the land. There is nothing in this lease declaring that upon its termination the machinery and fixtures placed upon the land by the lessees shall be the property of the lessor. The lessor has written in the contract the considerations and conditions upon which the lessees may search for oil and gas upon the land. The lease is of uncertain duration. The right of the lessees thereunder is dependent upon the completion of a well by them within a specified time, the payment of rentals, or the production of oil or gas from the land in paying quantities. In order to complete the well, the lease allows the lessees ninety days from the date thereof. They are entitled to prosecute their search for the full ninety days with their machinery and fixtures, but at the end of ninety days, the well being unfinished, the lease would forfeit, unless the rental for the next quarter be paid in advance. It is untenable to contend that, default being made as aforesaid, the lessees would not be permitted to remove their machinery and fixtures. So, if the time of search should be extended by payment of rental, the lessees would be entitled to the whole period for the purpose of their exploration.

The object in placing the machinery and fixtures on the land was to enable the lessees to develop the leased premises. It was for the benefit of the lessees, and not to enhance the value of the land by permanent improvements thereon. Engines, derricks, oil tanks, casing, and pipes, of the character described above, are not placed on farms, as farming implements, or to be used in connection with agriculture. “The chief test by which to determine whether an article is a fixture is to inquire whether the party annexing it intended it to be a permanent accession to the freehold.” Edwards & B

Lumber Co. v. Rank, 73 Am. St. Rep. 514, 518, note, (57 Neb. 323, 77 N. W. 765); Fisfield v. Farmers' Nat. Bank, 148 Ill. 163, 39 Am. St. Rep. 166, 35 N. E. 802. In Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Morgan, 42 Kan. 23, 4 L. R. A. 284, 16 Am. St. Rep. 471, 21 Pac. 809, it is held that "whether a chattel becomes a fixture depends upon the character of the act by which it is put into its place, the uses to which it is put, the policy of the law connected with its purpose, and the intention of those concerned. . . . Before personal property can become a fixture by actual physical annexation to land, the intention of the parties, and the uses to which it is put, must combine to change its nature from that of a chattel to that of a fixture." Thomson v. Smith, 111 Iowa, 718, 50 L. R. A. 780, 82 Am. St. Rep. 541, 83 N. W. 789; Donahue, Petroleum & Gas, 72. In Johnson v. Wiseman, 4 Met. (Ky.) 360, 83 Am. Dec. 475, cited in 17 Am. Dec. 693, note, it is said: "The question whether chattels are to be regarded as fixtures depends less upon the manner of their annexation to the freehold than upon their own nature and their adaptation to the purposes for which they are used." Cooper v. Johnson, 143 Mass. 108, 9 N. E. 33. Thornton on Oil & Gas, at § 567, says: "When the parties immediately concerned, by an agreement between themselves, manifest their purpose that the property, although it is annexed to the soil, shall retain its character as personalty, then, except as against persons who occupy the relation of innocent purchasers without notice, the intentions of the parties will prevail, unless the property be of such a nature that it necessarily becomes incorporated into and a part of the realty by the act and manner of annexation." The machinery and fixtures, as they are called, were placed on the land for the sole purpose of enabling the lessees to explore for and produce oil and gas thereon. Should the lessees fail in their search, or oil and gas, or either, be found and exhausted, this property would not be necessary for the use and enjoyment of the land by the owner as a farm. The land could be used for its former purpose—farming—without this machinery better than with it remaining thereon, an impediment, instead of an advantage. In the light of the authorities cited, we are of opinion that the machinery and fixtures placed on the leased premises did not become permanent fixtures, nor parts of the freehold, and that the plaintiffs' right and title thereto did not vest in Hickman by the forfeiture of said lease, as aforesaid.

The time for the removal of the property is not definitely fixed, by express terms, 67 L. R. A.

with reference to the termination of the lease. We have shown that the lessees could not be required to effect the removal before or at the moment the lease was terminated. Certainly they would not be required to make such removal during the pendency of the chancery suit, brought for the very purpose of determining whether or not the lease had been terminated. Thornton on Oil & Gas, at § 576, says: "Contingencies may arise that will not require the lessee to remove his fixtures at the expiration of the lease, or even within what would have otherwise been a reasonable time. Thus, where there arose a dispute between the lessor and lessee as to when the lease expired, and the controversy was taken into the courts and was decided against the lessee, it was held that the lessee could remove the fixtures at the termination of the suit, although the lease had long before expired, and, if the lessor had refused to permit the lessee to so remove them, he was liable in damages." "Where anything is to be done, as goods to be delivered, or the like, and no time is specified in the contract, it is then a presumption of law that the parties intended and agreed that the thing should be done in a reasonable time." 2 Parsons, Contr. §§ 535, 651; Hammon, Contr. § 444; Poling v. Condon-Lane Boom & Lumber Co. (W. Va.) 47 S. E. 279. In the case of Shellar v. Shivers, 171 Pa. 569, 572, 33 Atl. 95, 96, where the right of removal of machinery and fixtures was involved, the language of the lease was that the lessee should have the right to remove "at any time" any or all machinery. The court there denied the right of entry for the purpose of such removal four years after the lease had expired, and five years and six months after the well had been completed and found to be of no use as an oil or gas well. After construing the lease, the court says: "If this construction is correct, then the rule of law as to removal of fixtures would be as in cases where the tenancy is uncertain in duration, as when it depends upon a contingency, and that is that the removal must be made within a reasonable time, or, in other words, the law in such cases allows the tenant a reasonable time for the removal of fixtures." Thornton on Oil & Gas, at § 574, says: "Thus it was decided in New York that trade fixtures did not cease to be the tenant's property by reason of the mere fact that he did not remove them during his term, and that he could 'remove them after his term expired without subjecting himself to any damages for such removal, even though he be liable to an action for trespass for an entry on the premises demised.' . . . In Illinois it was held that the tenant had a reasonable time within which to remove trade fixtures, and what was a reasonable time was a proper question for the jury, under the instructions of the court." The author cites Berger v. Hoerner, 36 Ill. App. 380; Nigro v. Hatch, 2 Ariz. 144, 11 Pac. 177. The same author says at the same section: "This is undoubtedly true where a forfeiture of the lease takes place; and, if the tenant is denied the right after the forfeiture to remove them, he may bring an action therefor, especially if the lease contain an agreement giving him the right to make such removal." Sattler v. Opperman, 30 Pittsb. L. J. N. S. 205; Potter v. Gilbert, 177 Pa. 159, 35 L. R. A. 580, 35 Atl. 597. What is a reasonable time for the removal of the chattels is a question to be determined from all the facts and circumstances of the case. Kuhlmann v. Meier, 7 Mo. App. 260. In this case plaintiffs evidently had not abandoned the lease. Hickman alleges in his bill in the chancery cause that on the 31st day of December, 1901, the agents of Mowris, Gartlan, and others entered upon said land with certain machinery and appliances, and proceeded to work on and about said well No. 1. It is agreed that they shot the well on January 15, 1902. It is proved that the notice to plaintiffs by Hickman on or about July 14, 1902, was the first knowledge they or any of them had of the determination of said chancery cause, the cancelation of the lease, or the claim of Hickman to the property in controversy. On July 26, 1902, demand was made upon Hickman by defendants in error for the property, and on August 1st thereafter action was commenced therefor as aforesaid.

It seems to us that defendants in error proceeded within a reasonable time to assert their rights to the machinery and fixtures in controversy, and that the Circuit Court did not err in giving the one instruction and refusing the others. We therefore affirm the judgment.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

ATLANTA & WEST POINT RAILROAD COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

Willis WEST, Admr., etc., of Simmie L.
West, Deceased.

(.....Ga.....)

- *1. To create the relation of master and servant there must be some contract or some act on the part of one person which expressly or impliedly recognizes another as his servant.
2. One into whose service another volunteers without his assent, express or implied, is not under the duties of a master toward a servant, or required to anticipate or discover the peril of such volunteer, but is only bound, relatively to such volunteer, to use care not to injure him after notice of his peril.
3. Where a defendant has been guilty of no breach of any duty owing to the plaintiff, there can be no legal liability.
4. Where a volunteer engages in work undertaken in compliance with an unauthorized request of an employee of the defendant, the latter owes him none of the obligations of a master toward a servant, but is only bound to use care not to injure him after notice of his peril. The fact that the volunteer is of tender years, and without sufficient mental capacity to appreciate the danger, while it might be an element of notice to the defendant of the peril of the volunteer, cannot change the relations of the parties, or impose upon the defendant any duty not ordinarily imposed by law relatively to volunteers.

5. If the defendant had been negligent, and relied upon the concurrent negligence of the plaintiff to defeat or diminish the recovery, then the infancy of the plaintiff would be material to the determination of his diligence; but plaintiff's infancy cannot change the relations of the parties, or supply the place of negligence on the part of the defendant.

(January 26, 1905.)

ERROR to the City Court of Newnan to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of his intestate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Dorsey, Brewster, & Howell, for plaintiff in error:

Deceased was a volunteer.

Rhodes v. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. 84 Ga. 320, 20 Am. St. Rep. 362, 10 S. E. 922.

If the evidence shows that a volunteer was not authorized to perform, as a servant, the work in question, the party for whom the work was done owed him no obligations as a master.

Simmons, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

An action for damages for personal injuries was brought by Simmie L. West, a minor, by his next friend, against the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company. Pending this action Simmie L. West died, and his duly appointed and qualified administrator was made a party in his stead. To the petition as originally filed the defendant had demurred. Subsequently the petition was amended in several particulars. The defendant renewed its grounds of demurrer, and also filed other demurrers to 67 L. R. A.

the petition as amended. The court overruled the demurrers, and the defendant excepted. The petition, after amendment, set up the following facts: On the morning of June 14, 1901, a freight train of the defendant became uncoupled because of a defective or broken coupling. For the purpose of repairing such coupling, and while the repairs were being made, a portion of the train stood upon and obstructed the crossing. One of the tools used by the train hands in repairing the coupling was an iron crowbar weighing about 50 pounds. While the repairs were in progress, young West, who came thither on his way to perform an errand for his father, after waiting for some time for the crossing to be cleared, went to the caboose or cab of the train to inquire when the crossing would be clear. When he approached the caboose, one of the brakemen on the train came up with a lot of tools which had been used to repair the coupling, among them the above-mentioned iron crowbar, and requested West to ascend the platform of the caboose and open the door so that the tools could be laid in the caboose. West, seeing no danger to himself in complying with this request, ascended the platform, and was proceeding to unbolt and open the door, when the brakeman handed him the crowbar, standing it up endwise, and letting one end rest on the platform, and requested West to take hold of it. West took hold of the crowbar, and was supporting it with one hand, the other being upon the door knob, and West being in the act of opening the door, when "suddenly and violently, and without warning signal, and without warning to" West, the train was coupled together, the section attached to the engine coming in contact with the other section, of which the caboose formed a part, "with great force, and said train was then suddenly and quickly jerked and put in motion and with a sudden jerk, by reason and on account of which sudden coupling and contact and sudden starting and jerking of said train" West was thrown back and down, the door slammed upon his right hand, and the crowbar fell upon and broke his right leg. West suffered great pain in his hand and leg. The injury to the leg resulted in necrosis, and the leg had finally to be amputated. When West was requested by the brakeman to ascend the platform and open the door of the caboose and take hold of the crowbar, both sections of the train were perfectly still, and he had no reason to suppose or presume that they would be suddenly coupled together with great force and jar, and the train put in motion with a jerk, without notice to him. The brakeman was a man of long experience, and apparently about fifty years of age, while West was only fifteen years and two months of age, and "without mental capacity, knowledge, and experience to know or comprehend that there was any danger" in complying with the request of the brakeman, "and without sufficient knowledge, mental capacity, and experience to avoid any danger" to which so doing might subject him. On account and by reason of West's tender years and inexperience he did not know, while he was on the platform, that the train might be coupled together suddenly and violently, and without warning, and put in motion with a sudden jerk. At the time of the injury "West did not have the mental capacity, knowledge, and experience of an ordinary boy fourteen years old." West was without fault, and in the exercise of due care, diligence, and circumspection, and his injuries were due wholly to the carelessness and gross negligence of defendant, its officers, agents, and employees. The petition charged that "defendant was negligent on account of its said employee requesting [West] to ascend the platform of said cab and open said door, and in handing said iron crowbar up to [West] with the request that [West] take hold of same; and especially was defendant, its agents, officers, and employees, grossly negligent in suddenly, violently, and with great force and jar coupling said sections of said train, and causing them to come in contact as aforesaid, and then suddenly putting said train in motion with a jerk while petitioner occupied the position hereinbefore described, and in so coupling and starting said train without signal, and without any notice or warning to [West]." Damages were laid in the sum of $15,000.

The defendant's demurrers were based upon several grounds. It demurred generally, and on the ground that the petition failed to show that on the occasion when West was injured defendant owed him any duty, or that the acts and doings of the defendant were any breach of any duty owing by the defendant to West. The other grounds of demurrer it is unnecessary here to mention.

1. It is virtually conceded that West was a volunteer, and not a servant of the defendant. There was no contract of employment, nor any act on the part of any authorized agent of the defendant which expressly or impliedly recognized West as the servant of the company. Rhodes v. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. 84 Ga. 320, 20 Am. St. Rep. 362, 10 S. E. 922. "A person cannot be subjected, without his own consent or that of his agent, to the obligations which the law has attached to the contract of hiring." 2 Labatt, Mast. & S. § 630.

2. One who, without any employment whatever, or at the request of a servant who has no authority to employ other servants, voluntarily undertakes to perform service for the master, is a mere volunteer, and not entitled to that degree of diligence on the part of the master which the latter is bound to exercise with reference to his servants. There are a great many cases which state that such a volunteer stands in the place of a servant, but in each such case which we have examined this position was taken in order to defeat the claim of the volunteer. In other words, the court held that the volunteer certainly stood in no better position than that of a servant, and that, conceding he stood in the position of a servant, he could not recover. Such cases not infrequently arise where, if the volunteer had been a servant, he could not recover because injured by the negligence of a fellow servant in the course of their common employment. A number of such cases will be found in the note to § 631 of Labatt on Master and Servant, vol. 2. In Georgia the rule as to the liability of the master for the negligence of fellow servants had been abrogated in railroad cases, and the claim of a volunteer cannot be defeated by treating him as though he were a servant. It is necessary to assign him to his true position. He is not a servant, and cannot charge the defendant with the obligations of a master. The defendant does not, as master, owe the volunteer any duty whatever. The obligations of master and servant do not arise between them. The defendant is only bound not to injure the volunteer wilfully, and to use care not to injure him after notice of his peril. See Church v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 50 Minn. 218, 16 L. R. A. 861, 52 N. W. 647; Everhart v. Terre Haute & I. R. Co. 78 Ind. 292, 41 Am. Rep. 567.

3. The petition clearly does not make out a case of injuries inflicted wilfully, or because of a want of care after notice of West's peril. There is no allegation that the defendant's agents or employees who coupled and moved the train knew anything of West's danger or of his position. Even the brakeman who requested West to get upon the platform does not appear to have had any notice that West's mental capacity was less than that usually possessed by boys of his age. The train was at a public crossing, but it does not appear that West could not get by it, or that this had anything to do with his compliance with the brakeman's request to assist him. The brakeman does not appear to have had any authority to make West or anyone else the servant of the defendant. There is no allegation that the brakeman had any authority, and his request cannot be imputed to the defendant. The brakeman had no authority to invite West to get upon the platform, and the defendant was under no duty to anticipate that he would do so, or to see that no injury resulted. Leaving out of consideration the minority of West, the case is simply that of a volunteer who places himself in a position of danger, and who is injured by acts of the defendant, which, relatively to a volunteer, do not constitute negligence. So far as appears from the petition, the defendant was guilty of no breach of any duty which it owed West, and therefore cannot be liable. Legal liability arises only upon the breach of some legal duty.

4. We think enough has been said to show that, had West been an adult, the defendant would not have been liable. West voluntarily engaged in work undertaken in compliance with the unauthorized request of the brakeman, and the defendant owed West none of the obligations which grow out of the relation of master and servant. The defendant was bound, through its agents and employees, to use care not to injure West after notice of his peril, and was bound not to injure him wilfully, but no breach of this duty appears. Defendant in error, however, contended that the demurrers were properly overruled because of the allegations as to the minority and mental deficiency of West, relying upon the case of Rhodes v. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. 84 Ga. 320, 20 Am. St. Rep. 362, 10 S. E. 922. After examining that case, and also many decisions by other courts, we think this contention unsound. Infancy or want of mental capacity on the part of the plaintiff is often very material where the defense calls in question the plaintiff's own diligence. In other words, where the defendant has been negligent, and claims that the plaintiff could, by the exercise of due care, have avoided the injury, or that the plaintiff did not use due diligence to lessen the damages, or that plaintiff's negligence contributed to the injury, then the plaintiff's infancy or mental capacity is material. Whenever the plaintiff's diligence is under investigation, his mental capacity is relevant, as will be seen in many decisions in this and other states. In investigating the diligence of the defendant, the plaintiff's infancy or evident lack of mental capacity may sometimes become relevant as an element of notice to defendant of the plaintiff's peril. But in determining the relations of the parties the infancy of the plaintiff is not material, nor can it supply the place of negligence on the part of the defendant. West was a mere volunteer. His age and mental capacity could not change this. If young and mentally deficient, he was no less a volunteer, relatively to the defendant, than if old and experienced. The defendant did not, as master, owe him any duty. The defendant was not guilty of a breach of any duty which it did owe him. The infancy of West could not supply the place of negligence on the part of the defendant, and there can be no recovery. The Rhodes Case, 84 Ga. 320. 20 Am. St. Rep. 362, 10 S. E. 922, seems to conflict with this view, though the headnote recognized that there could be no recovery unless the defendant had been negligent. The decision in that case is by but two judges, and not binding, and, in so far as it conflicts with what is here ruled, will not be followed. It has more than once been criticized by able law writers (3 Elliott, Railroads, § 1305; 2 Labatt, Mast. & S. § 636), and is, we think, unsound. We are clear in the present case that West's lack of mental capacity did not change his relations toward the defendant, or impose upon it any of the obligations which ordinarily arise from the relation of master and servant; that the petition showed no breach of duty toward West as a volunteer; that West's infancy cannot supply the place of negligence on the part of the defendant; and that the court below erred in overruling the defendant's demurrer. See, in relation to the relevancy of the volunteer's infancy, Flower v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 69 Pa. 210. 8 Am. Rep. 251, and the numerous cases cited in the notes in the two text-books last above cited.

Under the above view of the case it will not be necessary to notice all of defendant's special demurrers.

Judgment reversed.

I. Introduction.

The position of the court in Bostwick v. Mutual L. Ins. Co., stated briefly, is that the principles of caveat emptor apply to the sale of an insurance policy with as much rigidity as in the case of a sale of merchandise; that the insured is under obligation to inspect it within a reasonable time after receipt, to ascertain whether or not it corresponds to his "order," to wit, his application; that, if a fraud or mistake in the preparation of the policy has occurred, rendering it different in terms from that ordered, and is discoverable upon a reasonable inspection, the insured must immediately rescind or draw the insurer's attention to it; that retention after receipt is "evidence of assent, regardless of the fraud, or, if not such, of inexcusable negligence, waiving judicial remedies for fraud;" that the only circumstance which will excuse such retention is a misleading statement or representation on the part of the insurer at the time of the delivery of the policy, reasonably justifying the insured in a failure to inspect it; that the ground of the rule is a public policy, "not based upon any consideration for the party who has been guilty of the false representations, to whom no duty is owing, but upon the conviction that the interests of society are best served by the applicalying upon positive false statements on the part of that other, or of someone for whose conduct he is responsible, as to its import, applies only where the deceit is practised at the time, and in the transaction, of such signing.

6. If a person contracts with another for an article to be delivered, or gives an order therefor, and thereafter a thing is delivered to him ostensibly in compliance with the order or fulfilment of the contract, unless, at the time thereof or within a reasonable time thereafter, he notifies such other that such article will not be accepted as satisfying the contract or order, he will be conclusively presumed to have waived all departures therein from the thing bargained for which are obvious to the senses by ordinary exercise thereof. This is subject to what follows.

7. The reasonable time mentioned in the foregoing rule commences to run from the time the person receiving the article has reasonable opportunity to observe its defects, unless the opposite party, by fraud or deceit, prevents such person from examining it, or induces him not to do so; but such person cannot successfully refer merely to deception practised upon him at the time of his giving the order or entering into the contract, to excuse failure to observe obvious departures in the thing delivered from that bargained for, at or within a reasonable time after the delivery.

8. Upon the reception of an article by a person under the circumstances stated in the two foregoing rules, nothing occurring then for which the opposite party is responsible, reasonably preventing him from using, or inducing him not to use, his senses so as to discover obvious departures therein from the thing bargained tion of the rule, Vigilantibus, et non dormientibus, succurrunt iura."

It should be noted at the start that the rule is applied to a case in which the fraud appears to have been in regard to the provisions or terms of the policy. A subsequent case from this jurisdiction, Welch v. Fire Assn. 120 Wis. 456, 98 N. W. 227, makes it clear that the same rule will not be applied to defeat the insured where the mistake or fraud appears in connection with facts concerning the risk which have been disclosed to the insurer's agent. Another principle, viz., estoppel, is here applied to prevent the company from denying, not only the imputed knowledge of the fact disclosed, but also that the policy was not issued in accordance with known facts. And this will be applied although the policy contains terms clearly inconsistent with such facts, states that no waiver is binding unless indorsed, and the policy comes into the hands of the insured some time before loss.

The latter case does not discuss the question of waiver of the fraud or mistake by the insured, although the facts clearly show a retention of the policy by him with the error apparent upon its face. The majority of cases in which fraud or mistake appears either grant or refuse relief to the insured in similar manner upon some independent theory without discussing the effect of retention, although that fact appears in the case.

Perhaps the largest number of such cases apply the principle of the estoppel of the insurer through the knowledge of its agent, of which the Welch Case, above mentioned, is an example. Other illustrative cases are Ellenberger v. Protective Mut. F. Ins. Co. 89 Pa. 464; O'Brien v. Home Ben. Soc. 117 N. Y. 311, 22 N. E. 954; Sternaman v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 170 N. Y. 13, 57 L. R. A. 318, 88 Am. St. Rep. 625, 62 N. E. 763; Royal Neighbors of America v. Boman, 177 Ill. 27, 69 Am. St. Rep. 201, 52 N. E. 264; Continental Ins. Co. v. Pearce, 39 Kan. 396, 7 Am. St. Rep. 537, 18 Pac. 291; Mallhoit v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 87 Me. 374, 47 Am. St. Rep. 336, 32 Atl. 989; North American F. Ins. Co. v. Throop, 22 Mich. 146, 7 Am. Rep. 638; Hartford Ins. Co. v. Haas, 87 Ky. 531, 2 L. R. A. 64, 9 S. W. 720; German-American Ins. Co. v. Yeagley (Ind.) 71 N. E. 897.

Relief is frequently given in equity simply upon proof of fraud or mistake. Examples of this class of cases are, Snell v. Atlantic F. & M. Ins. Co. 98 U. S. 85, 25 L. ed. 52; Maryland 67 L. R. A.

Home F. Ins. Co. v. Kimmell, 89 Md. 437, 43 Atl. 764; Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Owens, 81 Mo. App. 201; Rockford Ins. Co. v. Hildreth, 45 Ill. App. 428; Delouche v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 69 N. H. 587, 45 Atl. 414; Longhurst v. Star Ins. Co. 19 Iowa, 364; Fisher v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 160 Mass. 386, 39 Am. St. Rep. 495, 35 N. E. 849.

On the other hand, the parol-evidence rule is frequently applied to hold the insured to his policy, regardless of fraud or mistake affecting its terms, although the effect of retention, in this connection, is not discussed. Prominent cases in this large group are, Northern Assur. Co. v. Grand View Bldg. Assn. 183 U. S. 308, 46 L. ed. 213, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 133 (see same case on subsequent suit to reform, infra, IV., a, 3, (a)); German-American Ins. Co. v. Davis, 131 Mass. 316; Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Webster, 69 Ill. 392; Franklin F. Ins. Co. v. Martin, 40 N. J. L. 568, 29 Am. Rep. 271; Western Assur. Co. v. Rector, 85 Ky. 294, 3 S. W. 415.

It is clear, then, that a discussion of the mere effect of retention by the insured upon mistake or fraud in connection with the policy will not fully present the attitude of the courts toward fraud or mistake in an insurance policy, where the element of its retention by the insured is present. The note is, however, confined to cases throwing light upon this single phase of the question, and does not attempt to include those in which the element is present, but not adverted to or discussed.

Neglect of the insured to read his application before signing, though a kindred subject, is not within the scope of the note. See Ryan v. World Mut. L. Ins. Co. 41 Conn. 168, 19 Am. Rep. 490; Germania L. Ins. Co. v. Lunkenheimer, 127 Ind. 536, 26 N. E. 1082.

The question of agency likewise, though an important one, is outside the scope of the note, and is omitted, except where the insertion of the "agency clause" is treated as a fraud, and the retention of the policy as a waiver thereof is discussed.

II. Time of misrepresentation.

It may be deduced from the opinion in Bostwick v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. that the insured signed applications calling for such policies as they received, but that their negligence in signing the applications without reading and ascertaining their contents was excused by the fact that they were induced to do so by the misrep-for, the rule applies that the law requires men, in their dealings with each other, to exercise proper diligence and apply their attention to those particulars which may be supposed to be within reach of their judgment, and not to close their eyes to means of information which are accessible to them. Vigilantibus, et non dormientibus, jura subveniunt.

9. The rule that contributory negligence is not a defense to an intentional wrong does not apply to a situation where negligence is so inexcusable as not to be really a contributing cause, but to be really a cause intervening between the wrong and the injury as the real producing cause thereof.

10. He who is inexcusably negligent in a business transaction forfeits the right to judicial remedies for relief, and not because of any favor or indulgence which the law extends to the wrongdoer, but because of failure on the part of the injured person to exercise that care for his own protection which the policy of the law requires as a condition of its protection, such policy being to aid only those who exercise some reasonable care to guard their own interests.

11. Negligence of a person in not asserting his right as against another by whom he has been defrauded in a business transaction, is not a defense, strictly so called, to an action on the former's part for redress, but is evidence of submission to or waiver of the wrong, more or less strong according to the circumstances, and may be conclusive evidence thereof; or it may be so gross as to forfeit such person's right to judicial redress; or, in connection with some injury to the wrongdoer, it may operate to estop such person from claiming redress for the wrong first inflicted.

representations as to their contents made by the agent at the time of such signature. Their subsequent negligence, however, in failing to inspect the policies upon receipt, and thereby to ascertain whether they conformed to the agreement with the agent, is deemed inexcusable,—with the exception of the one case in which the agent made a representation at the time of the delivery of the policy, which had the effect of misleading the insured and inducing him, as a reasonable man, to believe that his policy conformed to the oral agreement. It is thus seen that the only fraud which the court regards as sufficient to justify a failure to inspect a policy on receipt is one which accompanies the delivery.

In few of the cases dealing with the question in hand does the circumstance of fraud or misrepresentation at the delivery of the policy appear. The underlying principle is well brought out, however, in McKenzie v. Planters' Ins. Co. 9 Helsk. 261, where the court, in an action by the insured upon a policy in which no allowance had been made for the additional insurance disclosed to the agent at the time of application, instructed the jury that, "If you are satisfied from the testimony that the plaintiff made the statement to the agent of the company, that he intended to take out other insurance, when this insurance was being effected, and the agent agreed to this, and the policy was issued upon this understanding, and that by the misstatements and misrepresentations of the agent afterward, acting within his apparent authority, the plaintiff was kept in ignorance of the provisions of the contract in this respect, the company will now be estopped from setting up these stipulations of the policy. On the contrary, if the agent made no such misstatements, and the policy was delivered to plaintiff, he was bound to know its provisions, and, if he negligently failed to open it, he would be bound to know its provisions; and, if you find this state of facts, you will find for defendant."

The appellate court sustained this instruction as unexceptionable, and further stated that "It is clear that this parol evidence was incompetent to alter or contradict the written contract, but it is equally clear that it was not offered or admitted for such purpose. It was offered to show that he was induced to apply for the policy by the fraudulent misstatements and omissions of the agent, and that he was kept in ignorance of the existence of the stipulations in the policy by fraudulent conduct and statements of the agent, which induced him not to open and read the policy, . . . and were clearly competent for the purpose for which they were offered."

In Keller v. Equitable F. Ins. Co. 28 Ind. 170, where the insurer's agent represented to an illiterate applicant, both at the time of the application, and at the delivery of the policy, that there would be no further liability after the payment of the first premium, whereas the application contained a further premium note, in consideration of which the policy was expressly issued, the court says: "The agent of the appellee not only falsely stated the contents of the instrument, but, by a fraudulent pretense, prevented its examination. In this case there can be no question of delay. If the party was excusable in receiving the policy, believing it to be what he had contracted for, there was no requirement that he should thereafter examine it, until, by the notice of assessment, his suspicions were excited." More than two years had elapsed between the issuance of the policy and the levy of the assessment.

So, in Continental Ins. Co. v. Ruckman, 127 Ill. 364, 11 Am. St. Rep. 121, 20 N. E. 77, it is stated by the court to be "doubtful whether even the delivery of the policy to him was notice of its contents, when that fact is taken in connection with his inability to read it, and Milne's [agent's] assurance that it was drafted in accordance with the contract." The policy was reformed by the insertion of a thirty-days' vacancy clause, pursuant to the agreement with the soliciting agent at the time of application.

On the contrary, a representation by a soliciting agent on delivery of a policy, that "It was all right," is held in Steinberg v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 49 Mo. App. 255, to be insufficient excuse for the insurer's failure to examine the policy and discover that allowance had not been made for additional insurance disclosed to the agent. Four and a half months retention without objection would bar a rescission under the authority of American Ins. Co. v. Nelberger, 74 Mo. 167, infra, III., b, 6; much less would reformation after loss be then granted. And the agent's statement on delivery does "not affect the question one way or the other."

It appears that a misrepresentation at the time of the delivery of the policy occurred in the following cases, but that this fact plays no part in the decision, and they are noted in their appropriate sections within: Mutual Reserve

12. If a person, in a business transaction with another, is deceived by the latter to his injury, such person may rescind the transaction within a reasonable time after he discovers, or has reasonable opportunity to discover, the fraud, constructive knowledge thereof being just as effective as actual knowledge to set the time for rescission running and to mark its limits.

13. If a person receives a policy of insurance ostensibly in response to an application therefor, which he signed and parted with in the belief, induced by the fraud of the agent taking the same, that it called for a policy different from that which it called for in fact, he is bound, as a matter of law, to examine the policy within a reasonable time after it comes to his hand, and to discover obvious departures therein from the one which he supposed he was to get, and promptly, upon discovering the same, to rescind the transaction, give the company due notice thereof, and do all on his part which justice requires to restore the former situation, or he will be held to have accepted the policy as satisfying his application, so as to be precluded from rescinding the same.

14. The reasonable time for discovering that the policy differs from the one supposed to have been applied for in the circumstances stated in the foregoing rule commences to run immediately upon the reception of the paper, nothing occurring then to reasonably excuse the applicant for omitting to examine his contract. In such circumstances four and one half months' delay in discovering the fraud and exercising the right of rescission is, as a matter of law, too long a time.

15. If, in the situation stated in the last foregoing paragraph, the element be added of the applicant for insurance be-

The effect of misrepresentation after delivery, upon objection by the insured to the terms of his policy, is noted infra, VIII., c.

It is clear from these cases, and from the many others noted herein in which relief is given against fraud or mistake where there is no misrepresentation at the time of the delivery of the policy, that the distinction made in Bostwick v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. between misrepresentations at the time of application and at the time of delivery of the policy as justification for failure to inspect the same and become acquainted with its contents, even if sound, has not yet been generally noticed, much less established.

III. Mistake or fraud as to terms of policy.

a. Character of policy.

If the principle caveat emptor is to be applied to insurance policies, it is certainly most applicable under circumstances such as those appearing in Bostwick v. Mutual L. Ins. Co., etc., where the misrepresentation is as to the qualities of the article to be delivered,—the terms of the policy. It most nearly corresponds to the obligation of a vendee of chattels to inspect them upon delivery for the purpose of ascertaining whether they fulfil his order, and to reject them if they do not. Retention without objection may be presumed to be an acceptance as fulfilling that order, or as evidence that the vendee waives the variance and accepts them as sent. This would be conclusive after the lapse of a reasonable time within which to make objection. A failure to object by reason of ignorance of the variance, due to omission of inspection, is chargeable to inexcusable negligence.

This is the attitude of Bostwick v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. The authorities are not all one way, but the decision has much support.

Thus, in Massey v. Cotton States L. Ins. Co. 70 Ga. 794, the right to rescind and recover premiums, or to compel the issuance of a paid-up policy, is held to have been lost by the insured where he retained the policy delivered and paid premiums thereon for ten years, although at the time of the application it was represented to him by the agent that in ten years the policy would become paid-up, whereas in fact the policy issued was merely an ordinary life policy. The retention is said to have worked an acceptance of the policy issued and a waiver of the mistake. "The question in this case is," says the court, "Could the plaintiff, by ordinary diligence, have discovered the truth as to the representations of defendant's agent? If he could, then he is too late with his bill. The policy which he received put him upon notice as to its character and whether it was an ordinary life policy or a ten-years' paid-up policy. Code, § 3126. 'If a party, by reasonable diligence, could have had knowledge of the truth, equity will not relieve.' Nothing but gross negligence could have kept the plaintiff in ignorance of the truth in this case, and in such case the inference is, the plaintiff acquiesced in the action of the defendant and accepted this policy as it is, and waived the policy which he originally wished to have issued to him." It will be noted, however, that the statutory provision played an important part in the decision of that case, so that its weight would be lessened in a jurisdiction where such a statute did not exist.

A subsequent case from the same jurisdiction, Leigh v. Brown, 99 Ga. 258, 25 S. E. 621, is to like effect. The lapse of "some months" after the receipt of a policy of a different style from that for which applicant contracted is said to prevent the insured from setting up the mistake in defense to an action upon his premium note. He should have offered to return the policy within "a reasonable time."

Like in principle, though it is found that the rescission was made within a reasonable time, is Jones v. Gilbert, 93 Ga. 604, 20 S. E. 48. An application for a ten-year endowment policy being filed by a ten-payment life policy, ing fraudulently deterred from examining his policy by something occurring at the time of the delivery thereof to him, four and one half months' delay in discovering the fraud is not, as a matter of law, so long as to forfeit the right of rescission.

16. The existence of a cause of action at law to recover the consideration parted with upon a contract, on the ground of fraud, presupposes the actual termination of the contract because of the fraud, and that requires a repudiation of such contract by the insured person in toto, or so far as justice may require, and an unconditional offer on his part, so far as justice may require, to restore the wrongdoer to his former situation, or a waiver of such offer by such conduct on the latter's part as to clearly indicate that a tender to him of that which he parted with in the transaction would be useless because he would not accept it.

It was there held that the insured had not lost his right to rescind by retaining the policy six weeks without objection, where he thereupon sought to return the same. After such a repudiation he was not liable to the agent on a note for the amount of the premium advanced by the latter, although the policy had remained in his possession thereafter through such agent's refusal to accept it.

An instruction was asked by the company in Equitable Life Assur. Soc. v. Maverick (Tex. Civ. App.) 78 S. W. 500, that, "if the plaintiff failed to avail himself of the means at hand of ascertaining the truth or falsity of the . . . [defendant's] representations, he was estopped to complain of their untruth." The insured sought to rescind the policy upon the ground that the policy received by him did not correspond to that which the agent had promised at the time of the application and the giving of the premium note. In upholding the refusal of the lower court to give the instruction demanded, the court states that, "if the plaintiff knew the truth of the matter, he could not claim that he was deceived. But, if he did not know it, and relied on the statement of the agent at the time, but could have informed himself of it by means of information at hand, he is not necessarily estopped. This would depend upon whether or not he was inexcusably negligent in not informing himself." This is the basis of the decision in Bostwick v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. What will be regarded as sufficient to excuse inspection does not seem to have been yet decided in Texas.

Three months is held, in Kling v. Mayes, 3 Ind. Terr. 362, 58 S. W. 573, to be sufficient time within which the insured should make himself acquainted with the terms of his policy. Thereafter he is estopped to deny an acceptance thereof in spite of misrepresentations of the agent at the time of the application concerning it.

The insured was induced by the insurer's agent in Zallee v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 12 Mo. App. 111, to surrender a previous forfeitable policy and apply for one which was represented to him to be nonforfeitable after the payment of two premiums. The new policy was delivered by the agent with the remark: "Here is your nonforfeiting policy." It appeared that premiums were forfeitable, no matter how many had been paid, unless surrender was made within the year following the last payment, but 67 L. R. A.

17. If a judgment in an equity case or an action at law tried by the court be reversed on appeal to this court, and there is an unsolved question of fact that must be determined before final judgment can be rendered, and there are conflicting reasonable inferences as to how such issue should be solved, rendering it doubtful which way is the right of the matter, lest injustice may be done by the exercise of jurisdiction to decide the issue here as an original matter, the court will remand the cause to the trial court to determine such issue and then to apply the law to the case as directed.

(Cassaday, Ch. J., dissents in part.)

(March 11, 1902.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Rock County that this provision of the policy was not drawn to insured's attention, and, by reason of his omission to read the policy, he did not discover it during the ten years for which it was held. Failing to surrender the policy within the required time, and the company refusing thereafter to issue a paid-up policy, relief was sought in equity by way of rescission, but was refused. "The plaintiff was guilty of the grossest laches in reading neither his policy nor his premium receipt," says the court. "It was his plainest duty, when the policy was presented to him, as the consummation of the previous talk between himself and the agent, to read it. After he had accepted it and acted on it for years, it is too late to apply to a court of equity for relief grounded upon his recollection of a conversation between himself and the agent of the company, the particulars of which that agent has, very naturally, forgotten."

An application for a policy on which the premiums should be payable at a "level rate" was filed in Ijams v. Provident Sav. Life Assur. Soc. (Mo.) 84 S. W. 51, by a policy in which the premiums were to remain the same so long as the application of dividends would keep them down; if the dividends were insufficient the premiums were to be higher. It was not clear that the agent did more than explain the system to the insured at the application, or that there was any further fraud or misrepresentation at the time of delivery of the policy when the agent handed it to the insured with the statement, "Here is your level rate policy," and pointed to the phrase in the policy. But the insured claimed that he had been deceived into believing that his application was for a policy in which the premiums would be absolutely uniform, and that his policy conformed to this application. While the court denied the existence of any fraud, it says that, even assuming a misrepresentation by the agent, "that did and would not relieve plaintiff from the responsibility of examining for himself to ascertain if the policies, when delivered to him by the company, did or did not contain provisions contrary to his understanding of the explanation of the plan of 'level rate insurance' as same was made to him by said agent . . . hence, since no fraud or deceit was practised, or attempted to be practised, upon plaintiff to induce him to accept or receive the policies without examination to ascertain what were their provisions and terms, and since he has taken them and en-in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover back premiums paid upon life-insurance policies which were alleged to have been different from those called for by the contract. Reversed.

Statement by Marshall, J.:

Action to recover money paid to defendant for three insurance policies. Plaintiff claimed that George S. Parker, Arthur H. Barrington, and himself were each fraudulently induced to sign an application for an insurance policy of a different character than he intended; that each, as soon as he discovered the fraud, repudiated the transaction; and that Parker and Barrington thereafter, and before the commencement of this action, assigned to plaintiff joyed the protection they afforded for seven years without complaint, the trial court was right . . . in giving its instruction that upon the testimony offered plaintiff was not entitled to recover."

See also Dwinnell v. Felt, 90 Minn. 9, 95 N. W. 579, and Susquehanna Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Swank, 102 Pa. 17, infra, III., b. 5.

The contrary view, however, that the insured may rely upon the insurer to supply the character of policy agreed upon with its agent, and is not chargeable with negligence through failure to inspect the same upon delivery, finds support in respectable authority.

Thus, the insured, in Mowat v. Provident Life Assur. Soc. 27 Ont. App. Rep. 875, applied for a policy the premium on which should not be changed during its life. A special slip written by himself and attached to the application made special provision for this style of policy. The policy issued in apparent compliance with this request reserved to the company the right to alter and increase the rate when necessary. This provision was not drawn to insured's attention, and the latter retained the policy, paying the premiums thereon at the agreed rate for seven years. The eighth premium was raised by the company. Discovering then, for the first time, the clause in the policy reserving to the company such right, the insured objected to payment. He asserted the fraud, and sought to recover the premiums previously paid. "He had no actual notice of the contents of the policy," says Osler, J. A., "and, unless the defendants brought to his notice that it was delivered to him as a counter proposal, there could, it seems, be no imputed knowledge of the contents, inasmuch as there was no obligation binding on him to read it. . . . Delivered to him as it was, without any statement that the annual premium would not, or might not, be the same throughout the plaintiff's life, he might well assume that it was a policy in accordance with the special terms which he had stipulated for in that respect. It will hardly be denied that, if the plaintiff had immediately, or within a year after payment of the first premium, discovered what the terms of the policy really were, he might have repudiated it, and have brought an action to recover back the premium he had paid. I do not see that the subsequent lapse of time places him in a different position, except so far as it suggests the probability that he might have ex- 67 L. R. A.

their claims for the return of the money paid to the defendant. The answer put in issue all the allegations constituting the alleged fraud. There was evidence tending to show that defendant's agent and plaintiff negotiated, from time to time for several days, in respect to the latter taking a $10,000 policy of life insurance in the defendant company; that the agent strongly recommended what he called a "5-per-cent debenture policy;" that plaintiff, from first to last, insisted that he did not want a policy that could not be paid up in ten years; that he would take a ten-payment policy and no other,—one that would be fully paid in ten years; that the agent, from first to last, continued to recommend a 5-per-cent debenture policy, but did not say that such examined the policy and discovered the error. The evidence rebuts the force of this suggestion." Moss, J. A., was of the same opinion. "There was nothing dehors the policy," he says, "to draw his attention to the fact that the defendants were not assenting to his application, and, instead, were sending him a new proposal; and under the circumstances it was not unreasonable for him to suppose that it was a policy answering the terms of the application. It imposes no hardship upon an insurance company to require of it that if, in answer to a written application, it sends a policy not intended to be in terms of the application, it shall notify the applicant of the particulars wherein they differ. . . . I think the plaintiff was, under the circumstances, excused from any charge of negligence or laches in not reading the policy, for he might reasonably assume that it was according to the application. That being so, he cannot be charged with any subsequent negligence or laches."

Six weeks elapsed in McCarty v. New York L. Ins. Co. 74 Minn. 530, 77 N. W. 428, between the delivery of the policy and its inspection by the insured. It was then at once discovered that the agent had misrepresented its character, and the insured immediately rescinded and attempted to recover his premium. To the company's defense, based upon insured's delay in rescission, the court makes a decided response. "The next contention is," it says, "that, if the plaintiff was deceived by the representations of the agent, it was the result of his own folly or negligence. For, if he had taken the least pains to examine or read the application when he signed it, or the policy when he accepted it, he could and would have readily discovered the falsity of the representations. If there is anything well settled by the decisions of this and other courts, it is that, as between the original parties to the contract, one who has intentionally deceived the other to his prejudice is not to be heard to say, in defense of the charge of fraud, that the innocent party ought not to have trusted him. It does not lie in the mouth of the party guilty of making the false representations to say to the other party, 'You were a fool, or negligent, in believing and relying upon my statements.'"

This decision was before the court in Boswick v. Mutual L. Ins. Co., and was there stated to have recognized the rule of caveat emptor contended for. The basis for this statement ap-policy would require annual payments for life; that finally the agent said he would obtain for plaintiff what the latter wanted, and made out an application, representing that it was in accordance with the latter's wishes; that plaintiff had the paper in his possession for a considerable length of time, and had ample opportunity to read and understand it, but did not do so, relying entirely upon the belief that the agent had written it in accordance with the understanding which had been reached; that the policy was received about April 1, 1897, accompanied by a letter, the opening lines of which were to the effect that it was a 5-per-cent debenture annual-premium-payment policy, such as the agent had urged plaintiff to take; that the letter further explained that the payment upon the policy would be $2 less per year than had been talked, and that $2 had been credited to plaintiff because he had given his paper for $1,064 when $1,062 was the proper amount; that when plaintiff received the policy he threw it into his drawer and did not examine it or pay any attention to it to discover whether it was according to his understanding or not; that circumstances led him to examine the policy some time thereafter, and that about August 22, 1897, he discovered that it was entirely different from the policy he was to obtain; that he thereupon notified defendant's agent of such fact and demanded an explanation; that considerable correspondence was subsequently had between plaintiff and the agent, appears in an extract from the first portion of the opinion: "It is not claimed that there was any unreasonable delay after plaintiff actually discovered the fraud, but the claim is that, if he had exercised reasonable diligence in examining his policy, he would have discovered it much sooner. The rule as generally laid down in the books is that the right of rescission accrues only after discovery of the fraud, and that delay is not imputable against the party defrauded, until he makes that discovery. But we have no doubt that there may be cases where the party is so grossly negligent in failing to use means of knowledge within his possession, which he was bound to avail himself of, that delay would be imputable to him, even before he actually discovered the fraud. Hence, perhaps a more accurate statement of the rule is that delay is not imputable to the party defrauded until he has sufficient knowledge of the fraud to make the delay material, or such means of knowledge as he was bound to avail himself of." This is deemed a question for the jury, even where the facts are undisputed, so long as reasonable minds may come to different conclusions.

But it should be borne in mind that the court had before it a case in which the insured had been compelled to pay his premium note to an innocent purchaser for value, and was seeking the aid of the court to secure reimbursement of its amount from the insurer.

Perhaps the court intended its expression to be taken as applying only to cases in which the rights of third parties were in litigation, or where the rights of third parties had intervened. Some weight is given to this explanation by the wording of the expression first quoted,—"as between the original parties to a contract." At any rate, the attitude upon the subject of retention, first quoted, has received affirmance in a later case, Otte v. Hartford L. Ins. Co. 88 Minn. 423, 97 Am. St. Rep. 532, 93 N. W. 608, infra, IV., b, 1, (a), where the court had both BOSTWICK V. MUTUAL L. INS. CO. and the Fletcher Case, 117 U. S. 519, 29 L. ed. 934, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 837, infra, IV., b, 1, (a), before it in counsel's brief.

b. Various provisions of policy.

1. Risks insured against.

A misrepresentation on the part of an agent as to the risks insured against by a policy is 67 L. R. A.

held in Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Henderson, 16 C. C. A. 390, 32 U. S. App. 536, 69 Fed. 762, to give the insured no rights outside of the terms of the policy as properly construed, where such terms are clear and unambiguous. In this case the agent had told the insured that the policy would cover a death under any circumstances, even at the hands of an assassin. The policy contained a provision expressly excepting liability in such case. Death resulting from such cause, the court held that no recovery could be had on the policy. "If Kepler [the agent] acted under a mistake," says the court, "it is evident that it consisted in failing to comprehend the class of risks that were covered by the policy; but a mistake of that kind, accompanied, though it may have been, by some misleading statements as to the risks covered by the policy, is surely not sufficient to warrant a reformation of the policy,—especially where no fraud was practised, or intended to be practised, upon the assured. It frequently happens that knowledge of material facts communicated to the agent of an insurance company by the assured, either prior or subsequent to the issuance of a policy, has the effect of waiving particular provisions found therein, or of estopping the company from claiming the benefit of such provisions; but where the class of risks intended to be insured against is clearly described in the policy, and the assured has a full and fair opportunity to read the instrument, the company will not be bound by representations made by its agent, in good faith, that the policy covers risks that are not in fact within its provisions. . . . In construing the provisions of a written agreement, and in determining its legal effect, the parties thereto act at arm's length if the agreement is couched in plain language and no fraud or deceit is practised. It is the duty of a person, when he becomes a party to a written contract, to examine its provisions, and determine for himself what obligations and what liabilities it imposes, and, if need be, to seek legal advice on that subject. This duty is equally imperative when a policy of insurance is taken out; and courts of equity cannot undertake to reform such an instrument merely because the legal effect of its provisions was misunderstood by the assured. Nor even on the ground that an agent of the insurer erroneously represented that the policy covered risks which the language of the instrument clearly shows that it did not resulting in an absolute repudiation of the policy by plaintiff on March 19, 1898. The evidence tended to show that Parker desired the agent to obtain for him a ten-payment policy; that he signed an application without reading it, supposing the agent had written it according to his request; that when his policy came he put it away without reading it, and did not examine the paper, or discover that it was not in accordance with his understanding, till about five months after it was received; that he then rescinded the insurance contract as far as it was possible for him to do so. The testimony as to Barrington was substantially the same. The evidence on the part of defendant was to the effect that the several applications for insurance were made in accordance with the understanding between the applicants and the agent, and that the policies were issued accordingly. The court decided that the application made by plaintiff was written by the agent and signed by plaintiff without his reading it, though he was perfectly competent to do so and to understand it, and that he had ample opportunity therefor; that the reason why he did not do so was because he relied upon the agent to write it in accordance with his request; that plaintiff desired the agent to write the application for a ten-year annual-payment policy, which he agreed to do; that he received the policy about April 1, 1897; that it was an annual-premium policy, but that he did not discover that fact till August 22, 1897; that within a reasonable cover, if the agent acted honestly, without artifice or any intent to defraud."

And in Cornelius v. Farmers' Ins. Co. 113 Iowa, 188, 84 N. W. 1037, an actual fraud by the agent was deemed waived. The applicant, an ignorant foreigner, unable to read English, requested a policy covering his property if it should become vacant. The soliciting agent explained that he could not insure it as vacant, but pretended to alter the application so as to call for a policy covering the property as a store-house or granary, and required an additional premium for this risk. No alteration had been made in the application in fact, and the policy covered the property only as an occupied dwelling. The retention of this policy was deemed an acceptance of its terms; and "the assured cannot now complain."

An opinion to the contrary, by the same court, on the rehearing of Dryer v. Security F. Ins. Co. (Iowa) 82 N. W. 494, a case on practically identical facts, is stated by the reporter in a footnote to the Cornelius case, 113 Iowa, 187, 84 N. W. 1037, to have been withdrawn and superseded by this decision, which must be taken as the present law of Iowa.

Exception is made in Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Ebert, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1008, 47 S. W. 865, in regard to accident insurance "tickets" issued in the hurry of travel. It appeared in this case that, in apparent compliance with an application by a woman for an accident policy insuring against loss of time as well as against death, the agent of the insurer, through fraud or mistake, issued a ticket expressly excepting women from insurance against loss of time. The acceptance of this ticket without examination, in the hurry of travel, was held to be no bar to a recovery on the policy for loss of time. "The face of the receipt clearly shows that the agent knew that the insured was a female, and he specifically insured her against loss of time, and it would be a harsh and unreasonable rule that would require her or her son, who acted to some extent for her, to examine the ticket fully to see whether it was a palpable contradiction of the contract entered into verbally and also reduced to writing. No such diligence should be required of a person in the hurry of travel."

2. Duration of insurance.

Co. 183 U. S. 25, 46 L. ed. 64, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 10, upon the authority of which the decision in Bostwick v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. was modified on rehearing, was twice fought through to the United States Supreme Court. It appeared in this case that at the time of the application the company's agent represented to the insured that payment of a single premium would carry the insurance for not only a year, but for an additional month of grace, which was given for the payment of the second premium. The policy as drawn made the second premium payable in less than a year from its date, in pursuance of a request of the agent, indorsed upon the application after it had left the hands of the insured, that it should be dated from the date of the application. The insured died after the expiration of the policy as written, but within the time which would have been covered had the policy been correctly dated. Pending an action upon the policy, the beneficiary filed a bill in equity to have it reformed so as to express the correct date. On appeal from the opinion of Shiras, J., of the district court, granting such reformation, the circuit court of appeals, Sanborn, J., writing the opinion, unanimously reversed the lower court's decision, and stated that "no representation, promise, or agreement made, or opinion expressed, in the previous parol negotiations, as to the terms or legal effect of the resulting written agreement, can be permitted to prevail, either at law or in equity, over the plain provisions and just interpretation of the contract, in the absence of some artifice or fraud which concealed its terms, and prevented the complainant from reading it." 50 C. C. A. 532, 57 U. S. App. 638, 87 Fed. 71. The Supreme Court refused a writ of certiorari to review this decision. 171 U. S. 687, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 944. In spite of this adverse ruling of the superior courts, the complainant pursued his action at law upon the policy as it stood, and proved the additional fact that the agent, at the time the policy was delivered, replied, in response to a query from the insured whether it covered thirteen months, that it did. Regarding the case at law as controlled by the decisions on the equity side of the court, Shiras, J., while reasserting his previous opinion that the company was liable, nevertheless rendered judgment in favor of the company. 90 Fed. 55.

The opinions in the circuit court of appeals, on the appeal from this decision, 40 C. C. A. length of time thereafter he tendered the policy back to defendant and demanded a restoration of his money and notes. The circumstances as to Parker and Barrington are of the same character. Before the commencement of this action they assigned their claims for restitution to plaintiff. The conclusion of law reached was that plaintiff was entitled to recover of the defendant the money paid on the several policies, aggregating $1,401.50, with interest upon each such payment from the time it was made with costs. Judgment was rendered accordingly.

119, 99 Fed. 864, are diverse, and contain, perhaps, the best discussion of the subject in hand pro and con to be found in the reports. Sanborn, J., restated his opinion on the former appeal, regarding the additional fact proved as immaterial. "The statement of the terms or effect of a written agreement," he says, "which one has in his hands and is about to make, and which he may read at his will, is not calculated to deceive, and is not an artifice or a fraud that will excuse his ignorance of its contents, because he has the patent means to verify the averment at his command. It is the written contract, itself, and not anyone's statement of its contents or of its effect, which binds the parties; and the law charges every party to an agreement with knowledge of this fact. In view of it, it is the duty of every man to see to it that every writing he signs or receives fairly and fully expresses his contract. He owes this duty to the other party to the contract, who generally acts, and often changes his position, in reliance upon it; and he owes it to the public, which, as a matter of policy, treats the writing as proof of the terms of the agreement. If he fails to discharge this duty,—if he fails to read his contract,—his ignorance of its contents is the result of his own negligence; and, in the absence of fraud or mutual mistake, he is thereby estopped from showing that its terms are other than those expressed by the writing. . . . The statement of the legal effect of the policies made by the agent of the insurance company when they were delivered does not abrogate or modify the terms or the meaning of the contracts." Thayer, J., concurred in the conclusion, finding no intentional fraud by the agent. But Caldwell, J., who had not been a member of the court on the former appeal, rendered a strong dissenting opinion (p. 135, 40 C. C. A., p. 872, 99 Fed.). After objecting to the application to insurance policies of "rules as harsh and technical as any that would be applied, under the rule of caveat emptor, to a trade between two horse jockeys," he reviews the facts and proceeds (p. 141, 40 C. C. A., p. 879, 99 Fed.): "When the policies were tendered under these circumstances, the insured would have been entirely justified in paying the premiums, and accepting the policies without reading them. He had a right to presume that the period of insurance named in the policies conformed to the agreement and to the stipulations and conditions of his application; and to that effect are the authorities, as we shall presently see. When the period of insurance has been agreed upon, it is the almost universal usage for business men to pay the premium and accept their policies without reading them. . . . The question is not whether the finding of facts establishes the mistake or fraud, but whether, the mistake or fraud being conclusively established by the finding of facts, the court will declare that the insured is estopped from availing himself of the truth by the mere receipt of the policies and putting them away without reading them, in reliance upon the truth of the agent's answer and the stipulations of his applications. It must not be forgotten that there is no claim or pretense that the policies in fact expressed the contract of the parties. The finding of facts precludes any such claim. The contention is that, by receiving the policies under the circumstances mentioned, the insured is 'conclusively presumed' to have assented to all their provisions, and will not be heard to say to the contrary. The rule for the application of estoppels is thus inverted and applied in favor of the company when it is obvious that it is the company that is estopped from setting up the defense relied on. Estoppels are invoked to prevent and relieve from fraud, not to shield and protect it. . . . It will be perceived at a glance that the estoppel in this case applies to the insurance company, and not to the insured. The insured made no representation to the company, and the company parted with no money or other valuable thing on the faith of any false statement that he made. Nor did it do, or omit to do, anything on account of the insured putting away the policies without reading them. . . . It is undoubtedly true that a written contract is presumed to express the agreement of the parties, but this is not a conclusive presumption, and the exceptions to the rule are as well understood and clearly defined as the rule itself. No writing, however solemn, can be made a vehicle for fraud, or convert a mistake into a verity. The case at bar, upon the facts found, falls within the well-defined exception to the rule as shown by all the authorities."

On the final appeal to the Supreme Court (183 U. S. 25, 46 L. ed. 64, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 10), judgment was rendered against the company, in spite of its refusal on the prior appeal, to grant a certiorari to review the lower court's opinion. "Bearing in mind that Mc-

If a party has the right to rescind the contract he must act with reasonable diligence in so doing, or he loses that right.

Master had made no request of the company in respect of antedating the policies, and was ignorant of the interpolation of the agent, and ignorant in fact, and not informed or notified in any way, of the insertion of December 12, as the date for subsequent payments, he had the right to suppose that the policies accorded with the applications as they had left his hands, and that they secured to him, on payment of the first annual premiums in advance, immunity from forfeiture for thirteen months. And the agent assured him that this was so. The situation being thus, we are unable to concur in the view that McMaster's omission to read the policies when delivered to him, and payment of the premiums made constituted such negligence as to estop plaintiff from denying that McMaster, by accepting the policies, agreed that the insurance might be forfeited within thirteen months from December 12, 1898."

This was a unanimous opinion with the exception of Brewer, J., who did not hear the argument and took no part in the decision.

It is hard to believe that the proof of the single additional fact of the agent's misrepresentation at the delivery of the policy influenced this decision by the supreme court. It is not adverted to except in the single short sentence at the end of the first paragraph quoted. And the preceding sentence seemingly contains the elements of the fraud and the justification for the insured's acceptance of the policy without examination, upon which the court relies. For, after detailing these circumstances, it is said that the insured "had the right to suppose that the policies accorded with the applications as they left his hands." And the statement of the agent at the delivery of the policy seems to be mentioned by the court merely as an afterthought. It should be noted, also, that proof of this additional fact is not regarded by Shiras, J., whose judgment on the equity side of the case was reversed, as sufficient to turn the scales in the subsequent trial at law, and it is treated as immaterial by Sanborn, J., who wrote the prevailing opinion on both appeals to the circuit court of appeals.

3. Limitation of time for action on policy.

While no fraud on the part of the company in inserting a limitation-of-action clause in the policy is asserted by the insured in Barnes v. McMurtry, 29 Neb. 178, 45 N. W. 285, a de-murrer to an answer based on its violation is sustained, the court treating the clause as a fraud upon the insured where his attention had not been drawn to it. Mere retention of the policy is not deemed to work an assent to the condition, or to render it binding. A special consideration for this portion of the contract is said to be necessary. The premium which the insured pays, is paid, says the court, for insurance, and "he may reasonably suppose that, having paid the ordinary rates, the company in case of loss, will pay the same promptly after proof thereof is duly made. If it fails to do so he may reasonably expect that the time to bring an action against the company is the same as upon any other written contract where there has been a breach thereof. The policy is issued, and, he believing the company to be honorable, and to have based its policy on the application, the policy is not read, but placed among his valuable papers, and only after a loss occurs is it examined. Every person familiar with the subject well knows that such is the ordinary course. In very many cases at least. If it is sought to impose conditions or restrictions of this kind, they should be set forth in the application, or be brought to the attention of the insured, when the premium is paid; otherwise, unless there is a consideration shown for them, they will not be sustained."

4. Existence of options at maturity.

In Fennell v. Zimmerman, 96 Va. 197, 31 S. E. 22, the insured agreed with the agent for a policy offering several alternative options to the insured at the expiration of the period for which it was to run. The policy as delivered bore the slip on which such options were printed, but unsigned, and therefore inoperative. After retaining the policy in this condition for twenty months without observing the defect, the insured defended an action upon his premium note on the ground of the variance between the policy delivered and the policy applied for. He was held liable, however, the court saying: "It was the imperative duty of the defendant, upon the receipt of the policy, to examine it promptly, and see if the printed slip was attached thereto and signed by the secretary of the company, if he meant to claim that this was a part of the contract, and, if not so signed, to return the policy and the slip within a reasonable time to the company, or to the plaintiff, that it might be so signed and attached, and, if not done, to demand that the contract be rescinded and his notes returned to him. . . . In cases of this nature great diligence is required of the parties, and the delay for twenty months to examine if the printed slip was signed, as he testified that he had specially stipulated should be done, cannot be sanctioned. His negligence was inexcusable; the delay unreasonable. He began to receive the benefit of the policy from the day of its date, and every day that he delayed to notify the company of the omission now complained of, after he discovered it, or by the exercise of due diligence might have discovered it, was a wrong to the company, if his plea that the policy 'was never accepted by him as a compliance with the contract, or in lieu thereof,' were allowed to prevail. The company kept his life insured, and carried the risk during the entire year, for which he gave his notes for the premium, and furnished a consideration that cannot be restored. By his alliance he left the company bound, so far as it knew, and, if he had died, it might have paid the policy without a suspicion that the defendant claimed that there was no binding contract. By his acts and unreasonable delay he lost the right to rescind the contract, to avoid the note sued upon, and to recover back what he had paid, which was the only damage attempted to be proved."

The representation of a "special agent," who was not the agent of the company, that, after payment of premiums for ten years on an "instalment-bond" policy, insured could convert it into a paid-up policy, was held, in Wilson v. National L. Ins. Co. 31 Misc. 403, 65 N. Y. Supp. 550, to be no ground for a reformation of the policy in this regard, where neither the application, which had been signed by the insured in ignorance of its terms, nor the policy itself, allowed such an option, and the policy had been retained for ten years without objection. "The plaintiff was clearly guilty of inexcusable negligence, which does not commend his claim to the equitable consideration of the court. . . . The fact that the plaintiff, for over ten years after the receipt of the instrument or policy in question, has chosen to retain it without complaint or objection, paying the instalments or premiums as they accrued thereon, and without taking any steps for its reformation, deprives the case of any equitable features, and seriously assails the good faith of 67 L. the plaintiff in his attempt to charge the defendant with a liability inconsistent with the terms of its contract."

5. Liability to assessment.

In a mutual company the equities of subsequent members, who have taken out policies presumptively in reliance upon the strength of the company, as shown by its previous membership, seem to impose upon the insured an especial diligence in discovering a mistake or fraud and taking immediate action to obviate the same. Thus, in Mansfield v. Cincinnati Ice Co. 11 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 617, it appeared that the agent who solicited the insurance from the insured secured the application through a false representation that there would be no further liability to assessment after the first premium had been paid. The policy showed clearly upon its face that the insured was liable to such subsequent assessment. Having retained this for a year and a half without objection, the insured was deemed estopped to set up the agent's fraud. "Such false statement, if it induced insurance, would make the policy voidable only, and, a reasonable time having elapsed with full opportunity to the member to discover the fraud, the defense ought not now to prevail as against losses to innocent members relying on the defendant's various policies being satisfactory to it. . . . When the [insured has held] policies of the character sued upon for so long a time . . . without disclaiming the express terms thereof or seeking any relief therefrom, it has permitted the rights of innocent parties to intervene. It has held out to other policy holders and members that the contracts of insurance in question were either true and correct, or acquiesced in by the defendant. On the facts pleaded, it does not appear that the agent did or said anything to prevent the defendant from examining the policies and terms of the written contracts. No excuse whatever appears for such neglect by the defendant's officers, and, therefore, the defendant company having slept so long on their rights for reformation of these policies, thereby inducing other members to rely on them as correctly stating the several contracts of insurance, it is too late to maintain a defense against an assessment for losses by fire to such other mutual policy holders."

The policy issued in Susquehanna Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Swank, 102 Pa. 17, showed upon its face that it was issued upon the assessment plan, and not upon the annual interest plan, which the insured had applied for and had been assured by the agent that the policy to be issued would adopt. Two or three months after its issue an assessment which was levied upon the insured was paid under protest, and the policy soon after was sent to the agent with an objection to the payment of assessments thereon. The agent neglected to return the policy to the company until a second assessment was levied a year later. The company then refused to receive the policy, and brought action against the insured to collect the second assessment. The insured was held liable. "If he signed the application without reading it his act was inexcusably negligent. In such case there was the more necessity for reading his policy when he received it. Had he done either, he would have seen that he was insured upon the assessment plan, and the mistake, if any, could, and doubtless would, have been corrected. But he retained it, as before stated, and did not notify the company for sixteen months. During all of this time he had the benefit of the insurance. In case of loss the company would have been liable. Not only so; other parties may have insured upon the faith of his liability to assessment upon his premium note. An instrument may be reformed in cases of fraud, accident, or mistake, but, where the mistake was the result of the supine negligence of a party who sleeps upon his rights until other duties and responsibilities have grown up, the law will not help him."

In Dwinnell v. Felt, 90 Minn. 9, 95 N. W. 379, an action by a receiver of an insolvent company against the insured to collect an assessment, the latter defended on the ground that he had been induced to accept his policy upon the representation that the company was a stock, and not a mutual, company, and that the policies were issued on a cash plan, with no contingent liability in connection therewith. But the policy itself contained a stipulation that by its acceptance the insured assumed an additional liability. The court, after stating that misrepresentations as to the character of the policy were "not sufficient to constitute a fraud," continues: "If there had been some misrepresentations as to the nature of the policy and its legal effect, respondent was put upon inquiry as to the authority of the company to make the assessment referred to, and he would 67 L. R. A.

not be permitted to retain the policy, accept its benefits, and afterwards, when the company became insolvent, raise the question of having been imposed upon. . . . If there was any ground for having the policy canceled on account of fraud or misrepresentation, he was required to act with reasonable expedition. In the absence of such a showing, the defense pleaded was not sufficient."

That such a conclusion would not be reached where no such notice is conveyed by the terms of the policy, appears from the decision of the companion case, Dwinnell v. Kramer, 87 Minn. 392, 92 N. W. 227. It was there held that retention of a policy containing no other indication of its mutual character and additional contingent liability than that conveyed by a formal and insufficient reference therein to certain statutes relating to mutual policies, has no effect as an acceptance thereof and assent to the additional liability where the insured was induced to take it out by the representations of the insurer's agent that the policy was on the "all cash plan." "To permit them to issue cash or stock policies, and, by a formal reference to the statute and their by-laws, thereby impose upon the insured a contingent mutual liability for their losses, would be contrary to the express provisions and manifest intent of the statute, and a gross fraud."

So, in Keller v. Equitable F. Ins. Co. 28 Ind. 170, supra, II., where the court deemed the insured excusable in his failure to inspect the policy, by reason of the false statement of the insurer's agent at delivery that the policy was unconditional as agreed upon, the insured was held not liable to assessment upon his premium note fraudulently obtained at the time of application, although the policy expressly mentioned the same as a consideration for its issuance.

6. Right to cancel.

The insertion of a clause limiting the right of the insured to cancel his policy is held, in Hartford Steam Boiler Inspection & Ins. Co. v. Cartier, 89 Mich. 41, 50 N. W. 747, to operate as a fraud upon the insured, where, at the time of the application, he had told the agent that he would probably cancel the policy on obtaining better rates from a rival company, and the agent did not disclose the existence of the non-

When a positive statement as to existing facts is made by the seller, the buyer is not bound to beware of intentional fraud, or to cancellation clause in the policy, but had merely stated that no company could give him better rates. "The question here is not as to the effect of a naked acceptance of a policy without examination, but as to whether, in the absence of actual notice, a party can be bound by a new restriction in a policy, concerning the existence of which he has been lulled to sleep and actually misled and deceived. . . . The company cannot be allowed to evade his questions, mislead him, suppress the truth, and lull him to sleep regarding new restrictions which it has injected into the policy, and thereafter charge him with constructive knowledge of those restrictions."

A contrary conclusion is reached in the frequently cited case, American Ins. Co. v. Nelberger, 74 Mo. 167. The insurer's agent there agreed that the policy should contain a cancellation clause in favor of the insured. The policy issued made no mention of such a clause. It was accepted, and retained by the insured for a period of three and one half months without objection. On discovery of the omission the insured sought to cancel the policy, which the company refused to do, but, on the contrary, sued the insured upon his premium notes. A judgment in favor of the company was rendered on the ground that the insured had retained the policies too long without objection, and must be deemed to have accepted them in the form in which they were written. "When the application does not attempt to set forth all the provisions which the policy to be issued must contain," says the court, "and the agent, with or without authority, represents that the policy will contain certain stipulations which are not unlawful, then the policy must contain them, or the insured will not be bound to accept it. But in such case it will be the duty of the insured, when he receives the policy, promptly to examine the same, and, if it does not contain the stipulations agreed upon, to at once notify the company of such fact, and of his refusal to accept said policy. . . . If the policy was received by the defendant soon after the date on which it purports to have been issued, we think he waited too long to elect whether he would receive the policy without the stipulation in regard to cancellation, or refuse to accept it because it did not contain such stipulation. After such delay he will be deemed to have accepted the policy as issued."

So, a member of a mutual company was held liable for assessments, in Susquehanna Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Oberholtzer, 172 Pa. 223, 32 Atl. 1105, 1108, in spite of an attempt to cancel his policy. It appeared that at the time of the application insured requested a policy containing a provision permitting him to withdraw at any time from the company upon payment of his share of the losses to date. The agent stated that the application, signed by the insured without reading, and the policy to be issued in pursuance thereof, contained such a stipulation. In fact no such right was included in the terms of either. By retaining the policy for sixteen months, and paying assessments thereon without objection during this period, the insured was held bound by its terms, and precluded from any other agreement in regard to cancellation than that expressly given by the policy. "As to the false representations made by the agent of the company to obtain an application for the policies, undoubtedly these were sufficient to avoid the policy if the insured chose to treat it as avoided at the proper time. When was the time which equity would regard as proper for the exercise of this right? Certainly within a reasonable time after discovery, or opportunity for discovery, of the fraud; the policies were delivered to Oberholtzer soon after the 26th of May, 1882. They were the evidence of his contract: he must then accept or refuse it. Without looking at it, he put it in his safe, where it remained for more than a year unopened. In the meantime he pays two assessments without objection; then examines his policies, and finds they express a different contract than that agreed upon between him and the agent; thereupon he returned them and demands cancellation. This was too late when examination a year before would have shown the fraud, and it must be presumed he did what it was his duty to do then,—examine them; his subsequent silence and payment of assessments is acquiescence."

7. Obligation to keep books in safe.

Where a policy was received only twelve days before a fire, it was held that there could be no estoppel of the insured from demanding a reformation of the policy, because of an unreasonable retention before suit. The agent had assured the complainant that, if his application, stating that he did not keep his books of account in a fire-proof safe, was accepted by the Relief was granted by striking out this clause and enforcing the policy as so altered. Home F. Ins. Co. v. Gurney, 56 Neb. 306, 76 N. W. 553.

8. Obligation to keep watchman on premises.

Justification for insured's failure to read his application at the time of signing it, being found in the false statement of the insurer's agent as to its contents, it is held in Kansas Mill-Owners' & Mfrs. Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Central Nat. Bank, 60 Kan. 630, 57 Pac. 524, that omission to read the copy attached to and made part of the policy, and to discover a promissory warranty contained therein to keep a watchman upon the premises, is insufficient to charge him with negligence, and to bar a recovery upon the policy for its breach in this regard.

9. Signature to application.

A constructive, if not actual, fraud was worked upon the insured in Fulton v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 47 N. Y. S. R. 111, 19 N. Y. Supp. 660, through a soliciting agent's representation that the applicant for insurance upon the life of a sister might properly sign the application. Accompanying the policy issued upon the application so signed was a premium receipt book, in which were copied rules of the company, which required the signature of the party whose life was insured, to the application. Premiums were paid for several years before discovery of the fraud, and then insured's suit for rescission was met by the company's defense based on her negligence in not reading the conditions appearing in such receipt book. The defense was not allowed, however, and the rescission was granted, the court saying that premiums might be recovered on the theory of money paid under a mistake of fact. "It is elementary that money paid under a mistake of fact may be recovered; and the mistake of fact under which plaintiff paid the premiums sought to be recovered by her was that her applications for insurance complied with the conditions upon which the policies were issued to her,—a mistake which in part, at least, was induced by the misrepresentations of defendant's own agent. Neglect to examine or read a contract before it is entered into has sometimes been held a bar to relief, 67 L. R. A.

but only when the granting of relief would have worked injury to others; and in such cases the relief has been denied upon a proper invocation of the rule that, as between two equally innocent persons, he through whose fault the injury was occasioned should suffer the loss. But when, if the relief is afforded, no injury will happen to others, and particularly when the person to whom money was paid by mistake knew, or ought to have known, that he was not entitled to receive it, the neglect to read the contract will constitute no bar, and restitution of the moneys paid will be compelled, since, under such circumstances, a refusal to return the moneys would be unconscionable."

10. Agency clause.

The insertion in the policy of a clause making the company's agent the agent of the insured is held in Nassauer v. Susquehanna Mut. F. Ins. Co. 109 Pa. 507, to be a fraud upon the insured, and his failure to read the policy and discover its insertion could not affect his rights. "It was the assertion of a falsehood, and an attempt to put that falsehood into the mouth of the assured. It formed no part of the contract of insurance. That contract consists of the application and the policy issued in pursuance thereof. In point of fact the assured does not see the policy until after it is executed and delivered to him. In many instances it is laid away by him and never read,—especially as to the elaborate conditions in fine print. Grant that it is his duty to read it, his neglect to do so can bind him only for what the company has a right to insert therein. He was not bound to suppose that the company would falsely assert, either by direct language in the policy, or by reference to a by-law, that a man was his agent who had never been his agent, but who was, on the contrary, the agent of the company."

A recovery in equity upon the policy was allowed in Boetcher v. Hawkeye Ins. Co. 47 Iowa, 253, where the insured had truly stated the encumbrances upon the property insured at the time of the application, and the agent had falsely inserted the replies in the signed application, although the policy contained a clause making the agent the agent of the insured at the time of the application. The insertion of such a clause, the court says, worked a constructive fraud as to matters already completed, and that, while the insured might be charge-tween remedies. They could have affirmed and retained the policies, notwithstanding the fraud, and brought an action for deceit to recover the difference between the value of such policies and those they should have received; or have done as they did,—repudiate the policies and sue ex contractu, on the promise implied by law, to recover back the premiums paid with interest.

On petition for rehearing.

Courts will protect persons of ordinary able with notice of the agent's position in regard to transactions subsequent to the receipt of the policy, yet, as to matters preceding such receipt, the actual agency for the company could not be changed by that clause to an agency for the insured. "We can readily see," says the court, "that the assured may be bound to take notice of the conditions and covenants in a policy that affect his rights, or that apply to matters in existence at the time the policy is delivered, or that may occur in the future; but we know of no principle of law which requires him to diligently examine the policy for the purpose of ascertaining whether it contains false statements of fact as to a past transaction which he might well suppose was closed."

11. Date of policy.

An immaterial error in dating a policy September 8th instead of July 1st, as requested by the application, is held, in Home L. Ins. Co. v. Myers, 50 C. C. A. 544, 112 Fed. 846, to be waived by the acceptance and retention of the same without objection for several months.

12. Value of policy.

Representations as to the value of a tontine policy at maturity, though made both at the solicitation of the insurance and at the delivery of the policy, are held in Avery v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. 117 N. Y. 451, 23 N. E. 3, to be no ground for a reformation, where it is not alleged that they fraudulently induced the acceptance of the policy, or that the mistake in failing to incorporate the estimated value as a term of the policy is mutual. Furthermore, the acceptance and retention of the policy during the fifteen-year tontine period, without objection or attempt to secure reformation, "deprives the case," says the court, "of equitable features, and seriously assails the good faith of the plaintiff in her present attempt to charge the defendant with a liability inconsistent with the terms of its contract."

c. Variation of terms on renewal of policy.

An exception to the general rule that the terms of the policy as written govern the rights of the insured in spite of mistake or fraud, after the policy has been in the hands of the insured a reasonable length of time without ob-
